TO HIS

ROYAL HIGHNESS

FREDERIC

PRINCE of WALES.

SIR,

Y presuming to offer to YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS this Translation, is in some measure justified by the Nature of the Subject, and Reason of the Thing. For History, however useful to others, is infinitely more so to a Prince, and particularly the History of that Crown He is born to wear. How instructive, as well as agreeable, must a fair and impartial Narration of the Lives and Actions of a long Series of Predecessors be to Him?

And that Such is the following History, originally penned by a Foreigner, who had no Party to serve, or Interest to promote, may be undoubtedly concluded from the universal Approbation it every where meets with.

HERE then, as from a faithful Monitor, uninfluenced by Hopes or Fears, YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS will learn, in general, That to a Prince nothing is so pernicious as Flattery; nothing so valuable as Truth: That proportionable to his People's Liberty and Happiness will be his

D E D I C A T I O N.

Glory and Strength: That true Valour consists not in destroying, but protecting Mankind; not in conquering Kingdoms, but defending them from Violence: That a Prince's most secret Counsels, Motives and Pursuits, will probably one day be published and rigorously judged; and, however flattered whilst living, yet when dead, he will be treated as his Actions have deserved, with Honour or Reproach, with Veneration or Contempt.

MORE particularly, YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS will Here perceive, that foreign Acquisitions and Conquests were generally fatal to England; all Increase of Empire burdensome to her, except That of the Ocean, which can never be too extensive, as it enlarges and protects her Trade, the principal Fountain of her Riches and Grandeur.

BUT above all, you will Here see the Origin and Nature of our Excellent Constitution, where the Prerogatives of the Crown, and Privileges of the Subject are so happily proportioned, that the King and the People are inseparably united in the same Interests and Views. You will observe that this Union, though talked of by even the most Arbitrary Princes with respect to their Subjects, is peculiar to the English Monarchy, and the most solid Foundation of the Sovereign's Glory, and the People's Happiness.

ACCORDINGLY, you will Here constantly find, that in the Reigns where this Union was cultivated, the Kingdom flourished, and the Prince was glorious, powerful, trusted, beloved. On the contrary, when, by an Arbitrary Disposition, or evil Counsels, it was interrupted, the Constitution languished, mutual Confidence vanished, Distrust, Jealousy, Discord arose; and when entirely broken, as was unfortunately sometimes the Case, Confusion and Civil Wars ensued.

As this Union, so essential to our Government, was by Your Royal Grandfather, and is by His Present Majesty, Your Royal Father, steddily adhered to, so it is with extreme Satisfaction presumed, that the same Adherence will distinguish YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS's future Reign, a Presumption grounded upon Your many noble Endowments, but chiefly on that Foundation of all other, as well as Royal, Virtues, a generous Mind, which naturally abhors Oppression and Tyranny.

PRESUMING on this known Generosity, I most humbly intreat YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS's gracious Acceptance of this Address and Translation, and beg leave to have the Honour of subscribing my self, with profound Respect and Submission,

S I R,

Your ROYAL HIGHNESS's

Most humble, most dutiful,

And most obedient Servant,

N. TINDAL.

But to enable the King to labour effectually for the good of the Kingdom, it was necessary to cloath him with a great Power, and assign him a Revenue sufficient to live in splendor, in order to attract the veneration of the People. It was necessary to grant him Privileges approaching absolute Power; as the command of the Armies and fortified Places; the execution of the Laws, and the admini-

To preserve a perfect union between the King and the People, it was necessary to establish a way of communication between them. This was done by means of a Wittena-Genst, or Assembly of Wise Men, who represented the whole Nation. This method the Saxons brought with them from Germany, where all public affairs were decided in such an Assembly, of which their Generals, chosen in time of war, were Presidents. However, they were obliged to make some alterations, because in Germany they had no Kings, the supreme Power being lodged in the Wittena-Genst; whereas in England, their Chiefs or Leaders assumed the Title of Kings. Hengist, who first led Saxon Troops into Britain as Auxiliaries, was the first that assumed this Title, probably with the approbation of the Saxons under his command. For since he was not naturally their King, how could he become so without their consent? But it must be observed, Hengist may be considered in a double capacity. At his arrival in Great-Britain he was certainly only General of the Saxons. But after receiving the Grant of Kent from Portigern King of the Britons, he became as much Sovereign of that Country as Portigern was before him, and accordingly assumed the Title of King of Kent, but this new Title did not make him King of the Saxons, of whom he was only intrusted with the command. So, it is likely, the Saxons, in consenting, their General should become their Sovereign, did not give him an absolute power over their Lives and Properties, supposing, what would be extremely difficult to prove, he was invested with such a power over his British Subjects. There is a remarkable passage in the History of France to this purpose. Clovis was King of the Franks, before he led his Army into Gaul, and his large Conquests there gave him no more power over his own Countrymen than he enjoyed before. This is evident from his being prevented by a common Soldier, from presenting the Archbishop of Rheims, with a piece of Plate taken among the Plunder. The Soldier could not bear, the King should appropriate to himself what belonged to all in common, so he drew it in pieces with his Battle-Ax [and took his share.] The King, who knew he exceeded his Power, did not dare to punish him upon the spot, and though he afterwards took an occasion to put him to death, it was upon some other account, wherein he might lawfully do it. It may then with good reason be affirmed, that the Saxon Generals, in assuming the Title of King, acquired not a despotick Power over their own Followers, by whose assistance they conquered Britain. Since therefore the first Kings had not such a Power, it was necessary to establish some way to prevent their usurping it; and that could not be done better, than by general Assemblies, which consisting of the King, and the chiefs of the People, kept the balance even betwixt both. It must be further observed, there is one material difference between the settlement of the Franks in Gaul, and of the Saxons in Britain. In Gaul, the number of the Conquered was always superior to that of the Conquerors. Whereas in Britain, if any Britons remained in the conquered Provinces, they were but few, and in a state of Slavery. So, the Country was properly inhabited only with Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, over whom the Conquests made by their own Arms, gave to their first Kings no power but what they consented to. We are ignorant indeed of the particulars of the agreement between the Kings and their respective People, but the proofs that afterwards appear, of the People's Liberty, leave no room to doubt, there was at first some regulation thereon.

It is not easy to know distinctly, who the Witan or Wifemen were that composed their Wittena-Gemots. At first, these Assemblies might only consist of the Saxon Officers, among whom the conquered Lands were divided, and who from thence became the Princes or Chiefs in the several States. In process of time, the Britons having entirely abandoned their Country, the Conquerors, finding themselves too few to cultivate the whole, sent for a great number of Families from Germany, to whom the rest of the Lands were given. These distributions were thus made. The new King gave to those of his Followers, who were distinguished by their Birth, Services, or personal Merit, such a portion of Land, on condition they served the Crown on certain occasions; which these parcelled out again to others, with a reservation of such and such Services to themselves. These two sorts of Possessors were called Thanes, that is, Servants: but the first were distinguished by the Title of King's Thanes, which answers to that of the immediate Vassals of the Crown. These, after the Norman Conquest, were called Barons, and afterwards Peers of the Realm. For Earl and Duke were only honorary Titles or names of Offices. It is not denied, the King's Thanes were Members of the Wittena-Gemots: but that the other Thanes were so, is greatly disputed, as will be seen in the Dissertation on the Government, Laws, and Customs of the Saxons. It suffices at present, that there was in each Kingdom an Assembly of Witan or Wifemen, who, jointly with the King, regulated all important Affairs, made Laws and Ordinances, and imposed Taxes. As nothing was decided but by the mutual consent of the King and the Assembly, their interests not being separate, and their aims the same, namely, the good of the publick, this is a clear evidence, that the essence of the Government consisted in the strict union between King and People. If we look into the Histories of the other European Kingdoms founded by the northern Nations, we shall find the like Assemblies under different names, as Diets in Germany and Poland, and Cortes, in Spain. It is not therefore strange, the Saxons should establish in England the only form of Government known to them.

After the Norman Conquest these Assemblies were called Parliaments. If William the Conqueror continued them, which perhaps is not very easy to prove, it was not with the same Rights and Privileges they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings. It is true, in the following Reigns, some traces of them appear, which make it thought, they were not entirely abolished. However, Parliaments were not frequent till King John, and Henry III., in whose Reign, several affirm, and perhaps not without reason, that the Commons, for the first time, sent Representatives to Parliament. Probably, the Lords and Commons, after their separation, the time whereof is unknown, met in two different Houses, since the English still call Houses the same Rooms, where they assemble, though under the same Roof. They say, the Upper House, or House of Lords, and the Lower House, or House of Commons, to denote what is expressed in French by the word Chamber. It is but since the Reign of Edward I. successor to Henry III., that there has been an uninterrupted series of Parliaments.

After the Commons became a distinct House from the Lords, they pretended to be the sole Representatives of the People, by whom they were chosen. The Lords could pretend only to act for themselves, or for the Body of the Nobility, as making a considerable part of the Nation. However this be, the Barons, of whom very likely the Parliament at first consisted, lost by degrees many of their ancient Rights, and the House of Commons came to be considered as the Guardians of the People's interests. However, the Lords still retain very great privileges; they are, for instance, the highest Court of Justice in the Kingdom; they have a power to bring in, approve, and throw out Bills; in a word, they always make an essential part of the Parliament. The Bishops and Abbots, who had all along a Right to sit in Parliament, had it continued to them after the Conquest. It cannot well be doubted that they sat in the Wittena-Gemots, as King's Thanes, or Barons, since they were the immediate Tenants of the Crown: but it is not so certain, that they enjoyed this Right, as Representatives of the Clergy.

The Commons, as a consequence of their being the Representatives of the People, claim an undisputed Right of laying Taxes, and granting Money to the King. So that the House of Lords in this case have no other power than to pass, or throw out, the Bill, without offering to make any alterations or amendments.

Thus, the two Houses of Parliament compose the Body of the Nation, jointly with the King; who is the Head. The close and absolutely necessary union between the King and the Parliament, appears in nothing so much as in the manner of making an Act of Parliament, or Law. When either of the two Houses designs to bring in a Bill (for so is an Act called before it is passed) after examining and debating every Clause, it is sent to the other House for their approbation. If it passes there, it is brought to the King for the Royal Assent, after which, and not before, it has the form and force of a Law. But if either of the Houses throw it out, or the King refuses his assent, it comes to nothing, as if it had never been mentioned. Nothing more plainly demonstrates, that the essence of the English Government consists in the union between the King and his People. Take away this Union, and it becomes Confusion and Anarchy.

Whether the Commons originally sat in Parliament, or only since the Reign of Henry III., it is certain, their power by degrees is very much increased, to which the maxim, that their House solely represents the People, has greatly contributed. This maxim was not yet established in the Reign of Henry VIII., since we find he applied to the Barons for a supply of Money. But this is not the only new Privilege they have acquired. Upon their separation from the Lords, the interests of the two Houses were not the same upon all occasions. They have had frequent contests concerning their respective Rights. But generally the Commons had the advantage of the Lords; and no wonder, since they alone dispose of the Nation's Money.

On the other hand, as great alterations have happened with regard to the Lords or Peers. Formerly all the immediate Vassals of the Crown were Barons, and, as such, had a seat in Parliament. But now, as there are none of those Lands that were called Fees of the Crown, the right of sitting in the House of Lords is annexed to the bare honorary Titles of Duke, Marquis, Earl, Viscount and Baron, which give those that are invested therewith, no power over the Shires, Cities, or Lands, whose names they bear, and which the King may bestow on whom he pleases. However, when once these Titles are conferred on a Family, the Head cannot be deprived of his right to sit in Parliament, unless he has been judicially condemned by his Peers, for some crime that renders him unworthy. But it must be observed, it is in the King's power to extend or limit, many ways, the right of succeeding to these Honours; so that sometimes, though rarely, he extends it to the female, in default of the male, Line. Though a Peer only has a right to sit in the House of Lords, the King may, if he pleases, call the Son of a Nobleman to the House of Peers in his Father's life-time. The inferior Titles are always included in the superior, so that every Duke is at the same time Marquis, Earl, Viscount and Baron (1). Thus all the Lords are Barons, and properly as such, are Members of the Parliament, according to ancient usage. For before and long after the Conquest, the Lords of Parliament were considered only as the King's Thanes or Barons. For this reason, the civil Wars in the Reigns of King John and Henry III. are called, the Barons Wars. The Title of Duke was first conferred in England, after the Conquest, by Edward III. on his eldest Son, whom he made Duke of Cornwall. The Title of Marquis is much later. In the time of the Saxons, Earls or Counts were properly Governors or Chiefs of Shires or Counties, so called from them. William the Conqueror having distributed the Lands of the English among his Followers, they on whom he conferred the Title of Earl or Count, became really and truly Lords of those Lands whose Titles they bore, so that they were hereditary in their Families. Afterwards, but at what time is not known, they lost this privilege, and the Title of Earl, as was before observed, is become only honorary. The Viscounts, under the Saxon Kings, were Lieutenants to the Earls in their Counties. They discharged the Office of High-Sheriff, which is now left to inferior Officers, whilst the Viscounts are ranked among the Peers, and have even the precedence of the Barons. This last Title was formerly general, and included the whole Body of the Nobility or Peers of the Realm, of whom the Upper House of Parliament consists. Next to these are what they call in England, the Gentry, who, though distinguished by several Titles, as Knight, Esquire, &c. are all included in the Body of the Commons, who in France are called, the Third Estate. From among these are chosen the Knights of the Shire, Citizens and Burgesses, who compose the Lower House, to the number of five hundred and thirteen: but it seldom happens that all are present, and forty are sufficient to make a House.

What has been said shows, how the two Houses of Parliament are part of the Legislature, since by them the Laws are made with the Royal Assent. Accordingly, the Parliament has ever been very careful to preserve its Privileges, and hinder the least breach, for fear of losing them intently, as it has happened in other Kingdoms. On the other hand, most of the Laws tend to maintain the Liberty and Property of the Subjects, so that they can be deprived of them only by Law. There are absolutely but two ways to deprive the English of their Liberties. Either by laying aside Parliaments entirely, or by bribing the Members to sacrifice their Country to their ambition or avarice. Both these methods have been tried more than once, and for some time with seeming success, but in the end have turned to the Confusion and Ruin of the Projectors. The English have ever been extremely jealous of their Liberties, and this jealousy has frequently caused violent motions in the Kingdom, when they have seen or suspected a tendency to undermine their Privileges, and they have thereby preserved the Constitution of their Government in much the same state as in the beginning of the Monarchy.

In this Second Edition, the Translation, which in the first was not so correct, is thoroughly revised and compared with the Original; but if the Style be not yet so lively and agreeable as some could wish, it must be remembered that a fine Style cannot be expected from one who is supposed to translate Mr. Rapin. For though he was a very judicious, he was certainly no elegant, Writer. And perhaps it would be difficult to find a greater influence of the power of Truth on the minds of Men, than the universal approbation given to a History penned in so naked and unadorned a manner. Indeed, History does not require that nicety of Expression, which is necessary in other Works; but may be read with benefit, though it wants that Perfection. However this be, care has been taken in the Translation to avoid all low expressions, and to preserve an even and unaffected Style.

As it is almost impossible for a Foreigner not to fall into some little mistake, particularly as to our Customs, Laws, Names, Families, and the like, these are all carefully noted and rectified.

Though Mr. Rapin depended not on any modern Historian in what passed before Henry VIII. but consulted the antient and cotemporary Writers, and accordingly placed their Names in the Margin of his Manuscript, yet many of these references are wanting, which happened, as he says himself, by the following accident. Having employed a young Man to transcribe his History for the Press, and ordering him to leave a Blank for such proper Names as he could not readily read, the Blanks in the Body of the History were filled up by the Author, whilst those in the Margin were forgot. This omission is with great labour and pains supplied in the Translation, and the Names of the Authors every where quoted in the Margin.

As Mr. Rapin wrote his History for the instruction of Foreigners, he has passed over in silence numberless Facts, Particulars, and Circumstances, which, though of little moment or use to a Stranger, may be agreeable, and even necessary to an Englishman. This want is in some measure supplied, at least as far as the intended compass of the Work would allow, by many additional Notes.

In a word, the Translator, in his eight years application to this Work, has endeavoured to render it as useful as he could to his Countryman, and thinks himself obliged publicly to acknowledge the assistance he has received, in this second Edition, from the Reverend Mr. Philip Morant, Minister of the English Church at Amsterdam, who, besides revising the Sheets as they came from the Press, has been at the pains to compare every Paragraph with the antient Historians, and examine all the Quotations from the Fœdera, and thereby been enabled to correct some mistakes, and add several Notes.

(1) This is not so, unless they have had each Title distinctly conferred on them. There are few Dukes that are Marquises, and many Earls not Viscounts.

Some PARTICULARS of the LIFE of Mr. DE RAPIN THOYRAS.

In a Letter to-----

S I R,

I Imagined you would be surprized at my backwardness to second your design of writing the Life of Mr. DE RAPIN. This has given me some concern, for I wish to be of your mind, but must confess, I have hitherto been unresolved. I know not how the publick stands affected; and though I supposed, with you, that the World would be glad to be acquainted with Mr. DE RAPIN, I should think nothing can better satisfy their Curiosity, than his new History of England; it not being possible, in my opinion, but in so voluminous a Work, an Author (undesignedly) draws his own Picture himself, more to the Life than any other can do. If you say, this is not sufficient, because his Family and Actions are not seen there; I answer, the two Panegyrics on Mr. DE RAPIN, (in the xth Volume of the Bibliothèque Germanique, and in the Histoire Littéraire de Février 1726) seem to contain all that is proper to be said on these two heads. By this, you see I have not the same scruple concerning your present proposal, that these Panegyrics may at least be re-published and prefixed to his History of England. Indeed I think it very requisite, and, what is more, am resolved to publish them my self, with some alterations, that is, of the two I design to make one Discourse, borrowing from each what shall occur to my mind, without affecting either to swerve from, or copy them, that there may be room to insert some particulars that are passed over in silence. It may be, I shall go too far, contrary to my first intention, but however, you may be assured, I shall say nothing but what I have been fully informed of and what Mr. DE RAPIN's Family are ready to justify. Nevertheless, as in all this my sole aim is to oblige you, use this Letter as you please; suppress what you do not like; nay, if you think fit, be satisfied with the Panegyrics alone as first published, which perhaps would be best. But to begin.

Mr. DE RAPIN, counted among his Ancestors and Relations many eminent Persons as well of the Sword as the Gown. His Family is originally from Savoy, where it flourished time out of mind (1), and enjoyed several honorable Pofts (2). As I am ignorant of their personal qualities, I cannot say whether it was through a wife precaution, or to perpetuate an ill-grounded enmity, that a Bishop of Maurienne caused to be engraved, in the Episcopal Palace, the following Inscription still to be seen, Caveant Successores nostri a familia Rapinorum, i. e. Let our Successors beware of the RAPINS. On the other hand, this Family pretends, that their external Lustre was impaired solely by their steady adherence to the Laws of Honour and Justice. This is insinuated by the Author of the following Verses, which are not quoted for their Elegance.

*Pour n' avoir sans besoin su prendre,
On voit tomber cette maison:
Si l' Effet eut suivi son nom, Elle auroit de quoi se défendre.*

i. e. This Family, for being too haughty to invade the Property of others, is gone to decay. Had they been given to what their Name implies, they would have wherewithal to support themselves.

But to draw nearer to Mr. DE RAPIN, I shall proceed to four Brothers of that name, who settled in France in the Reign of Francis I. (3)

One, a Clergyman, was Almoner to Queen Catharine de Medici, who desired him of the Duke of Savoy. Besides the Preferments he enjoyed in his own Country, he was called the King's Orator, but what that means I cannot tell.

His Brothers (of whom but one has left Issue) were all three Soldiers, and embraced the Reformed Religion; for the sake of which, very probably, they abandoned their Country.

The eldest was a Colonel of Foot, and Governor of Montauban, with authority over the neighbouring Governors. His Name is among those of the Viscounts, who commanded the Troops of the Reformed in the Southern Provinces of France. Letters, still extant, show how well known he was to King Henry IV, to Lewis and Henry Princes of Condé, to Admiral Chastillon, and many other Persons of the first Quality.

All we know of one of his Brothers, called Peter, is, that a Commission of Captain of Horse must, by circumstances, belong to him; but of this we cannot be sure, because the Name is not expressed.

Philibert, another Brother, was Gentleman to the Prince of Condé, and afterwards his Steward (4). He had no less reputation in military (5), than capacity in civil, affairs (6): but both proved fatal to him, as they drew upon him the enmity of the Catholics, and particularly of the Parliament of Toulouse (7), who caused his head to be struck off at the very time he was come, by the King's Order, to register the Edict of Peace of 1568.

The French Historians frequently speak of these two Brothers. Father Daniel alone does not mention them, and passes over in silence, this cruel execution (8). The reason does not appear at first, for he cannot say, this Sen-

(1) By the Titles of this Family it appears that the Rapins were Noble in the year 1250. The Branches that are in Savoy pretend to a greater Antiquity: But of that I can say nothing.

(2) It is known in general, that some of the Rapins at several times were Syndics of the Nobles of their Country; others were deputed by the Nobility to go in their Name and do Homage to the Duke of Savoy their Sovereign.

(3) Between the Years 1545 and 1567.

(4) Maître d' Hôtel de sa Maison, that is, he had the management of the Prince's House in the highest Sense of the Word, and not as we understand the Term Steward at present.

(5) In fine, Rapin was in great Repute amongst his own Party. The Conspirators of Toulouse made choice of him to treat in their Name with the Government, which is a clear Evidence that he had a Hand to manage, as well as a Hand to sell. Annals of Toulouse, ch. 1768. The Conference (if I may be so in this Passage, was held to see whether there was any way of Accommodation between the two Parties) but it proved fruitless, and only served to exasperate them more than ever. Shortly after a Battle was fought in the City, which lasted some Days, wherein the Protestants, who were numerous there, but however inferior to the Catholics, lost three thousand Men, and were in the end chased out of the City. A solemn Procession was instituted in commemoration of this Event. When Peace was restored, the Reformed complained of this Procession, as a thing which revived the Memory of the Troubles, whereupon it was prohibited for the future; nevertheless it has been all along continued; only it was removed from the 14th of August, to the 17th, on some pretence or other.

(6) Il est de la réputation de son parti. Thuan. lib. 32.

(7) It might be alleged that there are no proofs of it. But since Thuanus and Mezerai, with whom few Writers can be compared for Falschness, speak of it, it must be inferred there were proofs in their Days, or they were warranted by the Notoriousness of the Fact. And what puts it out of all question is, that Mr. de la Fosse who wrote last at Toulouse, the Annals of that City, of which he was Syndic, though he takes notice that the first against Rapin is not to be trusted, (having been doubtless raised out of the Registers (or the Parliament's Honour) yet says more of the matter than all the rest that went before it.

tence, how unjust soever it may be supposed, is only a private affair, which therefore he might omit if he pleased; since it is visible, on the contrary, that such an Event, rendered memorable (1) by its circumstances and consequences, ought necessarily to have place in History. But when we consider, we find this able Historian has very artfully managed this omission for two uses; first, to extinguish, as far as in him lay, all remembrance of a rage which casts a blemish on the Papists; secondly, to render the Reformed odious, when he comes to speak of the ravages committed by the Admiral's Army, some time after, about Toulouse. Mean while, with regard to these ravages, he was not so free as he desired, but was obliged to speak of them in general terms, for he could not descend to particulars, without discovering the connexion between these ravages and RAPIN's death, by which they were both occasioned and justified. But what he slightly mentions, Tbouanus (2) and Mazarai relate more at large, and set in a true light. Mazarai, who is more circumstantial, and informs us, there were then in Toulouse eight thousand regular Troops, which added to the great number of Inhabitants, deprived the Reformed of all hopes of becoming masters of the City, says expressly, that the Hugonots----- set fire to all the Lands and Houses of the Counsellors, on the Ruins whereof the Soldiers writ with smoking Coals, RAPIN'S REVENGE.

Peter de Rapin, Baron of Mauviers, Son of Philibert, was Governor of Mas-Granier, one of the Cautionary-Towns granted to the Reformed in Guienne. He was a Soldier from his youth, and attended King Henry IV in all his expeditions. Most part of that time, he received not a Farthing from his Estate, which threw him into great straits, as well as many others for the same reason. The King himself was in no better circumstances, as may be inferred from his answer to Mr. DE RAPIN, who having lost his Horse, besought his Majesty to give him wherewithal to buy another: I would, says he, with all my heart, but see, I have scarce a Shirt to my back. But Mr. DE RAPIN's sufferings in the religious Wars were not confined to what passed in the Army. He thrice saw his House burnt and battered down in his life, and every thing plundered. It is true, he had amends made him the last time, as far as was possible, and in a manner which must have been very agreeable to him: for the Catholic Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood, by whom he was esteemed and beloved, meeting together, resolved to supply him with necessaries to plough and sow his Lands; and as those troubles lasted but eight months, when they were appeased, he found a Crop ready, and all his Estate except his House, in as good condition as the most diligent Owner could have kept it. On another occasion, he had a pleasure without any alloy: upon a rumour of his death, he read himself a Letter from Queen Mary de Medici, expressing her great sorrow to his Family. He married a Daughter of Mr. de Lupé, Lord of Marouat, Captain of fifty Men at Arms, Governor of Mauvezin a Cautionary-Town, and a Major-General.

He left a numerous Issue, of whom his second Son Jamés, Sieur de Thoyras (3), was the darling of his Parents. His Father left him more than any of the other younger Children, and his Mother gave him moreover that portion of the Estate of John de la Ferrière, Vidame (4) of Chartres, and one of the Heads of the French Protestants, which fell to her in right of her Mother. He was designed for a Soldier, like his Brothers; but his Mother willing to have him near her, was for breeding him a Scholar, to which the Father consented. After he had finished his Studies, he was admitted Advocate in the Court of the Edict (5) of Castres, and, contrary to the custom of the Country, where Persons nobly descended are never of that Profession, he practised it both at Castres and at Castellnaudary, and Toulouse, above fifty years, to the day of his death. It is true, I include the four years he spent at Paris, where he went, upon news of Mr. Pellisson his Brother-in-law, being arrested with Mr. Fouquet. Nothing passed in that famous affair, but what he was privy to, and he was very serviceable in many respects. He was one of the three concerned in the Festum, and supplied all we find there relating to the Roman Law. I saw in France a Letter sent to him by Mr. Fouquet from the Bastille, thanking him for it in the most affectionate manner. All that knew him, of whom several are now living, have always described him as one of the prime Advocates of his time, and very eminent for his impartiality and integrity. His Wife, who died at Genoa, where he was sent by the King's order, for refusing to turn Papist, was Sister of George and Paul Pellisson, whose Memory is still recent. Her Father and Grandfather were Judges in the Parliament of Toulouse, and in the Court of the Edict of Castres. Raymond Pellisson her Great Grandfather, after having been Master of the Requests, and Ambassador to Portugal, was at last first President of the Senate of Chamberi, and Commandant in Savoy, whilst in possession of the French. I say nothing of a very extraordinary affair that befell him, and on which several Authors (6) have enlarged, nor of his Descendants above-named, because I should only copy what is to be found in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary printed at Amsterdam in 1716. This Family, from whence have sprung several illustrious Persons (7), is originally English (8), and comes from an Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales when in Guienne.

I proceed now to Mr. DE RAPIN, who is properly the Subject of my Letter. PAUL DE RAPIN, Sieur de Thoyras, younger Son of Jamés, was born at Castres, March 25, 1661. He began to study Latin under a Tutor, his Father kept in the House, after which he was sent to Puy-laurent, and from thence to Saumur. At this last place, when about seventeen, he had a quarrel with a Friend, upon a slight occasion, and they immediately challenged each other. But whether they lost time in fetching their Swords, for being Students they seldom wore any, or the Duel held long, Night came whilst they were engaged, and then, Mr. DE RAPIN's Sword broke near the hilt without his perceiving it. His Adversary immediately seeing it, generously told him. Whereupon the Combat ceased, and embracing each other, they returned together to Town. Some time after he had another quarrel with a person much older than himself, who rudely jostled him as he was walking through a narrow and difficult passage. Mr. DE RAPIN fell upon him, but they were quickly parted by the People there present. He ran for his Sword, and speedily returning, found the Person gone, neither could he meet with him, though he carefully sought him several days. Some time after, he heard the Man was gone to Paris, where Mr. DE RAPIN followed him. He was no sooner arrived, but he was seized by a Guard of the Marshals of France. This accident, which he did not expect, believing his design very secret, because he had not imparted it, was occasioned by the advice his Uncle Pellisson received from Samur, from whence he was informed of the supposed cause of his Nephew's journey, which might be of ill consequence, and withal, of the place where his antagonist might be heard of. Mr. Pellisson fearing a Duel would ensue, which, however it ended, would ruin his Nephew, acquainted the Marshals of France with the matter. Mr. DE RAPIN, who was yet very young, affording them opportunity to secure him, by going directly to his Uncle's. The Marshals having heard both Parties, condemned the aggressor to lie in Prison at Fort-l'Evêque, till Mr. DE RAPIN should consent to his discharge, which he did about a month after, at the desire of the Prince of Furberg Bishop of Strasbourg, who was then at Paris. Mean while, the next day after the sentence, the Prisoner's Brother, who was reckoned a good Sword's-man, meeting Mr. DE RAPIN in the Street, accosted him, and, talking to him so as to renew the quarrel, Mr. DE RAPIN answered him by drawing his Sword, and wounded him before they were parted. But this rencounter was kept secret by the advice of the Friends of both Parties, for fear of incensing the Marshals.

The beginning of the year 1679, Mr. DE RAPIN returned to his Father's, in order to apply himself closely to the study of the Law. But before he had made any progress, he was obliged, with many other young Gentlemen, to commence Advocate, upon notice of an Edict which was published soon after, that a Doctor's Degree should not be given to any person, who had not studied five years in some University.

This same year, the Courts of the Edict were suppressed, by which Mr. DE RAPIN's Family were forced to remove to Toulouse. Not long after, Mr. DE RAPIN perceiving the ill state of the Reformed, and that, probably, it would daily grow worse, desired his Father's consent to quit the Profession of Advocate for That of Arms. His Father, without absolutely denying his request, returned such an answer, as only tended to gain time. Not that the Request seemed to him unreasonable and ill-grounded: but he was apprehensive this new way of life, where ambition is more fired than in any other, would expose his Son to great temptation, when he should find by daily experience, that it would not be possible to rise to any tolerable Post, so long as he adhered to his Religion; whereas that obstacle being removed, he might hope to be advanced like the rest. This state of Uncertainty made him very remiss in the study of the Law. He pleaded however one cause as Advocate, but stopped there, and applied himself more closely than ever, to the reading of good Authors, to the Mathematics and Music, in which he acquired great skill.

(1) This Execution of Rapin made a great Noise, and the Prince very justly complained of it to the King and Queen. Their Majesties also expressed great Repentment against the Parliament of Toulouse, in their Letters to them on that occasion. Annales de Toulouse, 1668. It is left to the Reader to judge whether any thing like this would have happened for a private concern.

In the year 1685 his Father died, and two months after, the Edict of Nantz was revoked. Whereupon Mr. DE RAPIN retired into the Country with his Mother and Brothers. But as the persecution, shortly after, was at the height, he departed with his youngest Brother and arrived in England, in March 1686.

Not long after, there came to London a French Abbé of Quality, and Friend of Mr. Pellisson, who made Mr. DE RAPIN frequent visits, and introduced him to Mr. de Barillon the French Ambassador, from whom Mr. DE RAPIN received great civilities. These Gentlemen would have persuaded him to wait upon the King, assuring him of a gracious reception. Mr. DE RAPIN, who could not see what pretensions he had to such an honour, and besides, was apprehensive that a Proposal seemingly so advantageous might tend to his prejudice, excused himself in the handsomest manner he could. This affair put him upon seriously reflecting on his present situation, continually teased about his Religion, by the Marquis of Siffac and other French Catholics then at London, but especially by the Abbé, who, though extremely courteous and civil, always turned their Conversation to Controversy. Perceiving therefore it was not possible for him to defend himself unprepared, against a Man who was master of these Subjects, and managed them with great art, he returned into the Country, from whence he was come to visit the Abbé, without taking leave. He knew himself guilty of ill manners, but chose to be so, rather than remain any longer exposed.

As he had then no expectations in England, he made but a short stay, and going over to Holland, where he had relations, he lifted himself in a Company of French Volunteers at Utrecht, commanded by Mr. de Rapin his Cousin German.

The same year, Mr. Pellisson published his Reflections on Religious Differences, and sent them to Mr. DE RAPIN, charging him to tell him his opinion, which he did very largely, as he said himself, retorting, in several places, Mr. Pellisson's expressions. But nothing of this appears among his Papers. Not that I think it either lost or mislaid, but rather believe that out of modesty he never took a Copy, imagining that what he could say on such a Subject was not worth preserving.

He was still in the Company of Volunteers when they went into England with the Prince of Orange. But in 1689, the Lord Kingsland made him Ensign in his own Regiment, with which he passed into Ireland. At the Siege of Carrickfergus, just after his arrival, he had the good fortune to gain the esteem of the Officers of the Regiment, and especially of Lieutenant Colonel Fielding, who, in less than a year, procured him a Lieutenancy.

In the beginning of 1690, the Regiment to which Mr. DE RAPIN belonged, was given to Lieutenant General Douglas, who, upon the recommendation of three French Colonels of the Army, took more notice of him than of the rest of the Subalterns, and afterwards put a very great confidence in him.

After the battle of the Boyle, in which Mr. DE RAPIN was present, General Douglas was detached with his own, and twelve other Regiments of Horse and Foot, to make a diversion about Athlone, and, if possible, surprize the Town. He appointed Mr. DE RAPIN and Mr. Carles, now Lieutenant General in Portugal, to act as Quarter-master General of his little Army. This Siege not proving successful, the Town being strongly garrisoned, General Douglas was recalled. Mr. DE RAPIN, who was sent before to receive orders, found the King at the head of a Line, who stopping him, asked several Questions, to which Mr. DE RAPIN made such answers, as served to remove some ill impressions infused into his Majesty concerning Douglas's Conduct.

At the assault of Limerick, he was shot in the Shoulder, and next day the Siege being raised, was forced to ride four miles on Horseback in great anguish. He was left with the rest of the wounded, (among whom was his Brother, who was shot through the Body) and so lost his Regiment, which was ordered to the North. But shortly after, he heard General Douglas had procured him a Company, and caused him to be admitted, though absent. It was the same Company where he had been Ensign, and where was still the same Lieutenant which made Mr. DE RAPIN extremely uneasy.

The next year, General Douglas had orders to go to Flanders. Mr. DE RAPIN, whom he designed for his Aid de Camp, not being in a condition to attend him, by reason of his wound, advised him to take another, to whom the General soon gave a Company in the Scotch Guards, of which he was now Colonel. The Campaign opened in Ireland with the taking of Baltimore, where Mr. DE RAPIN had the satisfaction to be servicable to a poor distressed captive Family, with whom he was acquainted the foregoing year. He was afterwards at the Siege of Athlone, and in the assault, made through the River that runs under the strongest Rampart of the Town, a bold and brave action, and which succeeded, as it is thought, contrary to the expectation of the Generals. In this Town were left two Regiments of different Nations, commanded by the Lieutenant Colonels, who understood not each other's Language, and were both very jealous of their Power, which might have occasioned disputes. Happily, Mr. DE RAPIN belonged to one, and his intimate Friend, a Captain of good sense, to the other, who were both equally esteemed by their respective Commanders; so whenever any accident happened that was like to breed a quarrel, these two Officers, who were unprejudiced, agreed between them upon what was to be done, and advised it each with constant success.

After that, Mr. DE RAPIN was sent successively to several Garrisons, and among the rest to Kilkenny, where he frequently waited on the Bishop, who seemed pleased with his Conversation. This commerce would have been very agreeable, could he have peaceably enjoyed it, but the warm and daily contests between the Mayor and the Officers, scarce allowed him a moment's repose. He often used his endeavours to stifle them, and prevented their proceeding to extremities. Mean while, his fear that things would be brought to a desperate pass, made him gladly embrace the opportunity of commanding two Companies in another place. Some time after, he rejoined his Regiment at Kingsale, where he contracted an intimate Friendship with Sir Jamés Waller who commanded there.

About the end of the year 1693, he received an order to repair to England, without any reason assigned; but at the same time, a Letter from Mr. Bekesford informed him, he was to be Governor to the Earl of Portland's Son. He could not conceive whence this proceeded, having never had any such thoughts; and it was some time before he knew, he was recommended by the Lord Galloway. He came therefore to London and entered upon his Office. Here was an end of all his hopes of rising in the Army, to such Posts as several younger Officers of his acquaintance have obtained. All the amends he received, was leave to resign his Company to his Brother, who died in 1719, Lieutenant-Colonel in a Regiment of English Dragoons. It is true, some time after, the King granted him a Pension of a hundred Pounds a year, till he should better provide for him, which never happened. So he enjoyed his Pension several years, but upon that Prince's death; it ceased, and a Place was given him, which brought him in but a moderate income.

His new Employment obliged him to be sometimes in Holland, often in England, and also in France, whilst the Earl of Portland was Ambassador, till the young Lord was fixed at the Hague, where he learned his Exercises. Whilst he was there, in the year 1699, Mr. DE RAPIN married Marianne Tysert, an advantageous match, of whom I shall say nothing, as she is living. This did not hinder him however from minding his Pupil, and attending him in his Travels. He began then with Germany, where they made some stay at several Courts, and particularly at Vienna. From thence they passed into Italy, by way of Tyrol, where they saw Marshal Villeroi a Prisoner, who gave Mr. DE RAPIN a Letter for Cardinal d'Estres then at Venice.

At his return, his employment ceasing, he repaired to his Family, who in his absence lived at the Hague, where he spent some years. During that time, he improved his leisure Hours, as far as the common duties of Life would allow, in resuming the study of Fortification, and especially of History, which led him to draw many general and particular Genealogical and Chronological Tables. But what was most agreeable to him, and, as he thought, most instructive, was his being Member of a Society of Club still in being, to the erecting of which he was proud of contributing, where several Persons of Learning and Merit reasoned upon such Subjects as occurred, and spoke their opinion on such questions as were usually proposed. Mean while, as he found his Family increase, he resolved to retire to the good of his Children the pleasures of the Hague, by retiring to a cheaper Country. Accordingly, he removed in 1700 to Wesel in the Duchy of Cleves. He found there a good number of French Refugees, among whom were several Officers, Men of Quality, with whom he lived very friendly; and he was also received as kindly as could be expected, by Persons of the highest rank, who were chiefly concerned in the Government of the Country, and who, on all occasions, gave him marks of their favour.

Merit

The way of living at Wesel, different in many respects from that of the Hague, rendered him more than ever master of his time, and allowed him almost as much leisure as he could desire, to study the History of England, and the nature of the Government. This was a more extensive design than perhaps it seems at first, for it obliged him, not only to peruse all the English Historians, but also those of other Nations, who had any affairs with the English, in order to procure light, and be assured of the truth of the facts, by confronting the several Authors. He would have found it very difficult to succeed, or rather would, probably, have miscarried, had he not before qualified himself for readings, in their original Tongue, all the Books he was obliged to consult. Besides Greek and Latin, which he learnt at the College, and had since improved, he understood Italian and Spanish, not to mention High and Low Dutch, of which indeed he was not so much master as for English, which was the most necessary of all, he had made that his particular Study.

Though he was of a very strong constitution, yet a seventeen years constant application to compose his History, entirely ruined his health. About three years before his death, he found himself quite spent, and frequently seized with violent pains in his Stomach. He might have recovered if he would have relinquished his Work, and unbent his mind for a time. Of this he was sensible, but could not resolve it, as he ought. All he indulged himself in, was, not to rise before six a-Clock, after which it was impossible for him to sleep or lie in his bed. As to his diversions, of which walking was the most usual, he was quickly tired of them, and, if his indisposition permitted, returned to his Work, which was the cause of his illness, and properly his sole delight. At last, a violent Fever, attended with an oppression upon his Lungs, carried him off the seventh day, being the 16th of May 1725.

He has left one Son and six Daughters.

From what has been said, it appears that Mr. DE RAPIN was naturally grave. This led him, whilst he was in the service, to seek the conversation of the Serious, which prejudiced not only several of his Comrades, but even some of his Superiors, against him, who would have had him partake of all their diversions. But, on the other hand, it gained him the Esteem and Friendship of many Persons of Merit, who were in considerable Posts. We are not however to imagine, he was an enemy to Mirth: he could be merry on occasion, though not so frequently, nor so immoderately as many are. Nay, he wrote several little things in Prose and Verse, with humour and gaiety: but as they were on light or ludicrous Subjects, and designed only for a present amusement with his Friends, he never thought them worth revising, and I question whether there is one to be found among his Papers. What has been said of his application to his Study and Works, is also to be understood with this limitation, that it never hindered him from embracing all opportunities to serve his Friends, and reconcile their differences.

Thus have I done what lies in my power, to make known Mr. DE RAPIN's Character. I am sensible, that to have a complete Idea of him, we must, besides what I have said, consider him in his Writings, but this is what I shall not undertake. It belongs to the Publick to declare what opinion he there gives of himself, and to determine whether he shows good Sense and Judgment in his manner of discovering the motives of Actions; and above all, whether he has justly observed an entire Impartiality, so essential to a good History.

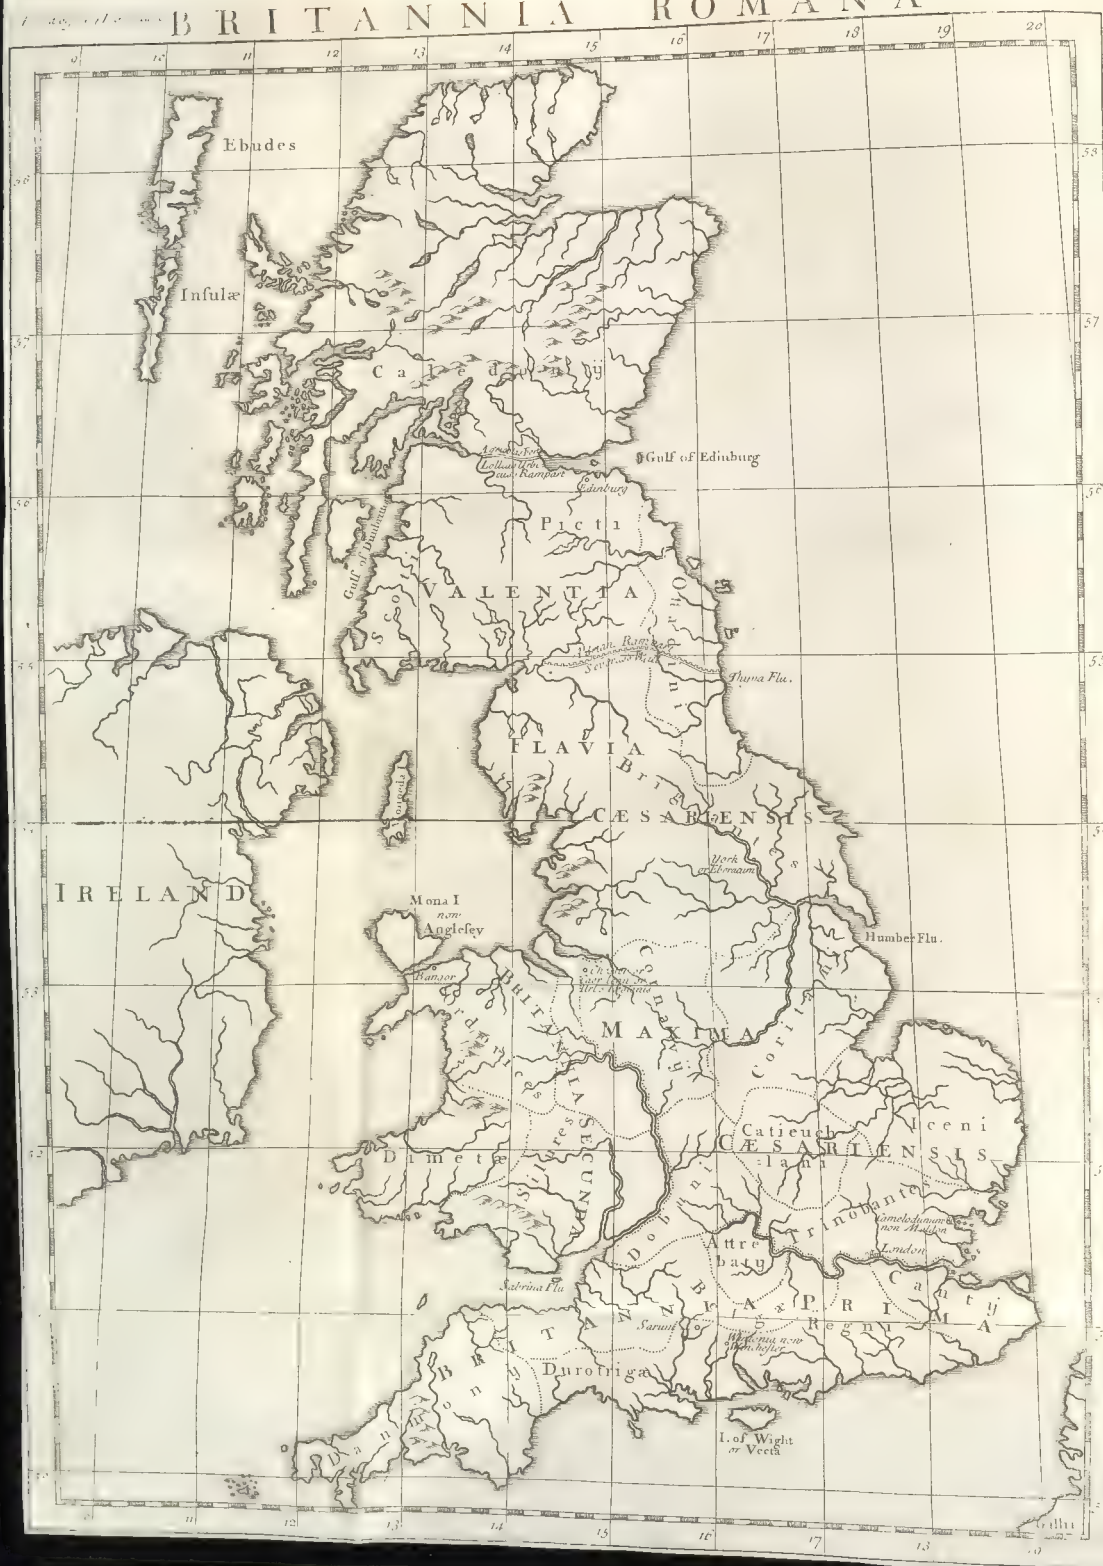

This is all I have to say to you concerning Mr. DE RAPIN. I wish it may be satisfactory, and am,

BRITANNIA ROMANA

INTRODUCTION

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

CONTAINING

The Extent of Great-Britain or Albion. Whence so called. The First Inhabitants, Customs, and Manners of the Britons. Their Way of Fighting, and Commerce. Their Religion. The Druids. Their Government. Original of the Irish, Scots, and Picts.

REAT-BRITAIN is, without contradiction, the largest, finest, and most considerable Island in Europe: Nay, one might venture to affirm, she holds the first Rank among all the Isles of the known World; and it would be, perhaps, no difficult task to prove, she justly deserves this Preference. But not to enter into so needless a Discussion, it suffices to say, very few can be compared to her for Temperateness of Air, Number of Inhabitants, and all the Necessaries as well as Comforts of Life. If she wants any thing of foreign growth, her Wants are easily and plentifully supplied by her Commerce which brings home to her whatever is rare and excellent in all Parts of the World.

I shall not undertake to display here all that may be said to the Advantage of this Island, or repeat all the Encomiums bestowed on her, as well by the Antients as Moderns. The present flourishing state of Great-Britain sufficiently speaks for her. Her Fleets, by which the reigns Sovereign of the British Seas (1); her Troops, whose Valour makes them every where dreaded; her illustrious Generals, who have earned the Terror of her Arms to the utmost Bounds of Europe, exalt her much Higher than all I can say in her Praise. Besides, every one knows, this truly fortunate Isle, by her Riches and the excellent Constitution of her Government long since established, enjoys a Happiness unknown to the rest of the World.

I don't question but the Figure England has made for some time, inspires many Persons with a curiosity to learn by what Steps she is arrived to that Height of Grandeur and Power, which renders her so formidable to her Neighbours. It was this Imagination that led me to publish the present History in French, for the Benefit of those who not understanding the English Tongue, cannot satisfy their curiosity by reading the Histories writ in the language of the Country. I am apt to believe this Work must needs meet with a favourable Reception, if the History itself does not suffer by the Historian's defects. But,

As Great-Britain has all along been divided into two Parts, namely, England and Scotland, I must warn the Reader, that my design is only to write the History of England in particular. Though the Neighbourhood of these two States has been productive of several Events common to Both, their Histories are nevertheless distinct from each other. And therefore, I see no sufficient reason to induce me to imitate sundry Historians who have joined them together, on pretence that the two Kingdoms in the last Century were united under one and the same Sovereign. As for the particular History of England, to which I intend to confine myself, I will venture to say, it contains as great Variety, with as many entertaining and remarkable Events, as most Histories hitherto extant. It is true indeed, it has its dry and barren Places, especially in the Beginning, but this is an Imperfection common to it with the Histories of France, Spain, and all the rest of the Kingdoms founded by the northern Nations. As there were but few Men of Letters among the Nations that like a Deluge over-ran the Roman Empire, there were consequently but few Writers who took care to transmit to Posterity, Memorials of their Histories. This History, like most others, may be compared to a River which swells in proportion to its distance from the Fountain Head, and grows immensely great where it falls into the Ocean. But as England is a Part, and That the most considerable of Great-Britain, it will not be improper to prefix to the History of that Kingdom, a general Account of the Island, of the first Inhabitants, their Customs, Manners, Government and Religion.

THE ISLAND of ALBION or BRITAIN was first known to the Romans till the time of their Emperors. Julius Cæsar was properly the first that discovered it to them, by carrying thither the Roman Eagles, and by the Account of his two British Expeditions, the Particulars whereof he

(1) Well may the English be called Lords of the British Seas, since the Royal Navy of England consists of 7 Men of War of 100 Guns, 13 of 90, 16 of 80, 23 of 70, 19 of 60, 47 of 50, (that is, 125 of the Line of Battle) besides 23 of 40, 9 of 30, and 25 of 20: In all 182. See Barclay's Preface to his History.

INTRODUCTION.

That Great-Britain was peopled by the Celtæ or Gauls, descended from Gomer Son of Japhet, is universally acknowledged. Of This the Name Cumri (1), by which the Welsh call themselves fill in their Language, and several other Reasons, will not suffer us to doubt. Besides, the numerous swarms of Gauls that over-ran so great a Part of Europe and Asia, make it credible, they neglected not to send Colonies into Great-Britain which lay so near them.

Commen.
Brit. p. xiv,
dec.

The Affinity, taken notice of by Antiquaries, between the Gauls and Britons with respect to Religion, is a farther Confirmation of this Opinion. It is true indeed, the Belgæ are said by some Writers to settle in the Eastern, the Spaniards in the Western, and the Hibernians or Irish in the Northern Parts of Great-Britain. But this is not inconsistent with the common Opinion. The Belgæ were no other than Gauls, and the Spaniards, as well as the Irish or Scoti, were, according to some Writers, Colonies of the Celtiberians-Gauls that inhabited along the Western Coasts of Spain. But supposing it were not very certain, that these Spaniards were Celtiberians, it can't be denied, that the Southern Part now called England, was peopled by the Gauls. This is the most probable Account of the Origin of the Britons.

Manners and Customs of the Britons.

As for their Manners, Customs, Religion, and Government, though mentioned by Cæsar in his Commentaries, should we confine ourselves to what he has said, our Knowledge would be but very imperfect. A fuller Discovery of these things must be drawn chiefly from the Authors who write after the Romans were become Masters of Britain. As the Britons did not at once, but by degrees, alter their Customs and Manners, what these Authors say of the Britons of those Days, may be presumed to agree in many respects with the antient Inhabitants of the Island.

The Britons were generally tall and well-made, and, like most of the Irish at this Day, yellow-haired. Their Constitution was so good, that, according to Plutarch, they frequently liv'd a hundred and twenty Years. This length of Days was probably owing to their Sobriety and Temperance as much or more than to the Wholeness of the Air. The use of Cloaths was scarce known in the Island. None but the Inhabitants of the Southern Coasts cover'd their Nakedness with the Skins of wild Beasts carelessly thrown over them, not so much to defend themselves against the Cold, as to avoid giving Offence to the Strangers that came to traffick with them. They were wont by way of Ornament to make Incisions in their Bodies in the Shape of Flowers, Trees and Animals, which with the Juice of Wood they painted of a Sky-colour, that never wore out. These Scars are by Tertullian term'd Britannorum Stigmata.

Sollinet

They liv'd in Woods, in Huts cover'd over with Skins, Boughs or Turf. There are People now in the North of Scotland that are said to have no other Houses. I remember also to have seen in Ireland poor People living in a Hutt cover'd only with green Turf, and not above three or four times bigger than their Body. It was told, they liv'd quietly in these Habitations, without stirring abroad unless to provide for their Subsistence, and contented with Milk and Potatoes, gave themselves no farther trouble. This may serve to give us an Idea of the way of living as well among the antient Britons, as, perhaps, among many other Nations. Their usual Food was Milk and Flesh got by Hunting, their Woods and Plains being well stock'd with Game. As for domestick Fowls, Hens and Geese, if they bred any it was for their pleasure, being strictly forbid by their Religion to eat them, as Cæsar expressly observes. Neither did they eat any Fish, though the Rivers and the Sea that surrounded them, were plentifully furnish'd with them. Their Towns or rather Villages were only a confus'd parcel of Huts plac'd at a little distance from each other, without any Order or Distinction of Streets. They generally stood in the Middle of a Wood, the Avenues whereof were defended with flight Ramparts of Earth, or with the Trees that were fell'd to clear the Ground, Notwithstanding this their plain and simple Manner of living, so remote from the Luxury of other Nations, they were as quick of Apprehension as their Neighbours the Gauls, and, if Tacitus may be credited, of greater Penetration. Didorus Siculus does not scruple to prefer their Honesty and Integrity before That of the Romans. One Custom however they had that seem'd detestable to other Nations, though for their part they thought it very innocent: And that was, for ten or a dozen Brothers or Friends to live all together and have their Wives in common. This Custom continued a long time among them, though in other respects they were grown very civiliz'd by their Commerce with the Romans, when Masters of this Island. A British Lady being upbraided one day by Julia, Severus's Empress, with a Custom so contrary to the Practice of other Nations, is said, by an Historian, to return this bold Answer, The Roman Ladies have little Reason to reproach us upon this Account, since we do publicly with the help of our Men no more than what they do privately with the wail of Theirs, Freedmen and Slaves. The Britons, without doubt, differ'd from more civiliz'd Nations in many other Customs (2). But their Country being little frequented by Foreigners, we know but few Particulars about them, especially with regard to the Time betwixt the Arrival of the Romans. We must therefore be satisfied with what we find scattered here and there in Authors, who it may be, for the most part, knew but little of the Matter.

Di. l. lxxvi.

Cæsar gives a great Character of the Valour of the Britons, and their going to Battle with undaunted Bravery. But it is hard to understand his Description of their way of Fighting. He says, they fought for the most part in Chariots, from whence, furiously driving among their Enemies, they flung their Darts: but when they had to deal with the Horle, they left their Chariots to fight on Foot with Advantage. Now this seems very strange. For my part, I own I can't conceive what Advantage they could have to engage the Horses rather on foot than in their Chariots.

Cæsar Com.

As well situated for Trade as the Britons were, we don't find they had any large Vessels, or ventur'd to Sea beyond the Coasts of Gaul. Their chief Commerce was with the Phœnician Merchants (3), who, after the Discovery of the Island, exported every Year great Quantities of Tin, with which they drove a very gainful Trade with distant Nations. But notwithstanding all their Care to conceal the Fountain-Head, the Greeks (4) discovered it at length, and came and traded also to the same Place.

This Commerce being carried on in the furthest Parts of Britain, Foreign Merchants had no Opportunity to know exactly the State of the Island. For which reason we are ignorant at this day, of many Particulars, concerning the Religion and Government of the Britons, that probably would have been transmitted down to us, if other Nations had met with Information. A full account therefore must not be expected of these Matters, hence, as well as in many other Cases, Conjectures only are all we have to go upon. Thus much however is known, that the Britons had in a manner the same Gods with the Gauls. For Instance, Diu and Samos were Deities equally worshipped by both Nations. But the Britons had a very particular Veneration for Andate, Goddess of Victory, to whom they sacrificed their Prisoners of War.

We know moreover the Druids, as well among the Britons as Gauls, had the Care and Direction of all Religious Matters (5). The Name Druid comes from the Word Deru, signifying in the British or Celtic Language, an Oak, like Drus in the Greek (6). For the Mistletoe that grows on the Oak was looked upon by them as a most sacred Thing, and the greatest Blessing from Heaven (7). The Druids were held in such Veneration by the People, that their Authority was almost absolute. No publick Affairs were transacted without their Approbation: not so much as a Malefactor could be put to death without their Consent. Religion not only afforded them a Pretence to

The Druids, now, while Arms are heard no more,
Old Mythesies and bar'rous Rites restore;
A Tribe who singly Religion love,
And haunt the lonely Coverts of the Grove.
To these, and these of all Mankind alone,
The Gods are fore reveal'd, or fore unknown,
If daring Mortals Doms they sing aright,
No Ghosts descend to dwell in dreadful Night:
No parting Souls to grisly Plots go,
Nor seek the dreary Night Shades below:
But forth they fly immortal in their Kind,

And other Bodies in new Worlds they find.
Thus Life for ever runs its endless Race,
And like a Line, Death but divides the Space;
A Stop which can but for a Moment last,
A Point between the Future and the Past.
Thrice happy they beneath their Northern Skies,
Who thus worth Fear, the Fear of Death despise:
Hence they no Care for this frail Being feel,
But rush undaunted on the pointed Steel,
Provoked approaching Fate, and bravely scorn
To spare that Life which must so soon return.

These Groves were Inclosures of Sprung Oak, or, for surrounding their Sacred Places. In which were, 1. Garbidds, or Hillocks where they fate and pronounced their Decrees, and (2) Orations to the People. 3. Carbadds, or Heaps of Stones on which they had a peculiar Mode of Worship. 4. Crowds, or Altars on which they perform'd the Solemnities of Sacrifices, Reveland. p. 69.

concern themselves in the Government, but authorized them, as they pretended, to intermeddle in private Affairs. Under colour that there is hardly any Case but where Religion may be concern'd, they claim'd a Power to exclude from the Sacrifices all such as refused to submit to their Determinations. By that means they became yet formidable, this sort of Excommunication being deemed so infamous, that the Person on whom it was pronounced, was avoided by All. The Christian Clergy in this Point have but too closely imitated the ancient Druids. The Chief of the Druids was a sort of Pontiff or High-Priest, who had Authority over all the rest. This Dignity was Elective: and sometimes when the Candidates were of equal Merit, such Heats and Broils have rag'd among them, that they have fallen to Blows before the Election was over.

The Bards.

The Bards, among both Britons and Gauls, were Priests of an inferior Order to the Druids. Their Business was to celebrate the Praises of their Heroes in Verses and Songs, which they compos'd and sung to their Harps (1). They continued in being a long time. There were some even after the Romans had entirely abandon'd the Island.

The Enabates.

A third sort of Priests, as well in Britain as Gaul, were the Enabates (2), who applied themselves chiefly to the Study of Philology, and the Contemplation of the wonderful Works of Nature, as Marcellinus informs us.

Religion of
and Britons.

In short, as the Britons and Gauls had properly but one and the same Religion, 'tis very probable one of these Nations received it from the other. Caesar was of Opinion, that the Gauls had it from Britain, because, as he observes, these that were desirous to have a thorough Knowledge of this Religion, went thither to study it. But this Argument at most serves only to prove that their religious Mysteries were celebrated with greater Exactness in Britain, it may be by reason of the Revolutions that happened in Gaul, by the Wars raised there by the Romans. Buchanan, not so positive as Caesar, says, it can't certainly be known which of the two Nations received it from the other. 'Tis very likely however, the Gauls when they peopled Britain, brought their Religion with them. Be this as it will, since the British and Gaulish Druids had the same Notions, and there is nothing certain concerning the First, we can form no Idea of their Religion, but by that of the Gauls, which is a little better known to us. This Knowledge however is of no great Extent, the Druids having left nothing in Writing, it being their Custom to teach their Disciples every thing by heart. A Burgundian Author has been at the Pains to collect some of the Druidical Maxims or Rules, of which the most remarkable are these:

of the Druids.

*None must be instructed but in the Sacred Groves.
Mistletoe must be gather'd with reverence, and if possible in the Sixth Moon. It must be cut with a Golden Bill.
Every thing derives its Origin from Heaven.
The Arcana of the Sciences must not be committed to Writing, but to the Memory.*

*Criat Care is to be taken of the Education of Children.
The Powder of Mistletoe makes Women fruitful.
The Disobedient are to be shut out from the Sacrifices.
Souls are immortal.
The Soul after Death goes into other Bodies.
If the World is destroy'd, it will be by Fire or Water.
Upon extraordinary Emergencies, a Man must be sacrificed.
According as the Body falls, or moves after it is fallen, according as the Blood flows, or the Wound opens, future Events are foretold.*

*Prisoners of War are to be slain upon the Altars, or burnt alive inclos'd in Wicker, in honour of the Gods.
All Commerce with Strangers must be prohibited.
He that comes late to the Assembly of the States, ought to be punished with Death.
Children are to be brought up apart from their Parents, till they are fourteen Years of Age.
Money lent in this World will be repaid in the next.
There is another World, and They who kill themselves to accompany their Friends thither, will live with them there.
Letters given to dying Persons, or thrown on the funeral Piles of the Dead, will faithfully be deliver'd in the other World.*

(4) Rowland in his Mona Antiqua imagines the Second Sight (which he seems to believe) call'd Taibh in Scotland, to be a Relick of Druidry, and builds his Conclusion upon this noted Story related by Papias, when a private Soldier in Gallia, on his removing thence, returning with his Hostess, a Druid Woman, she told him he was too generous, but that he needed not be sparing of his Money, for after he should kill a Bear, he should find him, (looking steadfastly in his face) he would be Emperor of Rome. These Words made great Impression upon him, and he was afterwards much delighted in hunting and killing Bears, until (saying when he saw many made Emperors, and his own Fortune not much minding, I kill the Bears but 'tis other that eat the Flesh. However, many years after, one Arius Arus, Father-in-law of the Emperor Numerianus, grasping for the Empire, treacherously slew him, for which Fact being brought by the Soothsayers before Diocletian (then become a prime Commander in the Army) he ask'd his name, and being told he was call'd Aper (i. e. Bear) without further Pause, thrust'd his Sword in his Bowels, saying, Et hæc aperiam cunctis, which done the Soldiers slew him Emperor.

The Moon is a Sovereign Remedy for All things, as its name in Celtic implies.

Let the Disobedient be excommunicated; let him be deprived of the Benefit of the Law; let him be avoided by All, and render'd incapable of any Employ.

All Masters of Families are Kings in their own Houses, they have a Power of Life and Death over their Wives, Children and Slaves.

These Articles may serve to give us a Specimen of the Principles and Religion of the Druids, which flourish'd a long while in Great-Britain as well as in Gaul. It spread as far as Italy, as appears by Augustus's Injunction to the Romans not to celebrate its Mysteries. There were Women, as well as Men, Druids. It was a female Druid of Tuguria (3), that according to Papias foretold to Diocletian, (when a private Soldier in Gallia) that he would be Emperor of Rome (4).

If the Religion of the Britons may be learnt by That of the Gauls, an Idea of their Government may likewise be formed the same way. As both Nations were of Celtic Extraction, they had, very probably, the same Form of Government. In order therefore to know the Nature of the British Government, recourse may be had to what was in use among the Gauls. From the Time of the founding of Rome, the Gauls were divided into several petty States, with a Head or King over each. Some of these being more powerful than the rest, kept their Neighbours in a sort of Dependence, and one of them, upon great and imminent Dangers, was by common Consent chosen chief Commander, whose Power was limited, as well as the Time of his Administration. During his Office, he was consider'd as a Sovereign Magistrate, having Power to put the Laws in Execution, and act as Captain-General of all their Forces. Livy (according to the Custom of the Romans) calls this Magistrate, King. But a modern Author, who believed he understood better the Nature of that Dignity, affirms the Title of King not to be at all proper for the Person invested with it, and therefore calls him only Paramount, or one superior to the rest. However this be, the Britons may be supposed to have had much the same Form of Government, since we find the whole Country between the Tine and the Channel was divided into seventeen petty States, with each its Head, dignified by Authors with the Name of King. When Julius Caesar invaded Britain, the Command of their Army was conferred by the Britons on Cassibellanus, King or Chief of the Trinobantes; and in the Time of Claudius, Caratacus King of the Silures was chosen General. In the Map annex'd, the Names and Situation of these States are laid down. These Nations without doubt, depending on each other no farther than Necessity compell'd them, had frequent Quarrels and Contentions. But we have no certain Knowledge of their Affairs. And therefore the Beginning of their History can be dated no farther back than Caesar's Invasion. From thence to the Time of their being freed from the Dominion of the conquering Romans, the Thread may in some measure be carried on, though several large Gaps occur, which 'tis not possible to fill up, by reason of the Fewness of the Authors that have treated of this Subject. But before I begin, it will be necessary to premise a brief Account of the Picts and Scots, Inhabitants of North-Britain.

If the Britons aspire to a very ancient Original, by calling themselves Descendants of Brutus, Great-Grandson of Aeneas, the Scots ever jealous of the Glory of their Neighbours, resolve not to yield to them even in this imaginary Honour: Nay, they go beyond them, and lay Claim to a much greater, but without a no less fabulous Antiquity. Their Histories are full of their Nation being founded by Gathelus Son of Carpas, King of Athens; or, as some say, Son of Argus, fourth King of Argos, jointly with Seta Daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt. This Fable is dress'd up in the following Manner:

Gathelus being forced to quit his native Country, to avoid the Persecutions of his Enemies, puts to Sea in company with some Friends who would not forsake him. After several Adventures too long to relate, he comes into Egypt thence, and serves under Moses in Pharaoh's Wars with the Ethiopians. At length, upon Moses leaving Egypt, Gathelus

*You too, ye Bards! whom sacred Raptures fire,
To chant your Heroes on your Country's Lyre,
Who consecrate, in your immortal Strain, Brave Patriot-Souls in Righteous Battle-fires,* having

having signaliz'd himself by many brave Actions, succeeds him in the Command of Pharaoh's Army, who gives him his Daughter Seta in marriage. Thirty-nine Years after, Cathelus, terrified by an Oracle foretelling the Destruction of Aegyptus, sails from thence with a great Number of Greeks and Aegyptians who adhere to his Fortune. He makes several Attempts to settle in Africa, but not succeeding, loves about uncertain of his Fate, and at last lands at a Port on the western Coast of Spain, calling the Place Portus Gatheli, from whence came the Name of Portugal. [Here the Author of this Fable forgets that Cathelus spoke Greek and not Latin.] After some stay, Cathelus leaving a Colony here, fleers his Course farther Northward, and settles in a Country, from his own Name call'd Gathelicia, or Gallicia. Some time after, his Son Hibernus embarking with some of his Father's Followers, sails towards the North, and leads a Colony to an Island by him nam'd Hibernia, and afterwards Ireland. As this Island was not then very populous, the Natives gladly receive the New-comers, and mixing with them, soon become one Nation under the general Name of Scots, from Sata Mother of Hibernus.

It would be lost time to refute a Fable that brings its own Confutation along with it. Neither should I have mention'd it, had not Buchanan inferred it in his History of Scotland, and shewn the Absurdities of it to remove the Prejudices of those of his Countrymen who stood up in its defence. This may be call'd the fabulous Origin of the Scots. The Account given for Truth by the Writers that are less prepossess'd in favour of the Antiquity of their Nation, is as follows:

The Island of Iren, called by the Romans Hibernia, and by the English and Scots, Iren-land or Ireland, had been long possess'd by the Scots from Sythia in Europe, when a Colony of Spaniards came with a Design to settle there, much about the time that the Carthaginians became Masters of Spain. The Number of these Foreigners not being very considerable, the Natives, far from being alarmed, willingly admitted them, and assign'd them Lands to cultivate. Buchanan supposes these Spaniards to be descended from a Colony of the Celtiberians that were settled in Spain. The good Reception these met with in Ireland, drew others thither: in time that in the end the Island grew very populous, and the two Nations mixing together became one People under the Name of Scots. In process of time, the Land being over-stock, abundance of Families threw themselves into the Evudes or Hebrides, Islands situated North of Ireland, which being small were likewise in time as well peopled as Ireland itself. The Syths or Scots are said to land in Ireland not long after the Flood, and the Spaniards to arrive there in the Year of the World 3380.

The Hebrides being thus peopled by the Scots, certain strange Ships came and offer'd to land. These Ships were fill'd with Picts, a German Nation inhabiting the Countries now call'd Mecklenburg and Pomerania. They were roving about according to the Custom of the northern Nations, in quest of new Habitations, their Country being too populous to find them a Subsistence (1). They demanded of the Scots some part of their Isles to settle in. The Scots replied, the Soil was so barren, that it was incapable of supplying them all with Necessaries. But withal inform'd them, that a large Island call'd Albion lay not far distant, where the northern Parts being thinly inhabited, they would infallibly find room enough, offering them assistance in case of Opposition. The Picts satisfied with this Discovery, steer'd directly to Albion, and finding but few Inhabitants where they landed, settled without much trouble in the northern Parts.

The Scots, having been long desirous to extend their Habitations into Albion, where they hoped to find greater Plenty than in their Islands, laid hold of this Opportunity to share in the new Settlement (2). The Picts were not displeased to see such Numbers flock over, for besides the Need they stood in of their Assistance against the Attacks of the Natives of Albion, they could not possibly have subsisted long in that Country, if the Scots had not supplied them with Wives to perpetuate their Colony. But this was done upon Condition the Heirs of the Women should have the Preference before those of the Men in the Succession to the Kingdom they were going to establish. This Law, Bede says, was in force in his time. The two Nations, being thus united together in one common Interest, compell'd by degrees the antient Inhabitants of Albion to retire to the Southward, and leave them in possession of all the Country lying North of the Tine. At length, their Numbers being mightily increas'd, they agreed to separate; whether the Difference of their Laws and Customs occasioned frequent Quarrels, or for some other unknown Reasons. The Scots chose the western Part, as nearest Ireland, with the Hebrides, and the Picts took the eastern as opposite to Germany (3). After the Separation, the two Nations began to be distinguished from one another and govern'd each by their own Laws. The Scots that inhabited Albion began to be distinguished from those that remained in Ireland and the adjacent Isles. The former were call'd Albini, and the latter, Irish. Hence comes likewise the Distinction between Great Scotland or Ireland, and Little Scotland or North Britain. The Albin Scots strengthened by continual Supplies from their Brethren the Irish, increas'd to such a degree, that in the end growing much more powerful than the Picts, they utterly destroy'd them. But this happened not till many Ages after their Separation.

It is difficult for Amity and a good Understanding to remain long between two bordering Nations. Jealously and opposite Interests furnish them with too frequent Occasions of Quarrel. The Picts and Scots were no sooner parted, but they began to fall at variance about some trifling Affair. The Contest being inflam'd, they were upon the point of coming to an open rupture by the Intigations of the antient Inhabitants who fomented the Division to the utmost of their Power. These last, whom I shall for the future call Britons, though I know not when that Name was first given them, began to repent of suffering these Foreigners to settle in the Island. Wherefore, at this feigningly favourable an Opportunity, they thought it their Interest to kindle a War which could not fail to be fatal to both Parties, and might even prove equally destructive of Both. As the Britons were in most danger from the Scots by reason of their Neighbourhood to Ireland, they offer'd their Assistance to the Picts to drive the Scots out of the Country, in expectation afterwards to find an opportunity to do the same by those they were now so desirous to side with. The Scots being inform'd of this Alliance, turn'd their Thoughts to Ireland, and applied for Aid to King Fergus, who sent over his Son Fergus. This young Prince finding the Albin Scots in a sort of Anarchy, without a Chief or Head but what they chose upon extraordinary Occasions, and representing to them the Inconveniences attending such a State, they relolv'd to invest him with Sovereign Authority. Fergus therefore was the first King of Scotland properly so call'd, for Great Scotland or Ireland not only had been govern'd by Kings many Ages before, but if the Irish are to be credited, was the most antient Monarchy in the World. Fergus is said to arrive in Scotland in the Year of the World 3627, about the Time Alexander the Great made his Entrance into Babylon. But this Pretension is so strongly contested, it must not be too easily admitted.

Fergus, as soon as he was seated in his Throne, made great Preparations for the War against the Picts, without neglecting however the Means to avoid it. He represented to them by his Ambassadors that the Contest between the two Nations being of little moment, might easily be decided without coming to Blows, would both sides but agree to hearken to reason: That it was to be feared their weakening one another would afford their Neighbours and common Enemies the Britons an opportunity to destroy both Nations, which it was easy to perceive was their Intention. This Remonstrance made such Impression on the Picts, that suddenly altering their first Design, they enter'd into a strict Alliance with the Scots against the Britons. Fergus thus strengthen'd by the Assistance of the Picts, march'd against the Britons, and gave them Battle, in which their King Coilus was slain. After this Defeat, the Britons finding themselves too weak to resist the two northern Nations, sue for Peace. Fergus shortly after, returning to Ireland, was cast away and drowned near the Place where Carrick-Fergus now stands (4).

This is the Account of the Scots Historians concerning the Settlement of the two Nations that inhabited North-Britain. From the Arrival of Fergus to the Roman Invasion, they pretend things remained in much the same State without any considerable Alteration in the Island, or of the Inhabitants. From the Channel to the Tine, the Country was possess'd by the Britons, and divided into seventeen petty States or Kingdoms. From the Tine to the utmost Bounds of the North, the Picts (5) inhabited the Egghern, over against Germany, and the Scots the Western Parts, opposite to Ireland, from which they were parted by a very narrow Channel. The Scots count fifteen Kings from Fergus to Ederus, who reigned in Scotland when Cæsar invaded Britain.

Dispute about the Name of the Scots in Great-Britain.

Though one should think the Scots best knew the Origin of their own Monarchy, yet this Antiquity of Theirs is greatly contested by several famous and learned English Writers. Instead of admitting what the Scots advance, they pretend to demonstrate that the Nation was not settled in Great-Britain till the beginning of the Sixth Century. This Dispute appears at first sight to be of little Consequence, the Scots being able to plead too long a Prescription to apprehend their Right of Possession may be called in question. On the other hand, it does not seem to be of much Benefit to the English to contest with them the Honour of this Antiquity, supposing it to be imaginary. Notwithstanding, as Religion was concerned in the Case, the Dispute was carried on with great Warmth. The Presbyterians among their Objections against Episcopacy advance, that the Church of Scotland was govern'd by Presbyters only, call'd Culdees (1), before there were any Bishops in the Country; whence they would infer that Episcopacy is not of divine Institution. The English Bishops answered this Objection by denying the Fact, affirming, the Church of Scotland was so far from being govern'd by Presbyters, that it was not yet in Being, the Scots not settling in the Island before the Year of our Lord 503. According to the English then, eight hundred Years of the Time the Scots ascribe to their Settlement in Great Britain must be taken away. This Difference is so considerable, that one can hardly think the Scots should be so much mistaken. Is it possible, the forty Kings that are pretended to sit on the Throne of Scotland, from Fergus 1. to Ceran, who reigned in the Year of Christ 501, were imaginary Kings only? On the other side, it is no less difficult to believe that their learned Adversaries would lay so great an Error to their Charge, were they not persuaded they had good Proofs to support their Opinion. As the Generality of my Readers are but little concerned in this Dispute, it is not, I suppose, expected that I should fully relate the Arguments urged on both Sides, they being the Subject of many Volumes. I shall content myself therefore with briefly showing how this Dispute was managed.

Had the Scots been oblig'd to prove directly their Settlement in Great Britain from the Time of Alexander the Great, I am afraid their Arguments would not have been altogether satisfactory to unprejudic'd Judges. But they wisely gave the Dispute another Turn. When a Nation, say they, ascribes any thing to itself in an historical Way, it ought not to be don'd without sufficient Evidence to the contrary. By this means they put their Adversaries upon proving a Negative, which every one knows to be a very difficult Task. However, this is what they have undertaken to do. Their main Argument is drawn from no Writers mentioning the Scots as Inhabitants of Great-Britain till the Sixth Century. They alledge on the contrary several Passages from Latin Authors, wherein you have a List of the Nations that inhabited the northern Parts of the Island, without the least mention of the Scots. But the Scots maintain that this negative Proof destroys not their Pretensions, for their Nation not being subdued by the Romans till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very short Space under their Dominion, it is no wonder they knew so little of it, and consequently gave so imperfect an Account. They add moreover, tho' the Deucalionians, Meatae, Atacanti, are mention'd by Tacitus and other Historians, as inhabiting the northern Parts of Great-Britain, it does not follow that these Nations were not Picts or Scots, just as the Levi, Trinovantes, Silures, were truly Britons, though distinguish'd by particular Names. Among the Adversaries of the Scots in this Dispute, the most considerable are Usher, Lloyd, Stillingfleet, Authors of great Note. In their Defence the principal Writers are Hector Boethius, Buchanan, MacKenzie, all Three very eminent in Scotland.

If the Picts were still in Being, they would have the Like Dispute like Charge to maintain. For the same English Authors affirm, the Picts were no other than Britons, who to avoid the Tyranny of the Romans retir'd into the northern Parts of the Island; where continuing to paint their Bodies with Wood, the Romans gave them the Name of Picts, dies with Wood, after their Submission to distinguish them from those that, after their Submission to the Roman Power, had left off that Custom. This Opinion is not groundless, since it is certain, many Britons, unwilling to submit to the Roman Yoke, retir'd Northward, as the Conquerors advanc'd in the Island. But as the Romans subdued the Seventeen British Nations, not all at once, but by degrees, it may be ask'd why they gave the Name of Picts to Those only that fled beyond the Tine, and not to the other Nations before they were conquer'd, to distinguish them also from such as had submitted. The distinguishing reply, that the Argument allieg'd by the English is more specious than solid, being entirely built upon the Conformity of the Name Picts with the Latin Word Picti: That many Britons, it is true, retir'd among the Inhabitants of the North, but to prove These to be the same People from the other northern Nations, as it is certain the Picts were for several Ages, with Laws and Customs different from Those of the Britons and Scots: That seeing nothing like this can be shown, it is more natural to think these fugitive Britons retiring among the Picts were incorporated with them. This Opinion, to which I confess I am inclin'd, may be farther confirm'd, by considering that the Scots, not being conquer'd till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very little time under the Dominion of the Romans, call'd their Neighbours Pebli. Now if this Name be the same with that of the Picts from the Latin word Picti, how can it be conceiv'd that the northern People, whether Scots or others, should give their Neighbours a Roman Name? But if it be a different Name, it must then be owned, the Picts were not Britons, nor receiv'd their Name from the Custom of painting their Bodies. Buchanan, who takes the Name of the Picts to be Roman, confesses however his Ignorance of the Name they gave themselves. But on the other Hand, he pretends they came from certain Gaulish Colonies settled in Ulster, where they painted their Bodies as well as in Britain. The Picts, continues he, spoke the same Language as the Britons and Scots, since we don't find in History that these three Nations had occasion for Interpreters to trade together. I own this does not seem to me to be a satisfactory Reason, it being very possible these Nations might speak different Languages, and yet Historians make no mention of Interpreters (2). Buchanan however concludes from hence they were originally Celts. Verfagan, an English Author, says the Name of the Picts comes from a Word in their own Language, signifying Warrior. I don't think it necessary to examine any farther the Origin of a Nation that has now been entirely extinct without the least Remains almost Nine Hundred Years.

This is all I could find worth notice concerning the Picts and Scots, who are to make so considerable a Figure in the following History. It is time now to return to the Britons, and show in what manner they were subdued by the Romans.

(1) Buffy I call'd (as they were call'd K. B. di, or in old Scotch, Kyldi, from Cyld, a Cell, and Tec or De a House, that is, a House of Cells. But afterwards when it was found that some of these words of which Men did not know the Original Kyldi or Kyldi came to be call'd Culdees or Culdi, that is, House of God. Either way it appears they were Monks. Now the first Monks among the Scots were St. Martin's Disciples, who died in 401. Consequently the Culdees were not of so ancient a Date as is pretended by the Scots Historians. They are not ment on only by B. de or N. de.

(2) B. de says in his time God was serv'd in five several Languages in Britain, were y, Anglus, Britum, Saturnis, Pictum, & Lutrum, &c. c. 1. Huntingd. p. 299.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK I.

From the first Invasion of Britain by the Romans under JULIUS CÆSAR, to the Calling in of the SAXONS. Containing the Space of about Five Hundred Years.

HE Romans were become Masters of almost all Europe, of the best Part of Africa, and of the richest Countries of Asia, before they undertook the Conquest of Great-Britain. While so many Kingdoms were by these Conquerors continually added to their Empire, Great-Britain preserv'd her Liberty: but it was owing rather to her Situation than Strength. She was consider'd as a separate World by herself, to which the Inhabitants of the Continent seem'd to have no Pretensions, or at least, knew nothing there capable of exciting their Desires. Besides, the Wars with the Gauls kept the Romans so long employ'd, that they had not leisure or opportunity to think of the Britons. Julius Cæsar was the first that form'd the Project of that Conquest, during his Government of Gaul, where he caus'd the Roman Arms to triumph. His frequent Victories over the Gauls had extremely increas'd his Fame, and procur'd great Advantages to the Commonwealth. But he was not himself satisfied with the Reputation he had lately acquir'd in Gaul. His Thirst of Glory and Desire of enlarging the Bounds of the Empire, inspir'd him with the Design to extend his Conquests, and bring the Britons under the Dominion of the Romans. Some accuse him of being influenc'd by a more ignoble Motive, and of aiming in this Enterprize at the enriching himself with the Spoils he hoped to find in the Island (1). But this Imputation cannot be said to be well-grounded. However this be, Great-Britain, tho' little known in those days, had charms sufficient to raise the Ambition of that renowned Warrior. His Pretence for invading the Britons was their assisting the Enemies of the Commonwealth: a Pretence frequently us'd by the Romans to carry their Conquests into the most remote Countries. Upon this Ground, he made two Expeditions into the Island, the Particulars whereof are thus related in his Commentaries.

Cæsar, tho' he had spent part of the Summer in making an Irruption into Germany, resolv'd to employ the rest in the Execution of his Design upon Britain. He was very sensible however, the Season was too far advanc'd to expect to make any great Progress. Nevertheless, he consider'd it would be no small advantage if he could take a View of the Island, almost wholly unknown to all but the Merchants that traded on the Coasts. And these Merchants themselves were so little acquainted with what Cæsar wanted to know, that sending for some of them, he could learn neither the Extent of the Island, nor whether it was well-peopled or not. Much less could they give him any Information concerning the Ports and Havens, and whether there were any fit to receive Ships of Burthen. This Uncertainty made him resolve to send Volusenus to view the Coasts as far as was possible without danger, whilst his Troops were marching to the Place of Imbarcation (2).

The Britons, receiving Intelligence by the Merchants of Cæsar's Design, endeavour to divert him from his purpose, by sending Ambassadors with Offers of Obedience to the Romans, and the Delivery of Hostages. Cæsar gives the Ambassadors a very civil Reception, but exhorting them to persist in their Resolution, dismisses them without Answer, or at least without telling them positively what he intended to do. With them however he sends Comius (whom he had a few days before made King of the Atrebatæ) (3) with Instructions to persuade the Britons to make an Alliance with the Romans, and acquaint them with his Design to come over into their Island. They were by no means pleas'd with the News, for they expected what they had done would have induc'd the Roman General to alter his Resolution. So, whether Comius spoke to them too haughtily, or they had a mind to let the Romans see they did not fear them, they committed the Ambassador to Prison, loading him with Irons.

Mean while Volusenus having coasted along the southern Part of the Island without landing, returns and gives an Account of the Discoveries he had made. Whereupon, every thing being ready to begin the Expedition, Cæsar embark'd two Legions on board eighty Transports, leaving orders for the Horfe to follow with all speed in eighteen orders that could not yet join the Fleet, and were expected every moment: but his Orders were not timely enough executed. At his Arrival on the Coast of Britain, he sees the Hills and Cliffs that ran out into the Sea, cover'd with Troops that could easily with their Darts prevent his landing (1). Upon which he determines to look out for some other place, where he may land his Army with less danger. However, he lies by till three in the Afternoon (2), expecting some Ships that were not yet come up. Upon their joining the Fleet, he makes a Signal for the principal Officers, and giving them his last Instructions concerning their landings, makes sail and comes to an Anchor about two Leagues farther, near a plain and open Shore (3). The Britons perceiving his Intent, fend their Chariots and Horfe that way, whilst the rest of their Army advance to support them. The main difficulty in landing proceeded from the Largeness of the Vessels which hinder'd them from coming near enough to the Shore; so that the Roman Soldiers saw themselves under a Necessity of leaping into the Sea arm'd as they were, in order to attack their Enemies who stood ready to receive them on dry Ground. Cæsar perceiving his Soldiers did not exert their usual Bravery on this occasion, orders some Gallies to get as near the Shore as possible, and set upon the Enemy in the Flank. This Precaution had the desired Effect. For the Slings, Engines, and Arrows were so well employ'd from these Gallies, that the Courage of the Britons began to abate. But the Romans still demurr'd upon throwing themselves into the Water, and it may be would hardly have done it at all, had not the Standard-Bearer of the Tenth Legion shewn them the way, by leaping in first with his Colours in his Hand, crying out aloud, Fellow me, Fellow-Soldiers, unless you will betray the Roman Eagle into the Hands of the Enemy. For my part I am resolv'd to discharge my Duty to Cæsar and the Commonwealth. Upon these words, he leaps into the Sea and advances with his Eagle towards the Barbarians. Emulation and Shame causing the Soldiers to forget the Danger, they courageously follow him and begin the Fight. But their Resolution was not able to compel the Britons to give ground: Nay, it was to be fear'd that the Romans constrain'd thus to fight in the Water without keeping their Ranks, would in the End have been repuls'd, had not Cæsar caus'd some armed Boats to ply about with Recruits, which made the Enemy fall back a little. The Romans improving this Advantage advance with all possible Expedition, and getting firm footing, press the Britons to vigorously, and getting them put them to rout. They durst not however pursue them, because the Horfe were not yet come. Which Cæsar says, was the only thing that hinder'd the Victory from being compleat (4).

The Britons, astonish'd at the Roman Valour, and fearing a more obstinate Resistance would but expose them to greater Mischief, set Comius at liberty and fend him back to Cæsar, throwing the Blame of his ill Treatment on the Fury of the Populace. At the same time Ambassadors are dispatch'd to sue for Peace and offer Hostages. Cæsar very readily pardons them, on condition they fend him a certain Number of Hostages. Part of them were immediately deliver'd with a Promise of fending the rest.

Peace being thus concluded four Days after landing, the British Troops were dismiss'd, and some of their chief Men came to Cæsar to manage the Concerns of their Nation. Mean while, the Ships that were transporting the Roman Horfe putting to Sea meet with a violent Storm, which forces them back again into the Ports of Gaul. The same Storm falls likewise upon Cæsar's Fleet lying in the Road, some whereof are dash'd in pieces, others lose their Anchors, Cables and Rigging. And what added to the Misfortune, the same night the Tide of Flood rose so high, (as is usual at the full of the Moon, a thing then unknown to the Romans) that the Gallies, having been drawn ashore were fill'd with Water. This Accident threw the Romans into great Consternation, for they had not brought with them wherewithal to repair their shattered Vessels, nor any quantity of Provisions, Cæsar having all along intended to winter in Gaul.

The Britons that were with Cæsar soon perceiv'd his want of Provisions, Ships and Cavalry. Besides, it was easy to guess, by the small extent of their Camp, that the Number of the Romans was not considerable. Having made these Observations, they steal away by degrees, and represent to their Countrymen, "what a favourable Opportunity offer'd to free themselves from Servitude: How the Romans were few in Number, without Provisions and Horfe: How they had just lost their Ships, and with them all hopes of retiring." Upon this the Britons resolve to use all possible means to cut off the Romans Provisions, and amuse them till Winter come on. Cæsar guessing their Intentions by what had happen'd to him, took all imaginable Care to lay in as great a Stock of Provisions as he could, and put them under a strong Guard within the Camp. Then sending to Gaul for part of what he had occasion for to refit his Fleet, he made use of the Timber and Iron of the broken Vessels to repair the rest. The Soldiers labour'd with so uncommon a Diligence, (as their safety was at stake) that in a few days the Fleet was in condition to sail, twelve ships only having been lost.

Mean while, the seventh Legion being sent out to forage, News was brought to Cæsar, that a Cloud of Dust was seen to rise from that quarter. He suspected immediately what was the Matter; and taking with him two Cohorts (5) that guarded the Camp, ordered the rest of the Forces to follow with all Expedition. When he came to the Place, he found the Legion surrounded by the Enemy, and overpowered with Numbers. As the Harvest was brought in every where else, the Britons did not question but the Romans would come and forage there, so lay in a Readiness to fall upon them. It was very easy to put Soldiers in disorder that had quitted their Arms, and were dispers'd up and down to gather the Corn. They kill'd some at the first Onset; and to prevent the rest from escaping, began to surround them with their Chariots. Cæsar came very seasonably to the Relief of the Legions, and sav'd them from being all taken or slain. Having brought them off, he stood some time in order of Battle in sight of the Enemy, but at length retreated to his Camp, not deeming it proper to engage, unless compell'd to it.

The Britons, flush'd with this Success, drew together a greater Body of Troops, with a Resolution to attack the Roman Camp. Tho' Cæsar had but thirty (6) Horfe in all, he drew up his Men, that the Enemy might not think he was afraid of them. They attack'd him as he foresaw. But instead of forcing the Camp, they were vigorously repuls'd and pursu'd for several Miles. The Britons were so dishearten'd at their Loss, that they sent the same Day Ambassadors to Cæsar to sue for Peace. The Posture of Cæsar's Affairs would not suffer him to improve his Victory, because he had no Horfe to oppose to those of the Enemy. This Consideration induc'd him to conclude a Treaty with them, whereby they were bound to deliver a greater Number of Hostages, and fend them to Gaul, where he intended to go as soon as possible. Tho' the Passage was not long, the Fear of exposing his Fleet to another Storm, if he stay'd till the Equinox, made him hasten his Hostages, he puts his Troops into winter Quarters, and forms the Design of a more important Expedition in the following Spring. Mean while, the Senate being inform'd of Cæsar's Exploits in Britain, a Procession of twenty Days is decreed to him, though the Advantages

(1) This agrees exactly with the Cliffs of Dover towards the South-foreland, that all Men of Judgment believe this to be the Place.

(2) Rapin by mistake says Four. See Cæsar's Comment.

(3) Such is the Shore at the Mouth of the River that goes up to Richborough, call'd in Latin, Rutupie, Rutupæ, or Portus Rutupensis. Dr. Gale calls it Rutupæ, which suits best with the modern Name.

— Rutupinsque littora ferent,
Unda Caledonis salit turbata Britanno. Lucan, lib. vi.

Richborough or Portus Rutupensis is plac'd in the 2d Itin of Antonine's Itinerary at twelve Miles distance from Durovernum or Canterbury. Twelve Roman miles about nine compass Miles.

(4) The Time of Cæsar's landing in Britain is thus known. His first Expedition was, as he says himself, in the Consulate of Pompey and Cæsar, that is, according to Dr. Halley, in the Year of Rome 699. But Augustus died in the Year 767, that is, Sixty-eight Years after Cæsar's Death. Upon News of Augustus's Death, there was a Mutiny in the Pannonian Army, which was quench'd by Drusus, by help of an Eclipse of the Moon. Now from this Eclipse it is certain that Augustus died in the 14th Year of Christ, consequently Cæsar's first Decent, which was Sixty-eight Years before, must be in the 55th Year current before the Christian Æra. And as the Year, so may the very Day and Hour when he landed, very probably, be fix'd. For Cæsar Day was at Noon, wherefore it must be the other a little after Midnight of the 30th. Hence it is plain, Cæsar landed four Days before, on the 26th of August, about five in the Afternoon. See Leuthep's Abstrigis, Phil. Trans. Vol. III. p. 412.

(5) It was the Custom of the Romans to place whole Cohorts before the Gates of their Camp. Hence our English Phrases, Court, or Cohort of Men. Brady, p. 8.

(6) Brady computes, after Hutcheon, that 30 is put by mistake for 300, p. 5. The Equinox, which now falls upon the 21st of September, must in Cæsar's Time have been on the 25th of that Month. (This Difference is about twenty-five Days after his landing, and as he says, a little before the Equinox.) So that probably Cæsar left the Island about the 20th of September, he had gain'd were of little Consequence to the Commonwealth (1).

B. C. 54.
Caesar's second Expedition.
Comm. l. v.

He lands without Opposition.

The Britons are overthrown.

The Roman Ships are scattered by a Storm.

Caesar repairs the Fleet, and leaves the Ships within the Camp.

Cassibelanus General of the British Forces, attacks the Romans.

He is repulsed.

Anchor thrown, where the Britons have the Advantage.

Caesar, according to his Custom, went and passed part of the Winter in Italy, leaving Orders with his Officers to repair the old, and build some new Ships. When he had received Advice that his Orders were executed, he came to Portus Itius (2), where he found six Hundred Ships (3), and twenty-eight Gallies, on board of which he put five Legions, and two Thousand Horse. He conducts this numerous Fleet to a Place on the British-Coast, mark'd by him the Summer before, and lands his Forces without Opposition. For the Britons, as he was told afterwards, at the sight of so mighty an Armament, thought fit to retire into the Country behind some Hills. Caesar, according to the Roman Custom, fortifies his Camp, and leaving a Guard, sets out in the Night in quest of the Enemy. Having marched about twelve Miles, he sees them posted on the other side of a River (4) to oppose his Passage. As resolute as they seem'd at first, they could not withstand the furious Charge of the Roman Horse, but were forc'd at length to quit their Post. They retir'd a little farther into a Wood, the Avenues whereof were block'd up with huge Trees laid a-cross one another, and which seem'd to be fortified in some former War. Tho' it appear'd very difficult to force these Intrenchments, the seventh Legion however perform'd that Service, and oblig'd the Britons to betake themselves to flight. But Night coming on, and the Country unknown, Caesar forbids all Pursuit.

Next Day, he divides his Army into three Bodies, which march at some distance from each other in pursuit of the Enemy. During the march, he received the melancholly News that his Fleet was almost entirely destroyed by a violent Storm, most of the Ships being dash'd in pieces or driven ashore. As this Accident might be attended with ill Consequences, he resolv'd to hasten back to the Sea-side. Here he finds forty of his Ships destroyed, and the rest so damag'd that they were hardly repairable. However, Necessity compelling him to go about it without loss of time, he sets all the Carpenters in the Fleet and Army to work, sending for others at the same time from Gaul. To prevent the like Misfortune again, as soon as the Ships are refitted, he employs his Soldiers, Night and Day, to draw them by Strength of Arms into the midst of the Camp. This Work, notwithstanding the difficulty of it, was finished in ten Days (5). Mean while, he writes to Labinus his Lieutenant in Gaul, to build more Ships and send them over when ready. Then leaving a sufficient Force to guard the Camp, he resumes the Design interrupted by the Misfortune befallen his Fleet.

He had not march'd far, before he was inform'd that the Enemies Forces were much increased, under the Conduct of Cassibelanus King of the Trinobantes, whose Kingdom lay beyond the Thames, about eighty Miles from the Sea (6). This Prince had hitherto wag'd continual Wars with his Neighbours; but upon the Romans Approach, they had concluded a Peace with him, and chosen him Commander in Chief. Whilst the Roman Army was on the march, they found themselves attacked on a sudden by the British Horse and Chariots. But this attack, tho' vigorous, was repuls'd with great loss on their Side. Nevertheless, they were not dishearten'd. Some Days after, whilst the Romans were employ'd about their Intrenchments, a Body of their Troops that lay conceal'd in the neighbouring Woods, fell furiously upon those that guard'd the Camp, and put them into great Disorder. Caesar seeing this, immediately sends two Cohorts to their Assistance, who surpris'd at the British manner of fighting, are routed at the first Charge. Quintus Laberius Datus a Tribune was slain in the Action. As this Battle was fought in sight of the Camp, Caesar saw plainly the great Disadvantage the Romans, encumber'd with their heavy Armor, lay under, against swift and light-arm'd Enemies that engag'd in small Parties only, with a Body of Reserve in their Rear, from whence they were continually recruited. The Roman Horse were no less outnumber'd than the Foot. As the Britons frequently counteracted a Retreat, the Horsemen detach'd to pursue them were immediately cut in pieces; so that it was equally dangerous to pursue the Enemy or to retire. The continu'd manner of Caesar's relating this Affair, is a clear Evidence that the Romans were worsted, tho' he does not say it in so many Words. Besides, the Reasons he alleges to excuse his ill Success are very weak; or if they are of any weight, whence is it that he did not meet with the same Difficulties in so many other Actions, wherein he pretends the Britons were routed Horse and Foot?

On the morrow, the Britons posted themselves on some Hills within sight of the Roman Camp. As they appear'd to be but few in Number, 'twas thought they had no Design to engage a second Time. Mean while, Caesar detached, sending out all the Horse to forage, with three Legions to guard them, the Britons fall with great fury upon the Foragers, who were defended by their Guard. The Resistance made by the Legions giving Caesar time to advance with the rest of the Army, a great Battle ensu'd, wherein the Britons were entirely defeated.

After this Victory, Caesar marches towards the Thames with intent to penetrate into Cassibelanus's Dominions. When he comes to the River Side, at a very difficult Ford, he sees the Enemy drawn up on the opposite Bank. Besides their great Numbers, they had fortified that Part of the River with sharp Stakes (7), driven so deep that some of them did not appear above the Water, as Defenders said afterwards. Notwithstanding these Obstacles, Caesar resolves to attack them, and orders the Horse to ride in, and the Foot to follow, the Soldiers being scarce able to hold their Hands above Water to carry their Arms. The attack was made with such Resolution that the Britons at length were forced to quit their Post and leave the Romans a free Passage (8). Cassibelanus finding he could not hinder Caesar's passing the Thames, dismisses his Army, reserving only Four Thousand Chariots with which he harraßes the Romans and endeavours to cut them short of Provisions, by carrying off all the Corn and Cattle that lie in their Rout. The Romans were great Sufferers in this March; for they did not dare to make the least Excursions in search of Provisions, for fear of Salles from the Woods and By-places.

Mean while, the Trinobantes, upon Caesar's approaching their Country, send Deputies to him to sue for Peace, praying him withal to take into his Protection Mandubratius their King, who fled into Gaul upon Cassibelanus's murdering his Father Immanuentius, and depriving him of his Dominions. Caesar promises to send back Mandubratius, if they will supply him with Provisions and deliver forty Hostages, to which they immediately agree. Several other States following the Example of the Trinobantes, Caesar found himself in condition to attack the Capital City of Cassibelanus, where the Country People were retir'd with their Flocks and Herds (9). What the Britons call'd a City was only a Wood fence'd with a Ditch to defend them against the Incursions of their Enemies. Tho' this Intrenchment seem'd very strong, Caesar order'd it to be storm'd so briskly at two different Places, that the Britons not being able to stand the Assault, fled out at one of their

(1) Caesar had no great Cause to boast of this his first Expedition, since, according to Rede, he lost the greater Part of his Ships, with many of his Men, and all his Horse. L. i. c. 2. Orosius says, the Ships that were to bring the Horse were cast away in the Storm. Juv. p. 30. 35. About Three Hundred Soldiers that were in two of the Transports not being able to reach the same Port with the rest, were upon their landing set upon by the Morini, but resolv'd by a Party of Horse sent to their Relief. This Passage of Caesar gives some light into the Number of Men in a Legion. These two Ships are expressly call'd Orearia, or Ships of Burthen. Now if these two held Three Hundred, the whole Eighty design'd for the Transportation of the Foot were of two Legions, would carry Twelve Thousand, and consequently there were about Six Thousand Foot in a Legion. And to compute the Number of Horse belonging to a Legion, we may consider that a Transport, sufficient for a Hundred and Fifty Foot, will carry between Forty and Fifty Horse. Consequently the Eighteen Transports design'd for the Horse had about Eight Hundred on board, and so Four Hundred will belong to each Legion. The Foot then in a Legion seems generally to have been about fifteen times as many as the Horse.

(2) Antiquæ, lxxij and Brady; about Calais, says Herodotus. Reynolds in his Mona Antiqua, p. 24, derives it from Portus-Itius, i. e. the straits, or passing Passage, observing that Caesar only latinized the ancient Gaulish or British Names, leaving us to seek their Etymon not in the Roman but in the British Language. Hay observes, that Caesar calls the Passage the shortest and easiest, being about thirty Miles. Now by an accurate Survey the Distance at Calais from Land's End is twenty-six English Miles, or twenty-eight and a half Roman, which shows how near Caesar came to the Truth.

(3) Reynolds by mistake says Six-score. (4) This River could not be the Thames, that being too distant, but the Stour. So that the Battle very probably was fought on the Banks of the Stour to the North of the Town now call'd Stour or Perthburgh. The strong Place to which the Britons retreated after their Defeat, must have been Dovercastrum, or Castroburg, twelve Miles from the Place of Caesar's landing which was taken (and possibly kept till Caesar's Return) by the seventh Legion. This might afterwards be covered by the Romans into a Station, as they treated several other Towns of the Britons, as Condate, Verulamium, Isurium, and others, the Capital Towns of several States. Hay, p. 16.

(5) Upon the Shore about Deal, Sandwich, and Wolsey, are a long range of heaps of Earth, where Cædmon thinks this Ship-Camp was, which, he says, by the People thereabouts was call'd Romæ-Work.

(6) Reynolds by mistake says twenty, Caesar's Words are, a variæ crederet millia passuum æstivæ. The Borders of Cassibelanus's Territories extended to the Thames in Surry, over-against Oxindunum, which lies eighty Miles from the East Shore of Kent, where Caesar landed. The Trinobantes inhabited Essex with part of Hertfordshire, Perulam being the chief Town of their Kingdom.

(7) These Stakes are just above Waltham in Surry, and the Meadow facing them is call'd Crosey. They are even now to be seen at Low-water, and one of them was pull'd out of the 76. m. last Year, but with great Difficulty: They are of Oak, and they have laid long in the Water, are as hard as Brass, and as black as Jet. At Shepperton they have several Knife-handles made of them. See Cædmon, p. 151. Rede, l. i. c. 2. Juv. p. 34.

(8) Caesar does not mention a Struggle he is said to make use of upon this Occasion. He caus'd an Elephant well-tenced with Iron, with a wooden contrivance to frighten the Britons from the opposite Shore. Jubæus Strateg. l. viii.

(9) This is suppos'd to be Verulamium, or the present St. Albans. It is certain London was not so considerable in Caesar's Time as Verulamium, this last appearing to have been more satiate, and was a Municipium of Colony, when London was not.

Went Cæsar was advancing into the Enemies Country, the Kentishmen inhabiting on the South-Coast over against Gaul, drew their Forces together, with design to cut off the Romans that were left to guard their Ships. As soon as they were ready, they marched under the Conduct of four Kings, namely, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segundus, and furiously attacked the Roman Camp; but after a long and obdurate Fight were repulsed, and King Cingetorix taken Prisoner.

After so frequent Defeats, Cassibelanus, considering that most of his Kingdom was now in Subjection to the Romans, and several neighbouring States had made, or were ready to make their Submission, treats with them likewise, by the Mediation of Comius. He easily obtains a Peace, Cæsar's Resolution to return to Gaul not permitting him to pursue his Conquests in Britain. Besides, he consider'd that the Weather beginning to grow bad, would help Cassibelanus to defend himself the rest of the Campaign, as well as the whole ensuing Winter. By the Conditions of the Treaty, the Britons are annually to pay the Romans a certain Tribute; Cassibelanus is to deliver such a Number of Hostages, and leave Mandubratius in quiet Possession of his Dominions (1). Tho' Cæsar had scarce Ships enough to transport his Army, he chose rather to flow his Men on board what Vessels he had, than run the hazard of being surpriz'd by the Autumnal Equinox. He embark'd them therefore in the best manner he could, and receiving the Hostages, puts to Sea, and safely arrives in Gaul (2).

This is the Account given by that great General of his two Expeditions into Britain. And here we may observe, that tho' out of an affected Modesty, he refrains from all Commendations of himself, yet by the bare Recital of his Actions, he gives himself the highest Praises. For to make a Defect with two Legions only, in an Enemy's Country, in fight of an Army formidable for Number, Bravery, and Way of fighting; to force Enemies intrench'd on the Side of a River, and what is more wonderful, to pass the Thames at a Ford guarded by a numerous Army, fluck full of sharp Stakes, and withal so deep as to take the Soldiers up to their Chins; these, I say, are Actions that sufficiently speak their own Praise and need no amplification. And if Cæsar in penning his own History, is charged with turning every thing to his Advantage, this Imputation seems to be no where more justly cast upon him than in the present Case. Indeed, one can't read the Particulars of his two British Expeditions, without being sensible that something is wanting, and what is pass'd over in silence was not to his Honour. I forbear to insist upon the great difficulty of knowing where the Ford he mentions could be, since in the very place he is thought to pass the Thames, there is no less than six Foot Water. But what I have been saying will appear still more evident, if we consider Cæsar's Design in attacking the Britons, and the Issue thereof. He sails from Gaul with a Resolution to conquer Great-Britain, and reduce the whole Island to a Roman Province. This is what Dion Cassius positively asserts. He every where gets the better of the Britons. He passes the Thames in spite of all Obstacles. Cassibelanus, vanquish'd and routed, disbands his Forces, not believing himself able to stand against him. Cæsar becomes Master of his Capital, and the Britons submit and sue for Peace. With all these Advantages he is contented to impose an easy Tribute on Cassibelanus, and without fortifying any Place, or leaving any Troops in the Island, drops his first Design, satisfied with restoring Mandubratius, as if the War had been undertaken purely for his sake. Does not this show that he was forc'd to be satisfied with so inconsiderable an Advantage? Lucan's Testimony is a further Confirmation of the Matter, who taxes him plainly with turning his Back to the Britons (3). Tho' Lucan was no Friend to him, he would not however have ventur'd to upbraid him with running away, without some Ground. Dion Cassius says, that in a Battle the Britons utterly routed the Roman Infantry, but were afterwards put in Disorder by the Cavalry (4). Horace and Tibullus intimate in several Places of their Works, that in their Days the Britons were not consider'd as a conquer'd Nation (5). All which evidently shows that the Fame acquir'd by Cæsar in these two Expeditions came far short of the Idea he would give of it in his Commentaries. But however this be, most certainly the Common-wealth reap'd no great Benefit by them; which doubtless was the Reason of Britains than put them in Possession of it.

After Cæsar's Death, who had render'd himself Sovereign of that Common-wealth whereof he was born a Subject, the Empire was so torn with Civil Wars that it was not possible for the Romans to think of Britain. So the Tribute was not paid, nor, it may be, demanded for twenty Years. But when, after the Defeat and Death of Mark Antony, Augustus was firmly settled in the Possession of the Empire, he undertakes to compel the Britons to stand to their Agreement with his Predecessor, and to that end advances at the first time, by a Revolt in Pannonia, but is prevented by the Submission of the Britons, who and the second, by the Submission of the Britons, who send Ambassadors to sue for Peace, which he very readily grants. Britain, consider'd then as a wild uncultivated Country, did not seem to him worth the pains of conquering. Besides, he was determined not to enlarge the Bounds of the Empire, wisely considering that a State, like a Ship, cannot be manag'd when too vast and unwieldy. Yet as the Britons earnest to go and subdue them. But hearing of his Design, they find means to appease him. Tenacianus, Successor of Cassibelanus sends the same Emperor rich Presents, following his Example, keeps fair with the Romans. Nay, he orders Money to be coin'd, some Pieces of which are still to be seen in the Cabinets of the Curious, with the five first Letters of his Name, C. u. n. o. b. or C. a. m. the three first of Cassibelanus, his Capital City on one Side, and on the Reverse, a Man fitting and coining Money with these Letters, T. A. S. C. I. A. by which Antiquaries understand that this Money was designed for the payment of the Tribute (7).

Tiberius, Successor of Augustus, neglected Britain as a Country of little Consequence, it being unknown to him. Satisfied with the Respect shewn him by the Britons in sending back some of Germanicus's Soldiers that were shipwreck'd on their Coast, he left them to enjoy their Liberty.

Caligula, his Successor, would not doubtless have turned his Eyes towards Britain, if he had not by a British himself been drawn into the Project of conquering the Island. Adminius, Son of Cassibelanus, incurring his Father's Displeasure, and flying to Rome for Protection, finds means to persuade the Emperor that nothing was more easy than this Conquest. Caligula, whose Folly is well known, imagines, upon what the young Prince tells him, that the Sight of him is sufficient to subdue the Britons. Full of this Notion, he advances in Person to the Coast of Belgick Gaul, where he had ordered his Army to march. But being told, as he was embarking his Men, that the Britons stood ready to receive him on the other Side of the Water, his warlike Ardor cool'd, and he desisted from an Enterprize which began to appear too hazardous. However, as he was led by his Caprice to the most extravagant Actions, he went on board a Galley, ordering the People to row with all speed towards Britain, as if he intended to have alone the Glory of conquering the Island. But presently after, he is seen to return back as fast as he went off. As soon as he lands he harangues his Troops, as if he were going to employ them in some important Expedition. Having ended his Speech, a Charge is sounded just as if the Enemy were in view. Upon which, the whole Army, pursuant to an Order given to the principal Officers, fall to gathering of Cockleshells in their Helms. The Emperor, pleas'd with the Alacrity of his Soldiers on this Occasion, liberally rewards them, and sends Letters to Rome of his Success, wishing the Senate to decree him a Triumph. But being informed the Senate made some Difficulty to comply with his Order, he resolves to put all the Senators to Death. He would doubtless have executed his barbarous Purpose, had he not been depriv'd of the Power with his Life, by a Conspiracy form after form'd against him.

After Julius Cæsar's second Invasion, to which some very improperly give the Name of Conquest, the Britons preserv'd their Liberty above ninety Years, during the

(2) It is conjectur'd that Cæsar's Expedition was in May, and that he return'd to Gaul about the Middle of September. For in a Letter to Cicero from Britain, dated September 1. Cæsar says, He was come to the Strait in order to embark.

Reigns of the four first Emperors; their Subjection to the Romans not commencing till the time of Claudius. The occasion of that Emperor's undertaking the Conquest of Britain, and the cause of the Britons losing their Liberty was this:

22. Claudius, leaves two Sons, Togodunnus and Caracallus, who both succeeded him: that yet when they reign'd jointly or separately, or whether one was superior to the other, is unknown. In their Reign it happens that one Bericus (1), being forc'd to depart the Kingdom for endeavouring to raise a Sedition, flies for Refuge to Claudius the Emperor at Rome. His extreme desire of being reveng'd of the two Kings his Sovereigns, inspiring him with a Design to betray his Country to the Romans, he frequently talks to the Emperor of the Conquest of Britain, as of a Thing very easy to be accomplish'd. By his Description of the Island and Posture of the British Affairs, he intimates to him that he would meet with little or no Opposition. The Emperor giving Credit to what he says, resolves to acquire Fame by an Enterprize seemingly difficult, but, according to the British Lord's Account, very practicable. Having taken this Resolution, he gives the Ambassadors of the two British Kings a very ill Reception, who are sent to demand the Fugitive Bericus, refusing to deliver up one whom he intends to make his chief Instrument in the Execution of his Project. Shortly after, he himself sends to the Britons and demands the Tribute due to the Empire: but finds them not at all ready to give him Satisfaction. Besides that this Tribute was never regularly paid, the haughty Treatment they had just met with in the Persons of their Ambassadors, by no means dispos'd them to pay him any great Deference. They refuse therefore, and very justly, as they think, to pay the Tribute, and moreover prohibit all Commerce with the Romans. As Claudius wanted only a Pretence for the War, he was not sorry they afforded him so plausible a one. Shortly after, his Orders Plautius to begin the Expedition, whilst he prepares to follow when there should be Occasion. Plautius accordingly dra-^{ws} an Army together in Gaul, and advances to the Sea-side. But when the Soldiers came to embark, they refuse to obey him, declaring, They will not make War out of the Camps of the World. The Emperor hearing of this Mutiny, sends Narcissus his Freedman to appease it. Narcissus, tho' a great Favourite with his Master, when he would have harang'd the Troops, could not prevail with them to hear him. The Moment he open'd his Mouth, the Soldiers cried out, Io Saturnalia, alluding to the Custom, during that Feast, of the Slaves taking the Place and Habit of their Masters. However, the Mutiny went no farther. The Soldiers rents. These Soldiers, though few in Number, swimming the River in their Arms, so astonish the Britons that they quit their Post and retire at a greater Distance (2). The Roman General improving this Advantage, sends over a considerable Body of Troops under the Command of Vulpasian, and his Brother Sabinus. These two brave Leaders advancing towards the Enemy, engage them and put them to flight. The Britons however are not discouraged. Next Day, they attack'd a Roman Detachment commanded by Sidius Geta, so vigorously that the Romans were immediately put in Disorder; their Commander himself was engag'd in such a manner amongst the Enemies, that he was thought to be dead or taken. But the Scale was soon turned against the Britons. Geta happily escaping out of their Hands, heads his Troops again and charges the Britons, now tire of Victory, so briskly, that after an obstinate Fight, he compels them at last to take to flight. This Affair was so well manag'd, and Geta acquir'd so great Reputation on this Occasion, that the Honour of a Triumph was granted him by the Senate, tho' he had never been Consul. The vanquish'd Britons retire towards the Mouth of the Thames, and being perfectly acquainted with the fordable Parts of the River, cross'd over with ease, whilst the Romans following them at a Distance, fall into the Bogs and Morasses, from whence they very hardly disentangle themselves. At last, the Germans lighting upon a Ford, and the rest of the Army passing over a Bridge a little higher up, the Britons are surrounded on all Sides, and great Slaughter made of them (3).

Plautius thought it now time to fend to the Emperor to come and reap the Honour of putting an end to the War. Claudius having every thing ready, sets out immediately and embarking at Ofium, arrives in a few Days at Mosfellis. Then purfuing his Journey by Land, he re-embarks at Bologna (4) to go and head his Army on the other Side of the Thames. Whilst the Emperor was on his Way, Plautius had it in his Power to attack the Britons, who deceived by his seeming backwardness, refuted their Courage, fancying it proceeded from his Fear. But Plautius took care not to rob his Master of the Honour of a Victory he thought himfelf fure of. As foon as Claudius arrives he heads his Troops, approaches the Britons, and forcing them to come to a Battle, entirely routs them. After the Victory, he advances to Camelodunum (5), where he meets with little Refiftance and taking his Conquefts, fubdues fome of the neighbouring States. Thefe Successes he is by the Army faluted Imperator feveral times, contrary to the Roman Custom, which allowed no General to be honour'd with that glorious Title above once in the fame War.

If by this Expedition, which was finished in fifteen Days, Claudius acquir'd great Fame, his Moderation was no less honourable and advantageous to him. The various quidd'd Britons, touch'd with a Sense of his Generosity in leaving them the Possession of their Goods, which he might have taken from them, carried their Gratitude so far as to erect a Temple to him, and pay him Divine Honours. After this successful Expedition, the Emperor committing the Government of Britain to Plautius, sets out for Rome, where he safely arrives after a fix Month's Absence only. At his Return, the Senate decreed him the Honour of a Triumph, and the Surname of Britannicus, in Memory of his subduing the Britons. The Publick Rejoicings on this Occasion held several Days, and the Poets display'd in lofty Strains the Greatness and Importance of his Victories. And yet, Suetonius says, he became Mafter of Part of Britain without Battle or Bloodshed (6). But it is more probable, as Dion Cassius affirms, that it cost him a bloody Battle.

Plautius carried on the Conquests begun by the Emperor, being bravely seconded by Vespasian, and his Son Titus, who served under him. Titus then a Tribune only, signalized himself on all Occasions. He had even the good Fortune to save his Father's Life in a Battle. Vespasian, who had a large Command, was often detached by the General on Expeditions of Moment, which gained him great Reputation.

(1) This Bericus perhaps was the same with Admonius Son of Cambelin, mentioned by Suetonius, or one of the Fugitives that accompanied him.

TRAGEDY. Reputation. He fought thirty Battles with the Britons, subdued two powerful Nations, and conquered the life of Wiglaf. As all this was done under King Hasting the Commander in Chief, he acquir'd a great Reputation in his War. At length, being recalled, he goes and receives at Rome the Reward of his Services, the Senate having decreed him the Honour of an Oration, or inferior Triumph. He then met by the Emperor without the Gates, who gave him the Right Hand as they walked, in Token of his great Esteem for him (1). King Briton in the room of great Offer for him (1).

Of Offorus Sepala was sent into Britann in the room of Plautius. He arrives in the mth of Winter, and finds the Britann making continual Inroads into the Roman Conquests. They never imagin'd the new Governor would march his Army at such a Season in an unknown Country. But he does not suffer them long to continue their Ravages. Drawing his Troops together, he forthwith marches against them with all Expedition, and defeating the first that stand their Ground, so disperses the rest in the end, that he has no more to fear from their Incursions. However, not to be exposed to continual Alarms, he resolves to confine them between the Avon and Severn, by means of Forts built between the two Rivers. Before he publishes this Resolution in practice, he makes Camelodunum a Military Colony. Much about the same time London was likewise made a [Trading] Colony, and that Part of Britain lying between the Thames and the Sea, was reduced into the Form of a Province, and called Britannia Prima.

Form of a province, and yet weakened by the foregoing Wars, The Iscni (2) from the beginning been in Alliance with the Romans, were the first that opposed Offorus's Design. Some neighbouring Nations followed their Example, and joining their Forces under one General, they encamp'd upon advantageous Ground, throwing up in haste a Breach-work of Flints to prevent the Attempts of the Horie. Tho' Offorus was then without any but the auxiliary Forces (3), he attacked them however, ordering the Horie to dismount and support those that were to charge first. The Resistance of the Britons was more obstinate than expected. Nevertheless their Intrenchments were forced at last with great Slaughter on their Side. After this Victory, Offorus turns his Arms against the Gangi (4), who keeping in small Parties, are quickly disperied. The Roman Army was not far from the Sea that parts Ireland from Great-Britain, when the General is informed that the Brigantes (5) are in Arms. This News oblig'd him to defer the Execution of his first Design, he marches with all speed against the Brigantes, being willing to secure the Old, before he proceeds to new Conquests. The Inturfection is appeas'd by the Death of the chief Revolters. But the Silures (6), the brave and most powerful of all the Britons, could not be tam'd, neither by Clemency or Severity. Their Forces were so considerable that the Legions were oblig'd to march against them. They were headed by the famous Caradoc, famous for his great Exploits, and universally esteem'd by his Countrymen, being accounted the best General Britain had ever produced. This Prince, whom the Nations in Alliance with the Silures had made Commander in Chief, was retir'd into the Country of the Ordovices (7), where assembling all his Forces, he resolves to expect the Romans. To that end he chuses an advantageous Post of very difficult Access, and draws up his Army on the side of a steep Hill, with a little River (8) at the bottom, which tho' fordable in many Places, was of great Service to him. Moreover his Camp being surrounded with a sort of Rampart of Flints and Stones, he seem'd, so posted, to be out of all Danger (9). These Difficulties are not sufficient to check the Romans, who appear before their Enemies with check the Romans, who appear before their Enemies with their wonted Bravery, and resolved to exert their utmost in their wonted Bravery, and resolved to exert their utmost in Expectation of ending, by a single Battle, a War that Expectation of ending, by a single Battle, a War that kept them, as it were, in another World. "But now if you preferre my Life, I shall be a standing Monument of your Clemency to future Ages." The Emperor moved with these Words generously pardons the Captives, and orders their Chains to be taken off. The first Use they make of their Liberty is to go and fall at the Emperors Feet, who, in all appearance, interceded for them. The Senate being assembled to consider of a due Reward for Offorius, his Victory was spoken of in Terms very much to his Advantage. It was declar'd to equal Scipio's over Syphax, and Paulus Emilius's over Perseus; and therefore it was resolv'd that the same Honours should be decreed him.

Mean while, Offorius's Reputation began to sink, either because he grew remiss after acquiring so great Fame, or because the Britons had exerted themselves more vigorously to repair the Disgrace of their late Defeat. They successfully attack'd the Troops that were left to build Forts in the Country of the Silures, and had not timely Relief come from the neighbouring Garrisons, would have cut them in pieces. The Commander and eight Captains, with a good Number of Soldiers were slain. Another time they defeated the Roman Foragers, and put the Horse that guarded them in disorder. In this Action they improv'd their Advantage in such manner, that Offorius was oblig'd to advance with the Legions, after having tried in vain to restore the Battle with supplies of the light-arm'd Troops. The coming of the Legions revived the Courage of the Romans, and forc'd the Britons to retreat tho' with little Loss. After that there were several Conflicts with little Success, according to the Circumstances of Time and Place.

The Silures, of all the British Nations, were the most obstinate, being exasperated at the Emperors saying, Britain would have no Peace, till, like the Sicambri, they were transported into some foreign Country. They surpris'd two Cohorts, that by the Avarice of the Officers and greedy Desire of Pillage, were advanced too far into the Enemy's Quarters. By distributing the Spoil and Prisoners, they endeavour'd to draw in the rest of the Nations to revolt. Offorius dies about this time with vexation for not being able to put an end to the War. The Britons rejoice at his Death, and the more for their ascribing it to his Grief that he could not stop the Progress of their Victories.

As it was dangerous, in the present Posture of Affairs, for the Emperor to leave the Army long without a General, Autus Didius is immediately sent over, who finds Matters in a worse Condition than ever, a Legion commanded by Manlius Valens having been defeated. The loss however was not so great as reported. Nevertheless Didius himself magnified it very much, that he might gain the more Honour in restoring Affairs, or lessen the Disgrace, if the War should continue any time. His Arrival was a Check to the Silures, who, exalted with their late Success, were making Inroads into the Frontiers of the Roman Province.

Mean while Venutius King of the Brigantes, Successor of Caratacus, in the Command of the Army, is perwaded by the Intigations of Carismandua his Queen, (the same that betray'd Caratacus) to enter into an Alliance with the Romans. As long as this Prince lived in a good understanding with his Queen, he suffered the Romans peaceably to enjoy their Conquests. Satisfied with preserving his own Dominions, without troubling himself about the Concerns of the other Nations. A Quarrel arising between him and his Queen, and ending in a domestick War, caus'd him to take other Measures (1). Tho' hitherto he had no Aversion to the Romans, he is now forced to declare against them, they having impolitically espoused the Cause of his Queen. This Partiality of theirs so enrages him that he uses all his Interest with his Countrymen to stir them up to a Revolt. The War is kindled afresh with greater Fury than ever, tho' in the Absence of Didius, who, being very old, manag'd Affairs by his Lieutenants.

Venutius who succeeded him in the Reign of Nero, died before he had done any thing remarkable. 'Tis true, his Head was full of vast Projects, and the Fame he had acquir'd in other Posts, gave Occasion to think him capable of executing the greatest Undertakings. But his Will, stuff'd with flattering Praises of the Emperor, and full of vain Boasts, that in case he had lived but two Years longer he would have subdued all Britain, made him forfeit the good Opinion People had conceived of him.

Suetonius Paulinus was appointed to fill his Place. Great Matters were expected from this General, whose Merit was compar'd with Corbulo's, who had lately conquer'd Armenia. As he himself look'd with Emulation on the Glory acquired by that great Man, he burn'd with desire to confirm by fresh Exploits, the good Opinion the World had entertain'd of his Experience and Bravery. The Moment he comes to his Government, he forms the Project of conquering the Isle of Mona (2), now call'd Anglesey. To that end, he passes the Foot over in flat-bottom'd Boats, the Sea being very shallow in that Place, the Horse following, some swimming, others fording (3). The Islanders are drawn up on the other Side, with the Women running, up and down, dress'd like Furies, their Hair hanging loose, Firebrands in their Hands, and surrounded with the Druids, who with Hands lifted up to Heaven, pour out dreadful Curses and Imprecations. The Horror of this Sight astonishes the Romans, that they stand stock still, expos'd to the Enemies Darts. But at length, the Shame of being frighted by a Company of frantic Women and Priests, and the Exhortation of their General bringing them to their Senses and Courage, they fall upon the Enemy Sword in Hand, and become Masters of the Island. The first thing Paulinus did was to order all the consecrated Groves to be cut down, where the Islanders sacrific'd their Captives, and consult'd their Gods, by inspecting the Entrails of Men.

But whilst Paulinus is employed in this Expedition, an unexpected Turn obliges him to leave Mona in an abrupt manner, to go and settle Affairs of much greater Moment.

Prasutagus King of the Iceni dying, leaves by Will the Emperor and his Daughters Co-heirs to his great Treasures, in Expectation to procure by that means Nero's Protection for his Family and People. But this Precaution has a quite contrary Effect. Prasutagus is no sooner laid in his Grave, but the Emperor's Officers seize upon all his Effects in their Masters Name. Boadicea (4) his Widow, a Woman of great Courage and a high Spirit, opposing these unjust Proceedings, meets with fresh Cause of Discontent in the Contempt shewn to her Remonstrances. As she is exprelling, by her Complaints, her resentment of the Injury done to her Daughters, the brutality of the Officers is such, that they order her to be publicly whipp'd. And then, not satisfied with so outrageous an Affront, they cause her Daughters to be ravished by the Soldiers.

The Britons look upon this strange Barbarity with such Indignation that the whole Island is possess'd with a Spirit of Revolt, which quickly breaks out into Action. The Iceni lead the Way, and are soon followed by their Neighbours the Trinobantes. Venutius and his Party join with them, and in short, all the Nations in Subjection to the Romans rise in Arms with one Consent, the City of London only excepted. The Roman Historians themselves own, that the Injustice and Violence of the Emperor's Officers gave the Britons but too just Cause to revolt. They were thrust out of their Possessions without any Form of Law, by the Veterans that were sent to settle in the Island. Catus Decianus, Nero's Procurator, without any regard to the Ordinance of Claudius, that left the vanquish'd in Possession of their Goods, confiscated their Estates to the Emperor's use. The Petitions presented to him on that Occasion were all rejected, and without alleging any other Reason but his Will, which he made a Law, he minded nothing but his own, and his Masters Profit. Seneca himself, with all his noble Sentiments of Moderation and Disinterestedness which shine in his Writings, but were never seen in his Practice, is said to contribute very much to the Insurrection, by rigorously exacting on a sudden the Money he had lent some of the Britons upon Ufury (5). This Treatment bred in the Minds of the People so great an Aversion to a foreign Yoke that they were all unanimously determined to shake it off. Venutius, mortal Enemy of the Romans, cherishes the Rebellion to the utmost of his Power. The very Adherents of the Queen laying aside their domestick Quarrels, and renouncing the Friendship of the Romans, join with the rest of their Countrymen for the recovery of their Liberty.

Boadicea, animated with an ardent Desire of Revenge, General Heads the Revolters, and earnestly exhorts them to take Advantage of the Roman General's Absence to free themselves from Slavery, by putting their Oppressors, the Foreigners, all to the Sword. The Britons immediately embrace the Proposal, and fall in a sudden and furious manner upon the Romans dispers'd in their Colonies, which were more carefully embellished than fortified, massacring all without Distinction of Age or Sex. Unheard of Cruelties are acted upon this Occasion, and strange Punishments invented to glut the Fury of the enraged People. Wives are hung up with their Infants at their Breasts, to make them suffer in some measure a double Death. Virgins have their Breasts cut off and cramb'd into their Mouths, to make them seem in the Agonies of Death to eat their own Flesh. The Veterans at Camelodunum retiring into a Temple for Sanctuary, are sacrilegiously burn'd alive, rather than suffer'd to starve to Death. In a Word, the Fury of the Britons is carried to that height, that not a single Roman escapes. Eighty Thousand (1) are computed to perish in this Massacre.

ercised upon

Let us reflect here a little on the Politics of those Conquerors of the World, so great Masters in the Art of Government. Upon their subduing a Country, they immediately sent thither numerous Colonies, who by Degrees mixing and intermarrying with the Natives, secured to them their Conquests. Of this Britain is a remarkable Instance, where, tho' the Island had been conquered but eighteen Years before by Claudius, above eighty Thousand Romans were already settled, besides Paulinus's Army, and doubtless, some Garrisons in the fortified Places, which the Folly of the Britons could not penetrate.

Paulinus
leaves Mona.

Paulinus receiving Advice of this Revolution, suddenly quits the Isle of Mona to march against the revolted Britons, who have now an Army of a Hundred Thousand Men, under the Conduct of Boadicea, whose noble Stature and heroic Courage make them hope she may have likewise all the Qualities of a General. This Princeess fired with the Affronts she had received, ardently desires to engage with Paulinus, whose Army is only ten Thousand strong, in Expectation of completing her Revenge, by the Destruction of so inconsiderable Remains of the Enemy. Mean while, Paulinus expecting no Succours from any Place, is in great Straits. The ninth Legion, commanded by Petilius Cerialis, was just then entirely defeated. Pennius Posthumus, with a considerable Detachment of the Second, refused, contrary to the Law of Arms, to obey his General's Orders, to come and join him. Thus Paulinus is under a Necessity either of marching against his Enemies with his little Army, or of expecting them in some Town. He chuses the latter, and shuts himself up in London, but quickly alters his Resolution. Foreseeing his Endeavours to save that Colony will endanger the whole Province, he marches out notwithstanding the Cries and Intreaties of the Inhabitants not to abandon them to the Fury of the Rebels. However, with his handful of Troops, he seem'd little able to stand against an Army of a Hundred Thousand Men. But great Men very often by their Courage and Experience find means to extricate themselves out of the greatest Difficulties. Paulinus plainly sees that in such an Extremity he must either conquer or die, the Relief he might expect being too far off, and the Danger at Hand. Therefore, instead of retiring from the Britons, now marching towards him, he resolves to meet them. This Resolution inspires his Troops with such Courage, that they readily follow him; so powerful is an Army's good Opinion of their General. Paulinus summons all his Experience to balance by his Conduct the Advantage of the Enemy's Numbers. He pitches upon a narrow Piece of Ground for the Field of Battle, with a Forest behind that secures him from Ambuscades in the Rear, and a large Plain before, where the Britons are encamp'd. He draws up the Legions close together in the Center, the light-arm'd are placed round them, and the Horse make the two Wings. The Enemies swarm about the Plain in Battalions and Squadrons, exulting at their Numbers (2), and secure of Victory. Their Wives and Children are brought into the Field in Waggon, which line their Intrenchments, to be Witnesses of their Actions and Partners in the Spoil.

Boadicea's Speech to the Army.

Boadicea, with her Daughters by her Side in the Chariot, rides up and down, addressing herself to the several Nations in the following manner, "That it was not the first time the Britons had been victorious under the Conduct of their Queens. That for her part she came not there, as one defended from Royal Progenitors, to fight for Empire or Riches, but as one of the common People, to avenge the Loss of their Liberty, the Wrongs done to her own Person, and the Violation of her Daughter's Chastity. That the Romans Lust was grown to that Height, that neither Old nor Young escap'd its Pollutions; but the Gods had already begun to punish them according to their Deserts; for one Legion that durst hazard a Battle, was cut in Pieces, and the rest skulk'd in their Camp (3), or fled for their Lives; so that instead of being able to stand the Attack of a victorious Army, the very Shouts of so many Thousands would put them to flight. That if the Britons would but consider the Number of their Forces, and the Motives of the War, they would resolve to conquer or die. That it was much better to fall honourably in Defence of their Liberty, than be expos'd again to the Outrages of the Romans. This was her Resolution; but as for the Men, they might, if they pleas'd, live and be Slaves." She is laid at the end of her Speech to let loose a Hare, she concealed in her Bosom, as a good Omen of Victory.

Paulinus endeavouring to animate the Britons, Paulinus harangues his Army.

Paulinus is not idle at the Prospect of so great Danger. Tho' he is assur'd of the Bravery of his Troops, he exhorts them to despise the Clamour and Threats of the Barbarians. He represents to them, that among the Enemy there were more Women than Soldiers, and that the greatest Part of them, having neither Arms nor Courage, would immediately take to their Heels, when they came to feel the Force of their victorious Arms. That in the most numerous Armies, the Decision of the Battle depended upon a few, and that their Glory would be so much the greater as it was the less divided. That they should take care only to keep their Ranks close, and fight Sword in Hand, after they had thrown their Darts. And lastly, that they should not lose time about the Spoil, which would be the certain Reward of their Victory." These Words are followed with such loud Acclamations, and the Resolution of the Soldiers appears so great, that the General not doubting of Success, orders a Charge to be founded.

Battle.

The Romans dart their Javelins without quitting the Advantage of their Post. But their Quivers being emptied, they advance Sword in Hand, seconded by the Auxiliaries, who fight with equal Bravery, in an Opinion there is no safety but in Victory. Whilst the Fight was carried on with Darts at a Distance, the Britons were in hopes the Romans, daunted at the Number of their Enemies, would take to flight. But when they see the Legions advancing Sword in Hand, with short and thick Steps, and no signs of Fear in their Looks, they fall into Disorder, which continually encreases, there being no Leaders or Officers capable of repairing it (4). The Romans seeing them thus shaken, fall upon them with great Fury, and put the whole Army into the utmost Confusion, who now think only of saving themselves by Flight. At the same time, the Roman Horse in the Wings breaking thro' the British Cavalry, a terrible rout ensues of the frightened Troops. 'Tis even with Difficulty they run away, by reason of the great Number of Carriages, full of unserviceable Multitudes, which first retiring, become an Obstacle to the Flight of the Army. The Roman Soldiers spare neither Age nor Sex, but sacrifice to their Revenge the Women and Children, and even the very Horse. This Victory equalled their most famous ones, if it be true, as Tacitus affirms, that eighty Thousand Britons were slain, with the Loss only of four Hundred Romans, and as many wounded. Boadicea escap'd falling into the Hands of the Conquerors, but was touch'd with so deep a Sense of her Shame and Loss, that she ended her Days with Poison. On the other Side, Pennius Posthumus who refused to obey his General, either to avoid the Punishment due to his Offence, or for Grief at losing his share of the Glory of the Victory, stab'd himself.

How advantageous to the Romans the Consequences of the great Victory were, may be easily conceived. The Britons, in the utmost Confemination, without General or Army fly before their Enemies without offering the least Resistance. Their Misery is farther increased by a Famine, brought upon themselves by neglecting to sow their Lands. All their hopes are, that the inconsiderable Number of their Enemies must oblige them to keep together, and thereby afford time to form another Army. But these hopes vanish upon the Romans receiving a strong Reinforcement from Germany. No doubt, as Matters then stood, Paulinus's Army would have been sufficient to complete the Conquest of Britain, if Diffensions arising among the Romans had not prevented them from improving their Advantages.

Julius Clafricanus, who succeeded Decianus in the Office of Procurator, disagreeing with Paulinus, studied to cross him in all his Designs. Probably the General would not suffer him to continue the Oppressions that occasioned the late Revolt. However this be, Clafricanus conceives so violent a Hatred for him, that he declares publicly, and even writes to the Emperor's Ministers at Rome, that there is no Prospect of ending the War, as long as the

(4) These last Words are not in Tacitus.

Management is left to Paulinus. In all his Reports to the Emperor's Ministers, he imputes the good Success to Fortune, and the bad to the Governor's ill Conduct, intimating, if another General were sent, it would be very easy to appease the Troubles without dissolving the Province. At last, Nero hearing of this Dissension, orders his Freedman Polydorus to go and learn the Cause. The Respect shewn him by Paulinus was surprizing to the Britons, who could not conceive that such a General and a victorious Army should be accountable to a Freedman. This Respect however was not paid in vain. Polydorus in his Report to the Emperor, justifies Paulinus, and so manages that he keeps his Command. But in the end, Clasfianus beginning, at length, prevails by his Friends and secret Practices, to have Paulinus relieved by Petronius Turpillianus, who being a Person of no ambition, added nothing memorable, hiding his Love of Ease and Sloth under the specious Name of the Love of Peace.

To him succeeds Trebellius Maximus, as indolent as himself, and famous for nothing during his Government but his Quarrel with Caelius Commander of the twentieth Legion. This Quarrel is carried so high, that great Part of the Army deserting their General, he is forced at length to fly to Vitellius, who commanded the Roman Army in Germany.

In the mean time Nero dying, the Britons enjoy some Respite, during the short Reigns of Galba and Otho, there being neither Governor nor General. The Roman Army was commanded only by Tribunes, among whom Caelius bore the chief Sway. Vitellius being come to the Empire, sends Petilius Bolanus into Britain, to take upon him the Command of the Army. The new Governor, little skilled in the Art of War, leaves the Britons in quiet, and contents himself with gaining the Affection of the Soldiers, without having the Authority of a General.

He continues in the Province till Vespasian, who succeeds Vitellius in the Imperial Throne, being informed of the Wants of Britain, sends thither Petilius Cerealis. Petilius, during his Government, attacks and defeats in several Battles the Britons, the most numerous and considerable of all the British Nations (1). Julius Frontinus succeeds him and acquires no less Glory than his Predecessor. He subdues the warlike Silures, whose Country seemed, by its Situation, to screen them from all Attacks.

Towards the End of Vespasian's Reign, Julius Agricola is sent into Britain to succeed Frontinus. Here we begin to have fuller Accounts of the British Wars; for which we are wholly indebted to Tacitus who has taken Care to write the Life of his Father in law Agricola, in order to give that Lustre to his Actions they justly deserved, and which perhaps they would have wanted had it not been for that illustrious Historian (2).

Some time before Agricola was appointed Governor of Britain, the Ordovices had surprized and cut in pieces a Body of Roman Horse, quarter'd in their Frontiers. This Accident gave occasion to apprehend the like again, and caused the Romans to expect with great Impatience the Arrival of a new Governor. The News that Agricola was to command them, revived their Courage. They did not question but under a General of so established a Reputation, they should quickly put an end to the War. However he could not come till about the middle of Summer. Tho' he finds no Magazine for the Army, dispersed in several Places for their better Subsistence, he draws them together without delay. He immediately attacks the Ordovices, and notwithstanding the Difficulty of the Undertaking by reason of the inconvenient Places he is forc'd to go thro' in quest of them, makes them pay dear for the Advantage they had lately gained. All the World was surpriz'd to see him fighting the Enemies of the Empire upon his first Entrance, a Time usually spent by other Governors in feasting and diversions, or in receiving the Compliments of the Province. But there was still greater Reason to admire his Diligence, when he was seen, in this first Campaign, to attack the Isle of Mona, which the Romans had been forc'd to abandon, tho' he wanted flat-bottom'd Vessels for the Expedition. He order'd a choice Body of Auxiliaries, who were acquainted with the Shallows, to swim over, which they perform'd so dextrously, (being train'd up by the Custom of their native Country to manage in swimming themselves, their Horses and Arms) that the Inhabitants, surpris'd at the Sight, and never suspecting any such thing, surrender'd the Isle to the Romans without obliging them to draw a Sword.

War was not the only Affair that employ'd the new Governor. Whilst his Arms are triumphant, he carefully enquires about every thing relating to the Government of the Province, and the properest Means to keep the People in Obedience. This inquiry shows him that the Britons are not to be tam'd by Arms alone, but that Lenity is no less necessary than Force. And therefore he spends the whole Winter after his first Campaign, in diligently regulating several Abuses crept in by the Avarice or Negligence of former Governors. He takes care to prevent all kinds of Exactions; to cause Justice to be administred punctually and impartially; in a word, to remove every occasion of Discontent from the Britons in Subjection to the Empire. This Proceeding gain'd their Affection to such a Degree, that he had no cause to fear a Revolt whilst he should be employ'd in making new Conquests. Vespasian dying about this time, his Son Titus succeeds him, and knowing Agricola's great Merit, continues him in his Government.

In the Spring the General takes the Field again, and marches towards the North, where he makes some Conquests. He observ'd, the Romans commonly lost in the Winter what they gain'd in the Summer, because they durst not venture to quarter in the conquer'd Countries, which were too much expos'd. To prevent this Inconvenience, he resolv'd to build Forts in proper Places, where Garrisons might be kept in the Winter, always ready to repulse the Enemy. As he was a great Master in the Art of Fortification, these Forts were built and situated in such manner, that the Romans were never under a Necessity to quit them, nor the Enemies ever able to take them (3).

During the following Winter Agricola's chief Business was to soften the rough Manners of the Britons, and to fill them into them a Desire to imitate the Customs of the Romans. His pains are not bestow'd in vain. Soon after, Britain is adorn'd with stately Temples, noble Porticos, and many fine Structures both public and private, of a very different Taste from what had been hitherto seen. The British Nobles even pride themselves in speaking the Latin Tongue, to which a little before they were utterly averse. They dress likewise after the Roman manner, and in short, as Tacitus observes, are brought to esteem, as Politeness and good Breeding, what was only a Badge of their Slavery.

In his third Campaign, Agricola advances as far as the River Tweed, fortifying his Conquests with Castles and Fortresses in several Places.

The fourth Summer was spent in subduing the Nations inhabiting between the Tweed and the two Firths of Glena Fourth Cam- Baduria, now call'd of Dunbritton and Edinburgh, pain. These two Arms of the East and West Seas shoot so far into the Land, that they are parted only by an Isthmus of between thirty and forty Miles. Upon this Isthmus Agricola raises Forts and plants Garrisons for the Security of the Roman Province, which he had extended thus far. By this means the Nations yet unconquer'd, were put up as it were in a separate Island.

What Agricola had done should, one would think, have satisfied his Ambition: But he was labouring also for the Glory of the Roman Name, which, as Tacitus expresses it, knew no Bounds. During the fifth Campaign, Agricola leads his Army beyond the Friths, where he discovers Countries and Nations, whose very Names were unknown to the Romans. Some of them he conquers, and leaves Garrisons in the western Parts opposite to Ireland. His design was to attempt the Conquest of that Island, that it might be a Check upon Britain, being perfectly inform'd of the State of the Country by a Lord banish'd from thence. Tacitus says, he heard his Father-in-law say, that with one Legion and a few Auxiliaries, he could easily become Master of that Island, the Conquest whereof would be of great Service to keep the Britons in awe.

In his sixth Campaign, the Roman General passes Bodo- tria, ordering his Fleet to row along the Coast, and discover the Creeks and Harbours in those northern Parts. This was the first Roman Fleet that appear'd on those Seas, the Sight whereof inspir'd the Enemy with Terror, but the Romans with Courage, who having ventur'd upon those unknown Countries with some dread, were extremely animated by the Communication they had with their Fleet, which always kept near the Shore.

(1) The Isle called Mona, call'd by Astinus, Yn-Brytann, now Alderburgh in Yorkshire, which appears to have been a very large Station. It must be observ'd, that Encampments upon a March were by the Romans call'd Castris. Winter of Summer Quarters, Castra, hiberna, aut agrorum. The word Station is used by Cæsar, Tacitus, &c. for the Duty of Soldiers upon Guard, or for the Men employ'd in this Duty. But afterwards Station was applied to a Fort or Place where the Soldiers lodg'd, and like Vespasian's Castris, were often built like Towns in the Borders of the Empire, where they were constant Fences against the Enemy. The Stations here in England were strong Fortifications, of no great Extent, adjoining to which were usually other Buildings, forming a sort of Town, to which the Station was in the Nature of a Citadel.

(2) Tacitus is full of Agricola's only esteem'd a Master-Piece by the best Judges. The strength and vivacity of the Expression, the beauty and variety of Thought are almost inimitable. History, p. 43.

(3) The Picture of Britain by Herodotus is almost incredible, tho' we extend it no farther than to the time of Tacitus writing his History. There is perhaps a good deal of Camperment in it to Agricola, the Historian's Father-in-Law and favorite Hero. It seems not to be well consistent with another Passage, perducait Britannia ad fluvium angli. Hist. l. i. c. 2. The Forts built this Year by Agricola, and I suppos'd to be on the Borders, especially on the western side of the Island, along which Agricola march'd. History, p. 40.

But while Agriola was advancing towards the North, a Report was spread that the northern Nations had drawn together a formidable Army and attack'd the Forts built on their Frontiers. The News of this Armament being confirm'd a few Days after by Defectors, the principal Officers of the Army advis'd the General to relinquish his Conquests beyond the Frits, and avoid the Shame of being compell'd to it by force. But he rejected this Advice as injurious to his Master's Honour and Interest. Whilst he was deliberating upon this Affair, he had notice that the Enemies were coming upon him with an Army of numberless Multitudes, according to common Report. Apprehensive of being surrounded, he divided his Army into three Bodies, hearing the Enemy had done the same. This Precaution had like to have cost him dear. For the Enemies having Intelligence of it, alter their Resolution, and with united Forces set upon the ninth Legion in the Night as they were encamp'd at a good distance from the rest of the Army. They surpris'd the advance'd Guard, and attacking the Camp with great fury, had like to become Masters of it. Agriola, upon notice of their march, made all possible haste to the Relief of the Legion. But for fear of being too late, he order'd the Horie to go before and maintain the Fight, till the rest of the Army came up. He appear'd at Day-break in Sight of the Enemies, who seeing him advance, would have retreated, but not having time were forc'd to continue the Fight. The Battle was fierce and obstinate. The Romans, that were almost defeated in their Camp, vigorously endeavour to repair their Disgrace, at the Sight of their Companions who were coming to their Assistance. And these, seeing the ninth Legion in danger, rush furiously upon the Enemy to relieve them. Both fought with such Courage and Bravery, that the Enemy began at last to give ground. The Fens favour'd their Retreat, otherwise the War had been terminated by that single Battle (1).

This Defeat, tho' considerable, dishearten'd not the Islanders. They imputed their Misfortune to Chance and other Circumstances, rather than to the Valour of the Romans, and resolv'd to try the Fortune of War once more. Having convey'd their Women and Children into the Towns, they came together from all Parts, and form'd a more numerous Army than the first, with a Resolution stoutly to defend their Liberty.

But whilst the Romans are preparing in the Winter to withstand the Efforts of their Enemies, and even to attack them, a Cohort of *Ulpian*s, levied in Germany, form a Design to return home, and execute it with that Secrecy and Expedition, that it could not be prevented. A Captain and some Roman Soldiers, placed among them to discipline them, were killed, lest they should oppose the Design. Which done, these Germans seize upon two (2) small Vessels, kill one of the Pilots, and compel the other to conduct them, threatening to serve him as they had done his Companion: After which they set sail before their Intentions could be known. They had laid their Measures so ill that they were quickly in want of Provisions, and reduc'd to the Necessity of eating some of their Comrades. Those that remain'd alive, ignorant of the Art of Navigation, were driven ashore on the Coast of Frisland and made Slaves (3).

Upon opening the next Campaign, Agriola orders his Fleet to row along the Coast, to keep several Places in awe. At the same time he marches at the Head of his Troops, taking for Guides some Natives of known Fidelity, that were acquainted with the Ways. When he comes near the Grampian Mountain, he sees the Enemies drawn up to the Number of thirty Thousand, besides Volunteers, who flock'd together to be at a Battle, of which Liberty or Slavery was to be the Issue. Upon the Armies approaching each other, Galgacus, Commander of the Islanders, represents to them, "That being at the Extremity of the Isle, they have no Refuge left if vanquish'd, and therefore nothing but Victory can deliver them from perpetual Bondage." On the other Side, Agriola exhorts his Soldiers "to do their Duty, by the Consideration of their past Victories. Particularly he sets before their Eyes their sad Condition, if after being defeated, they are forc'd to seek for shelter among the Britons, who for fifty Years together have felt the Force of their victorious Arms." Whilst the General is yet speaking, the Soldiers by their Looks discover their Eagerness to fight, and their Hopes of Victory. The Army was drawn up in such manner that the Auxiliary Foot were to beat the first Shock, in order to prevent as much as possible the Effusion of Roman Blood. The Legions were plac'd in the front to support the Auxiliaries in case of Repulse. Galgacus had rang'd his Men on the Side of a Hill, that his gauls might be visible at once to the Romans, and the whole Army with the greater Terror. The Horie were strike them with the greater Terror. The Horie were drawn up on the Plain at the Bottom of the Hill, and the Chariots ran between the two Armies. Agriola apprehensive of being surrounded by these Multitudes, widened his front, though he thereby weakened it, rejecting the Advice given him of ordering the Legions to advance. Then alighting from his Horie, full of Courage and Hopes, he went and headed the Legions. They fought some time with Darts, the Islanders being unwilling to quit the Advantage of their Post. Besides, their little Targets, and untiedly pointles Swords were not so proper for close fighting. But Agriola found means to compel them to it, by detaching two Cohorts of Batauians, and as many of the Tungrians, who fell upon them Sword in Hand. The Islanders, unused to that Way of fighting, could not long withstand the Charge of these warlike Troops, who pressing them with the Points of their Bucklers, soon broke their foremost Battalions and began even to ascend the Hill. Those that followed them, animated by their Example, fought with the same Bravery, and without giving the Enemies time to rally, overthrew all that withstood them. Mean while, the British Horie began also to give Ground, and their Chariots were forc'd to drive up the Hill to assist the Foot that were in extreme Disorder. Tho' the Chariots at first somewhat daunted the Romans, yet did they but little Execution by reason of the unevenness of the Ground. The Hill being pretty steep, the Charioteers had no Command of the Hories, and ran without Distinction over Friends and Foes according as they came in their way. The Foot that were posted on the Top of the Hill, and had not yet engaged, seeing the Romans hotly pursuing their Victory, now made a Motion to surround them, because of the smallness of their Number. But Agriola perceiving it, detach'd four Squadrons of Horie, who not only withstood the Charge of the Foot, but entirely routed them. Then falling upon the Enemies in Flank that were still on the Plain, made great Slaughter of them. This Action completed the Victory. Galgacus finding it impossible to renew the Fight, retreated with the remains of his Troops. He lost ten Thousand Men in the Action; but on the Side of the Romans there fell but three Hundred and forty: Among whom was Aulus Atticus, Captain of a Cohort, who by the Heat of Youth, and the Unruliness of his Horie, was carried into the midst of the Enemies. The Conquerors pass the following Night with Joy and Gladness, and the Vanquish'd with Lamentations and Sorrow, taking Advantage of the Darkness to escape the Pursuit of the Romans. Far from any Thoughts of rallying, their Flight was so hasty, that when Day appeared it was in vain to pursue them (4).

Agriola seeing they were entirely dispers'd, the Summer almost spent, and unsafe to send his Army to waste the Enemy's Country, march'd back into the Territories of the Floresians (5), from whom he received Hostages. He march'd slowly, to strike Terror into the Britons, and in Expectation of his Fleet, which having alarm'd all the northern Coast, returned about the end of the Summer, and anchor'd in the Port of Trutubum (6).

Domitian, now Emperor upon the Death of his Brother Titus, receives the News of this Victory with a seeming Satisfaction, tho' inwardly he repines at the Reputation Agriola gained by it. Envy not suffering him to continue him in his Post where his Fame might still have an additional Lustre, recalls him on pretence of promoting him to the Government of Syria. But after causing the Senate to decree him a Statue crown'd with Laurel, he sends him out of the World with a Dose of Poison. In this manner he rewarded the Service that Great Man had done the Empire. This unworthy Emperor could not bear the Fame of a General whose noble Actions reproach'd him with the imaginary Triumph decreed him as Conqueror of the Germans, in which he had caus'd Slaves to be disguised like Captives.

Agriola gave the finishing Blow to the Liberty of Britain. By his Valour and prudent Conduct all that Part of the Island lying South of the two Frits, was reduced to

(1) This Battle was fought, according to Gordon, in the County of Essex; for there is a Roman Camp in St. John Malcolin's Ground at Essex, two Miles from London, and a large Mound near it, and formerly a Wood. Also near this Place is a small Valley call'd Blair, which in the old Language signifies a Place of Battle. Hervey, p. 44.

And being bought and sold, some of them at last arriv'd here, were brought to the Coast where the Romans were, who told the Adventure, and were afterwards famous for it. Lin. v. c. 10.

(4) Mr. Gordon supposes this Battle to be fought in Stratford, half a Mile from the Kirk of Comer, there being a remarkable Encampment to that Place, in Devon. See Gordon, p. 285.

a Roman Province. As for the northern Parts, they were left to the Inhabitants as a wild uncultivated Country, not worth the conquering or keeping. Only strong Garrisons were plac'd in the Fortresses built on this Side the Friths.

Tho' the Loss of their Liberty seem'd to be an irreparable Damage to the Britons, it was in some measure repaired by the great Alteration for the better in their Customs and Manners, after their being subject to the Empire. In a short time they were seen to lay aside their rude and savage ways, and assume the Politeness of the Conquerors. Arts and Sciences, little regarded by the Britons before this Revolution, flourish'd among them as much as in any other Part of the Roman Dominions. In a Word, from mere Savages the Britons were become polite and civiliz'd, an Advantage the most northern Parts of the Island had not yet attained. After this Reformation, they made but faint Struggles for the Recovery of their Liberty, being pleas'd, for the most Part, with their Servitude. It must however be noted, that a great many chose to lose their Possessions, and retire into the North among the Picts and Scots, rather than live in Subjection to the Roman Yoke. These were the Men that joining with those that afforded them Refuge, made continual War with the Romans, in maintenance of that precious Liberty their unhappy Country had lost. They spared not even their Countymen whom they looked upon with Horror for being pleas'd with their Slavery. These were the Men that with the Picts and Scots oblig'd Emperors themselves to come over in Person and oppose the Efforts of their invincible Courage.

As for the Subjects of the Empire, they endured all the Hardships that are the usual Lot of the vanquished. Exorbitant Taxes were laid upon them on numberless Pretences. Their Estates were taken from them and given to the Veterans, that were continually coming to settle in the Island. The Flower of their Youth were made Soldiers, and dispers'd in the other Provinces of the Empire. Such was the Roman Policy. They sent away whole Bodies levied in a conquered Country, into other remote Regions. For Instance, the Britons into Pannonia, the Bataונים into Thracia, the Germans into Britain, to keep them at a Distance from their own Country. By thus draining the conquered Nations of their main Strength, they disabled them from revolting, and at the same time made use of them to acquire new Conquests.

Lucullus
Governor of Britain.

After Agriola's Departure from Britain, we have but a slender Account of what pass'd in the Island till the Reign of Adrian. We only know that Salustius Lucullus was sent thither by Domitian, to whose Suspicions or Jealousy he quickly fell a Sacrifice. 'Tis to be presumed, the Subjects of the Empire were quiet, and the Inhabitants of the North suffer'd to enjoy their Liberty in Peace. The Roman Historians mention also in the Reigns of Nerva and Trajan some Comotions in the Island that were quickly appeas'd; but the Particulars are unknown. It may likewise be observed in this Interval, the Romans after their Conquests, suffer'd Kings to be in Britain; for they gloried in having such for their Subjects. Juvenal speaks of King Arviragus, who reign'd in some Part of the Island under Domitian (1).

In the first Year of Adrian (2), the northern People, a mixture, as suppos'd, of Picts, Scots, and Britons, but confounded by the Roman Historians under the Name of Caledonians, made an Irruption into the Roman Province. Their first Exploit was to demolish some of Agriola's Fortreffes between the two Friths. Adrian being informed of these Comotions, appoints Julius Severus Governor of Britain, but before he has time to perform any thing, he is suddenly recalled and employ'd elsewhere (3). Mean time, the Caledonians continuing to infest the Roman Territories, the Emperor resolves to go over in Person and subdue these fierce and troublesome People. As soon as they hear of his Arrival, they relinquish the Country they were possessed of, and retire to the North. Adrian however advances as far as York, where he meets some of Agriola's old Soldiers, that had been with him in the northern Parts. The Description these give him of the Country he intend'd to conquer, diverts him from pursuing his Expedition: Besides that the Bogs and Mountains he was to pass would have engag'd him in a War more laborious than honorable, he easily perceiv'd, that should his Undertaking be crown'd with Success, it would procure no great Advantages to the Empire. Wherefore he comes to a Resolution to leave to the Caledonians all the Country between the two Friths and the Tine, in hopes by thus enlarging their Bounds to keep them quiet. But at the same time he was to secure the Roman Province from their Incursions, he causes a Rampart of Earth to be thrown up, covered with the southern Turf, from the Mouth of the Tine to Salway-Frith. This Rampart was eighty Miles in length, and ran quite cross the Country from East to West, by which he secur'd the southern Parts, leaving the Caledonians all the Lands between the new Rampart and the Isthmus that parts the two Friths (4). Having thus settled Matters in the Island, he returns to Rome, and is honoured with the Title of Restorator of Britain, as appears by some Medals.

After these last Irruptions of the Northern People, there was all along a mortal Enmity betwixt them and the southern Britons. These last finding themselves entirely separated by Inclination and Interest from the rest of the Inhabitants of the Island, were the more forward to embrace the Customs and Manners of the Romans. Afterwards by means of the Arts and Sciences, they became by degrees capable of being instructed in the Christian Religion, which 'till then was scarce known in the Island. How strong soever Adrian's Rampart might be, it was not sufficient to prevent the Inroads of the northern People. Indeed, they behaved peaceably as long as there were Roman Troops enough on their Borders to defend the Rampart. But the Moment these were removed, as it sometimes happened, being want'd elsewhere, they began their usual Ravages. Nay, in the Reign of Antoninus Pius (5), not satisfied with their Booty, they destroy'd the Rampart in several Places. Antoninus being informed of it, and fearing their Boldness, if not curb'd, would carry them to greater Undertakings, orders Lollius Urbicus to go and quell them. The new Governor, (having first subdued the Brigantes, who endeavour'd to shake off the Roman Yoke) in order to put a stop to the northern Irruptions, rais'd another Rampart on the Neck of Land between the two Friths, where Agriola had formerly built his Fortresses. Thus the Inhabitants of the North were confin'd within narrower Bounds than before. By means of this Rampart and a Camp at a little Distance where Troops were kept ready to march on Occasion, he compell'd the Caledonians to remain peaceably in their Country. Tho' Antoninus was never in Britain himself, this Expedition, as done by his Orders, and under his Auspices, gain'd him the Title of Britannicus (6).

Marcus

(1) Under Plautus and Officius, in the Reign of Claudivius, some Places (says Tacitus) were given to King Cogidumnus, who continued faithful to the Romans. Over what People he was King does not appear; Cassius thinks, the Regni; D. Gale the Saguntini. Maney, there was lately found at Gloucester a very curious Inscription, relating to this Cogidumnus. The Stone was found in a Cellar under the Corner Hall of St. Martin's Lane, it is about two Foot nine Inches broad, and very near three Foot long. It is now fix'd in the Wall of the House where it was found. The Latin phrase, somewhat defaced, is as follows:

...EPTVNO ET MINERVAE
...TEPLVM
...O SALTVE DOMVS DIVINAE
...AVCTORITATE TIB CLAVD
...GIDVNI REGA AVG IN BRIT
...GIVM FABROR ET QVI IN EO
...D S D DONANTE ARAM

Thus to be read according to Repet Gale, E 71

Neptuno & Minervae templum pro salute domus divinae ex auctoritate Tib. Claudii Cogidumni regis Augusti in Britannia collegio m. s. b. b. m. & qui in eo a sacris suis et suo dedicaverunt domum audente Pudentini filio.

The Stone in digging up was broken in four Parts, of which one is not taken up, lying under the Foundation of the new House. See Philosophical Transactions, N. 379.

(2) Here is a Gap of above thirty Years, from the Year 85 to 117, during which it is suppos'd the Romans lost much of their Conquests here. (3) Publius Ummidius Severus in the Government of Britain, in the Year 120, Severus was recalled to go against the Persians. Dux, l. 69. (4) Adrian's Wall or Fallum was entirely of Earth. The whole Work consisted of the following Parts. 1. The North Agger; 2. The Ditch; 3. The principal Fallum; 4. The South Agger. The Ditch at Harlow-Hill, where the original Breadth and Depth is very apparent, measures near nine Foot 4, 1/2 and eleven over. The Height and Thickness of the Fallum and Aggers cannot be exactly known. The distance of the South Agger from the Ditch is about 24 Foot, and that of the South Agger was originally thirty, tho' kill'd at present by the spreading of the Earth.

(5) Here is another Gap of 18 Years, from 120 to 138. (6) From Antonine's building his Wall in 140 to 165 we meet with no Occurrences, nor from thence to 185. Antonine's Wall, like Severus's, had a Series of Forts or Stations, which are suppos'd (some at least) to be prior to the Wall, and the same that were built by Antonine. This Wall reach'd from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Glyde, as appears by Inscriptions. It begins at Carr-riding, and runs thence to Almonk, F. 64, Condel, Peat, Cull, F. 65, Dick's House, Culler, Wetherston, Cromwell, Bartholomew, Almonk, Kirkcubbin, Culler, Earls, Peat, Kirkpatrick, Cull, L. 11, F. 66, Dunrobin, Old Kirkpatrick, ending at Dunlop near Dunbarton, where stood the old City of Albion, afterwards Dunbarton, i. e. the Town of the Britons. Herley (who has it survey'd) takes the Wall to have been near forty Roman Miles, that is (allow me to convert Roman to chace) Peat, a little above thirty-seven of our Miles. By the Inscriptions showing the Part that was rais'd by the Cohorts of the Legio 6, &c. the Number of Paces amount to 37926, that is thirty-nine Roman Miles, and seven Hundred and twenty-six Paces. It was built of Tuff, upon a Foundation of Stones, four Yards thick. To this Work belongs a great Ditch, larger than that of Severus, on the South-side of which was the Wall, Fallum or Rampart, and South of the Fallum a large military Way pass'd, and in several Places very magnificent and beautiful. How the Work came to be call'd Grain's Dike or Grain's Dike does not appear. It is said that Grain in the Highland Tongue signifies Black, then Grain's Dike will be the same as the Black.

ered (1), which made them fear he intended an utter Extermination of them. He dies shortly after at York, and the two Princes his Sons, succeeding him, conclude a Peace with the Caledonians, and return to Rome.

As nothing very memorable passed in Britain during the Reigns of Severus's immediate Successors, I might fill up this Void with an Inquiry, who were these northern People, or Caledonians (2) so often mentioned? But this is a Subject fitter for a Dissertation than a History. It suffices to inform the Reader that some maintain these Caledonians to be Picts and Scots, with a mixture of southern Britons. Others affirm, the Scots settled not in the Island till the beginning of the sixth Century, and that the Caledonians in Severus's Time, were no other than Britons that had all along inhabited those Parts, or fled thither after the Roman Invasion. But tho', as to the History, the Name of these People be not very material, I shall add here, that for my part, I think the Reasons alleged in proof of the Picts and Scots not being yet settled in the Island, to be insufficient, tho' it may be, their Settlement is of a later Date than pretended by the Scottish Historians (3).

What is known of the Affairs of Britain from the Death of Severus, to the Reign of Dioclesian is inconceivable (4), and amounts to no more than this. There is ground to suppose that some of the thirty Tyrants (5) who were in Possession of the Empire for some time, were acknowledged, if not personally present, in Britain. This appears the more probable, as the Coins of Lullianus, Vitruvius, Posthumus, and others of these pretended Emperors, are commonly found in England. Bonifus, who attempted to usurp the Empire under Tacitus and Aurelianus, was born in Britain. 'Tis known moreover, that a Governor sent hither by Probus, assumed the Imperial Purple, and was shortly after killed by Vitruvius, who had recommended him to the Emperor. Two other Particulars of the Reign of Probus with respect to Britain, ought to be recorded. This Emperor was the first that permitted the Britons (6) to plant Vines as well as the Gauls or Spaniards. But in all appearance, no great Benefit was reaped by this Permission. The Emperor Probus also, after subduing the Vandals and Burgundians, sent over great Numbers of them into Britain (7). These new Colonies are generally thought to have been settled on Gogmagog-Hill near Cambridge, where there remains to this Day a Fortification, imagined to be the Work of these Foreigners. It is however more probably ascribed to the Danes, who were long Masters of Cambridge.

In the Beginning of Dioclesian's Reign, Carausius had the Command of a Fleet, with Orders to scour the Seas of the pyrratical Franks and Saxons that perpetually infested the Belgick, American, and British Coasts. Carausius finds means to enrich himself immensely, by plundering the Pyrates, or going Shares with them in their Spoils. After which, he begins by degrees to receive the Emperor's Commands with less Respect and Submission. Maximian was then Emperor of the West, and Dioclesian of the East. Carausius's Haughtiness breeding in Maximian's Suspitions that were but too well grounded, he resolves to have him assassinated. Upon notice thereof, Carausius immediately assumes the Imperial Purple, pursuant to the Scheme he had laid. As his Riches had acquired him a great Interest in the Army, his Authority was readily acknowledged in the Island. Maximian, surpris'd at his Boldness, advances as far as Gaul with Design to chastise him. But finding him too well established, he alters his Resolution, and thinks it more proper to associate him into the Empire, and leave him Britain for his Share. There are Silver Coins still to be found in England of these two Emperors, having on the Reverse, two Hands joined together with these Words, Concordia Avgv (8).

This forc'd Agreement not removing Maximian's Design to be rid of his Associate, he commits the Execution of his Design to Constantius Chlorus lately made Cæsar, giving him an Army answerable to the greatness of the Undertaking. As Carausius was retired into Britain, Constantius thought it necessary in the first Place to become Master of Boulogne, that Town being as it were the Door into Britain from Gaul. Whilst he is employed in the Siege, Carausius is slain by Alektus, who assumes the Title of Emperor. Whereupon, Constantius raises the Siege of Boulogne, and passes into Britain in order to drive the Usurper from thence, before he has time to fortify himself. Shortly after, Alektus is killed by Alepiadus, who assuming likewise the Imperial Dignity, loses his Life afterwards in a Battle.

Whilst these petty Tyrants are contending for the Possession of Britain, Dioclesian and Maximian, both on a Day, resign the Empire, one in the East, the other in the West. Galerius and Constantius succeeding them, the last, as Emperor of the West, had Britain in his Division. Some Comotions in the Island obliging him to go thither in Person, he dies at York (9), in the beginning of an Expedition against the northern People, now distinguished by the Names of Deucaliones and Veturians (10). Constantius before he expired, had the Satisfaction to see his Son Constantine and appoint him his Successor. Some think Constantine was born in Britain, of Helena Daughter of Constantine King of Colchester (11). But this at best is only Conjecture. However this Prince, at first only Emperor of the West, vanquish'd his Rivals, and became in the end Master of both Empires.

The Britons, as long as Constantine ruled, lived in profound Tranquillity. His Reign was remarkable for three Circumstances in which Britain was concerned. The first is, the Liberty granted by this Emperor throughout the Roman Empire, of professing the Christian Religion, which Britain enjoy'd as well as the rest of the Provinces. The Second is, the general Regulation made by this same Prince for the better Government of his Dominions. He divided the whole Empire into four large Præfectures, namely, Italy, Gaul, the East, and Illyria, in which were contained fourteen great Dioecesi or Provinces. Britain, one of the fourteen, was subject to the Præfect of Gaul, and governed by a Vicarius or Deputy under him (12). Before Constantine

(2) That is, Clyddens, Borders in the British Tongue, whom Bishop Lloyd supposes to be first call'd Picts, about the Year of our Lord 500. 'Tis at the same time they that I v'd next the Roman Borders were fill call'd Caledones or Borders. Amianus, who writ eighty Years after, says there were two Nations of the Isle which were call'd Deucaliones and Veturians, perhaps Deucalyddion and Cluuitburion, that is, in British, the Southern Caledones or Borders, and the Northern Men, (Dow and Cowboy), *g*ht and *l*gh, being anciently w'd for South and North) the same, no doubt, that were afterwards call'd the South and North Picts, (express'd in Bede 155) by a Lodge of high and steep Mountains or Gravel in the Hills; amongst which Hills the Country is call'd Brind Allon, i. e. High-Allon, and the highest of them is call'd Dram Allon, i. e. Ridge of Allon. This perhaps is the only Remains of that most ancient Name of the Island. See Ann. Marc. l. 27. p. 346. Usher prim. p. 89, and 586. Bede, Hist. l. 5. c. 4. Paus. ad Confl. p. 235. Evemer. Pang. ed. Cosm. p. 238.

(3) Lloyd seems to have in this Matter in a clear Light in his Proofs of the following Particulars. 1. That the Inhabitants of Ireland or the Isle were never in Britain before the Year 500. 2. About that time they began their Incursions, but settled not here till after the Decay of the Roman Empire, when the Saxons conquer'd the best part of Britain, calling it England. 3. Then part of the Scots or Irish settled themselves among the Picts, and about the Year 500 conquer'd the Kingdom of Argyle, and held it a long while peaceably. 4. About the Year 800, they conquer'd all that was North of Gravel in Brit. 5. After the Year 900 they got the rest of the Country, and then it came to be call'd Scotland. This seems to be the most probable Account of this much contented Affair, which the Reader may see at large in Lloyd's Historical Account, &c. p. 45. It may not be amiss to lay before the Reader one Argument alleg'd by Buchanan in favour of the Antiquity of the Scots in Britain, in Pang. Maximian, A. p. 238. the Oration comparing Constantine's Victory over Carausius, with That formerly gain'd by Cæsar over the Britons, says, Ad hoc, scitis etiam tunc rades &c. Soli Britannii, Pictis modis &c. Kiberna effugit Hybris valens immitis, facile Romana arant signis effugit. Hence Buchanan infers the Scots were in Britain in Cæsar's Time, by supposing Soli Britannii to be the Genitive Case. For then the Sense will be This: Maximian the Nation (conquer'd by Cæsar) hæc yet rades, and w'd to no other Emenias but Picts and Irish of the British Isle, &c. that is, says he, Scots settled in Britain. But the English Writers seemingly more justly render the Words thus: The Nation being yet rude, and only Britons, w'd to no other Emenias but Picts and Irish, easily yielded to the Roman Arms and Effugit. Hence the Irish has been spoken of as yet, w'd to dwell in British Isle, so Buchanan would have it.

(4) That is, from 217, to 286. But now notwithstanding the Silence of the Roman Historians, we learn from inscriptions the Names of three Præpositi under Gordian III, viz. Mæclius Pufus, Cælius Lucilianus, (both mentioned in two Inscriptions found at Lancaster in the County of Durham) and Nemianus Philippinus, (in one found at old Carlisle, dated 242.)

(11) Usher, Canden and Stillingfleet have endeavour'd to render this Opinion probable, and pretend that Constantius was forc'd to put away Helena, Mother of Constantine, and marry a Daughter of Maximian, Regina.

(12) Till Constantine's Time the Governor of Britain was call'd the Emperor's Prætor or Licentor. But afterwards (as appears in the Natione of the Empire) the Island was govern'd by a Vicarius or Deputy, under the Præfectus Prætoris of Gaul. See Zosm. Hist. l. 2. p. 638. The Emperors of his Government were, 1. A Draught of the five Provinces of Britain express'd in several Buildings, with their Names on the triangular Form of the Island, as if they comprehended the whole Island. 2. The Book of their Instructions call'd with Green, and the Commission in a gilt Cover, with several Letters inscribed on the Book. The Letters were, P. L. I. N. T. A. L. L. C. O. N. M. ORD. P. E. I. c. Proin illis jussu, ut præscriptis a laterculis continens mandata ordinaria principis. There were two Books call'd the Liberulus Major, and the Liberulus Minor. The first contain'd the Names, Instructions, &c. of the higher Officers, as the second did those of the inferior Officers. See Pamphil in Nat. Imperii.

time, Britain was divided into two Provinces only. But that Emperor was pleased to divide it into three. The first was called Britannia Prima (1), containing all the Country South of the Thames, the Capital London. The Second, named Britannia Secunda, contained all the Country West of the Severn to the Firth Sea, now called Wales, the Capital Yfa or Caerleon. All the rest lying northward of the Thames, and eastward of the Severn, made up the third Province, distinguished by the Name of Maxima Caesariensis, the Capital York. This last was afterwards subdivided into two Parts; the southern Part retained the old Name of Maxima Caesariensis, and the other more northward, was called Flavia Caesariensis. But whether this Subdivision was made by Constantine is uncertain. In these three Provinces were twenty-eight large Cities, which in time became to many Bishops Seats. The Lieutenant of the Præfect of Gaul had four Magistrates under him, two Consulars, and two with the Title of Præfidents. These Magistrates, with several inferior Officers, managed all Civil and Criminal Matters.

As for the military Government, there were in the Empire two Generalissimo's (2); one for the East, and the other for the West. Each of these in the several Provinces in his Jurisdiction had others under him. In Great-Britain there were three General Officers to command the Militia; namely, The Count of Britain (3), the Duke of Britain (4), and the Count of the Saxon Coasts (5). The Business of the First was to keep Peace in the inland Parts of the Island, and probably of the western Coasts. The Second's Province was to defend the North from the Incursions of the Picts and Scots. The Third was to guard the eastern and southern Coasts from the frequent Inroads of the Saxon Pyrates. Each of these Generals had a certain Number of Troops under his Command, and the Three together could form a Body of twenty thousand Foot and about two thousand Horse (6):

Besides these civil and military Officers, there were others for more private Concerns; for Instance, The Count of the Emperor's Largesse, that is, the Receiver-General or High-Treasurer (7), had in Britain three Officers, a Register (8), a Treasurer (9), and a Præcurator (10). And the Count or Auditor of the private Revenues of the Emperor, had also one to look after the Affairs belonging to his Office. From an Inscription found not long since, 'tis thought there was also a Præcurator of the Gladiators (11). These were the principal Roman Officers in Britain, who with numberless others, fought these Employments only to enrich themselves at the Expence of the Province.

I have mention'd two of the three things in Constantine's Reign that Britain was concern'd in. The Third is the Removal of the Imperial Seat from Rome to Constantinople. After this Removal the Emperor was frequently obliged to drain his western Provinces of their Forces (12), which in the end prov'd extremely detrimental to them, as it gave the northern Nations Opportunity to ravage their Borders by continual Incursions. Britain, though screen'd from these Invasions by the Sea that surround'd her, felt the Effects of them however, being often forc'd to supply Troops for the Defence of other Provinces. In the mean time the Britons were so expos'd to the Ravages of the Picts and Scots, that they were forc'd at last to call in a foreign Nation to their Aid, which in Time became Master of the Island.

After the Death of Constantine, the Roman Empire was divided between his three Sons; but in a little time Constantinus, one of the three Brothers, being possess'd of the whole, sent into Britain a Natary, one Paulus (13), who committed numberless Extortions. Complaints were brought to the Emperor, but he was not prevail'd with to recall this Minister, tho' he publicly abus'd his Authority. Martinus, then Governor of the Province, was long Witness of these Abuses without daring to oppose them, Paulus having an independent Commission. At length, seeing no end of his unjust Proceedings, he could not forbear advising him to use his Power with more Moderation, declaring withal he would quit his Government rather than employ his Authority any longer in countenancing such Oppressions. Paulus proud of his Master's Favour, insolently told him, that they who found fault with his Conduct, deserv'd to be put in Irons, since the daring thus to oppose the Execution of the Emperor's Orders, could not but proceed from a Spirit of Rebellion. The Governor, enraged at these Words, draws his Sword and strikes at him, but missing his Blow, plunges it into his own Breast and kills himself.

After Martinus's Death, the Britons were expos'd more than ever to the Oppressions of Paulus. This mercilefs Man condemn'd to Death, Banishment, or Imprisonment, all that made the least Resistance to his Will, and the Emperor never concern'd himself to restrain him (14).

About the End of Constantine's Reign, the Governor of the West was conferr'd on Julian, now created Cæsar, who resided at Paris. Shortly after his arrival there, News came that the Picts and Scots had made Incursions into the Province of Britain, and that it was necessary to send a speedy Assistance. Whereupon Lupinus received Orders to repair thither with all Expedition; but is recalled before he reaches London. Probably, the northern People had appeas'd Julian by their Submission.

From that time to the Reign of Valentinian I, nothing remarkable happen'd in Britain. But under that Emperor the Island was in a wretched Condition, by the joint Attacks of the Picts, Scots, Attacotti (15), Franks, and Saxons, by several Nations. All these Nations, by Accident or a common League, invaded the Roman Province at once, and made great Ravages. Neftarius, Count or Guardian of the Coasts, was defeated and slain by these new Enemies, and soon after, Duke Bulchobaudes had the same Fate. Severus and Jozeimus were successively sent into Britain to put a stop to their Ravages, but to no purpose. At last, the Emperor Valentinian pitches upon Theodosius the Elder, so called to distinguish him from his Son, the first Emperor of that Name, to go and command in the Island. Theodosius behaves like a Man of Courage and Experience. At his Arrival, he divides his Army into three Bodies, the better to oppose those of the Enemies that were dispers'd in the Island. Fortune favouring his Diligence and Valor, he routs them in several Encounters, and at last drives them out of the Roman Province, recovering all their Booty, with a small Part of which he rewards his Troops, restoring the rest Part to the Owners. The Barbarians being repuls'd, Theodosius returns in Triumph to London, and perceiving the City to have lost much of her ancient Splendor, omits nothing to restore her to her former Condition. London is not the sole Object of his Care. He applies himself also to repair the other ruin'd Cities and Castles, and to put them in Condition to hinder another time the Invasions of the northern People. He was not satisfied even with this Precaution. As the Enemies were retired beyond the two Fritches, he thought it necessary for the safety of Britain to keep all the Country they had abandon'd. To that end, he built Fortresses on the Neck of Land between the two Seas, to keep them at a greater distance. By this means the Roman Territories were enlarg'd with a great Tract of Land, of which Theodosius made a fifth Province, calling it Valentia, in honour of Valentinian. This Country was part of the Kingdom of the Picts, which was thereby considerably diminish'd. Theodosius having thus settled Matters in Britain, return'd to Rome, leaving the Island under the Command of the Governors of each of the five Provinces (16).

Valentinian I had for Successors his Sons Valentinian II and Gratian. Shortly after, Maximus was sent into Britain upon the Picts beginning to stir. At his Arrival, he forms a Design to reduce the whole Island under the Dominion of the Romans. But the Union of the two northern Nations being a grand Obstacle to the Execution of his Project, he resolves to divide them, if possible, and then attack them one after the other. In order to this, designing to make use of the Picts to destroy the Scots first, he feigns to be extremely provok'd with the Scots, and charges them with being the sole Cause of all the Troubles in Britain. Then he publicly engages the Picts to join their Forces with his, upon a Promise of giving them all the Lands that should be taken from the Scots. This Artifice has all the Success he expected. The Picts not perceiving the latent

(16) The Poet Claudian in his Panegyric on Theodosius the Emperor, Son of this Theodosius, has the following Lines generally taken notice of:

Qui medio Libye sub caudis periret actus
Terribilis Mauro, debellatque Britannia.

Poison, swallow the Bait, and readily join with the Romans for the sake of the promised Advantage. Presently after, the Scots being attacked by these two united Powers, are forced to abandon their Country and fly into Ireland, and the adjacent Isles. Maximus, according to his Promise, suffers his Allies to take possession of the Lands deserted by the Scots. But whilst he is confiding of Means to subdue them in their Turn, Affairs of greater Importance relating to himself, obliges him to form new Projects.

378. Whilst this General was employed in enlarging the Bounds of the Empire, Gratian joint Emperor of the West with Valentinian his Brother, associates Theodosius the Younger, Son of Theodosius the Elder, who had commanded in Britain. This Choice, tho' universally applauded, displeases Maximus, who thinks himself more worthy of the Purple than the Person invested with it. He takes the Preference given by Gratian to Theodosius as a heinous Affront, and therefore can't bear the Thought of serving to ungrateful a Master and a young Prince so much in his Opinion beneath him in Merit. The Vexation to see himself thus slighted, throws him into a Resolution to assume the Imperial Dignity, and so put himself upon an Equality with the Person Gratian had given him for Sovereign. After forming this Project, he alters his Measures. Instead of making War upon the Piſts, according to his former Resolution, he thinks only how to gain their Friendship. His Intent was to leave Britain in quiet and attached to his Interest, whilst he was elsewhere employed against the three Emperors, from whom he designed to wrest the Empire. But an unexpected War arising in Britain, prevented him from discovering his Purpose so soon as he intended. The Scots, strengthen'd with the Assistance of the Irish, make an Inruption into the North, and endeavour to recover the Dominions from whence they were chased. Maximus therefore is forced to employ against them the Forces prepared for the Execution of his other Projects. He defeats them several times, and at length drives them back into Ireland, where he makes a Show of following them, to deprive them of that Refuge, and punish the Irish. But the Irish dreading to see a Roman Army in their Island, send to him to make his own Terms, which he did in a much more favorable manner than they expected, with intent to stifle all Seeds of Division and Discontent, that might any way frustrate his principal Design.

After these Troubles are appeased, Maximus assumes the Imperial Purple, and quits Britain to go and fight Gratian. He leads all the Roman Forces into Gaul, with a considerable Body of such Britons as are fit to bear Arms. Thus Britain was on a sudden destitute of Soldiers, and consequently so weak that she could not defend herself in case of Attack. The Roman Historians inform us, that Maximus causing Gratian to be assassinated as he was flying into Italy, and dethroning Valentinian II, was himself vanquish'd and beheaded by Theodosius. This Victory procured the Restoration of Valentinian, who was soon after murder'd by Arbogastes, and Eugenius placed on the Throne. Theodosius was therefore forc'd to fight the new Usurper, who met with the same Fate as Maximus. Eugenius being dead, Arbogastes despairing to escape due Punishment, lays violent Hands on himself (1). Thus Theodosius remains sole Master of the Empire, and keeps Possession as long as he lives. The Fame of his Victories, and the Mildness of his Government keep his Subjects in Obedience and his Neighbours in Awe. The Piſts in particular, lived peaceably in their Country without molesting the Britons.

392. After the Death of Theodosius, the Empire was divided between his two Sons. Arcadius was Emperor of the East, and Honorius of the West. As Honorius was very young, the famous Silico, by the Emperor his Father's Order, was Regent during his Minority. His first Care was to send a Governor into Britain with a Legion, to curb the Insolence of the Piſts, who after Theodosius's Death, began to make Inroads into the Roman Province. He made choice of Victorinus, a Person of a fierce and arrogant Temper, who not satisfied with cooping up the Piſts in their Country, treated them as Subjects of the Empire. He pretended to stretch his Authority so far as to forbid them to crown another King in the Room of Hengist, whom Death had just taken out of the World. This Proceeding convinc'd the Piſts, Victorinus had a Design to attack them, and laid them under Apprehensions that after having helped to drive out the Scots, they should be forced to follow them now that they could no longer depend upon the Assistance of their Neighbours, as formerly. They consider'd, by the Retreat of the Scots, they were deprived of an Aid, which in time to come might be to them very necessary. The little Regard the Roman Governor had for them making them apprehensive he had form'd some Design against their Liberty, they thought of Means to avoid their Ruin, by repairing the Error they had committed. In this State of Fear and Uncertainty, they resolv'd to recal the Scots. To which end they send an honorable Embassy to Fergus, a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Scotland, who was retir'd into Denmark, and invite him with his Countrymen to come and take Possession again of the Country they were forc'd to abandon. As a farther Inducement they promise him the Command of their Army in the War with the Romans, which to them seem'd unavoidable. Fergus accepts these Offers, and acquaints the fugitive Scots that he is ready to lead them back into their Country. There could never be a more favorable Juncture. The Roman Empire was not only rent with intestine Troubles by the Discord which reign'd among the Governors, but powerfully attacked by barbarous Nations that ravag'd the Borders. These Disorders had oblig'd Silico to recal Victorinus with his Legion, and employ him in other Parts, where the Occasion was more urgent. At this very Juncture the Scots re-enter the Island under the Conduct of Fergus, whom they unanimously chuse for their King (2).

As soon as Fergus II is seated in the Throne, he meditates Revenge upon the Romans, which to him appears the more easy to effect, as they are extremely weaken'd by the Departure of Victorinus. Pursuant to this Resolution, he assembles the Forces of both Nations, of which he was invested with the Command, and after taking the Fortresses built by Theodosius the Elder, between the two Frits, advances to Severus's Wall. The small Number of Troops left by the Romans in the Island not being able to defend a Wall of so great Length, the Piſts and Scots enter the Roman Province with little or no Difficulty, and lay waste the Country.

After Britain had submitted to the Roman Yoke, a great Number of foreign Families removed thither, sprung for the most part from the veteran Soldiers settled there. These Families had to mix with the Natives, that they now made but one People, govern'd by Officers sent from Rome. I shall therefore call this mixt People henceforward by the Name of Britons, because the Romans and other Foreigners, as well as the Natives, had the same Interest to defend Britain, now become their common Country. The Britons then finding themselves thus harass'd by their Neighbours, and despairing of Assistance from Rome, resolve to elect an Emperor, whose Interest it should be to protect them. Their Choice falls upon one Marcus an Officer of great Credit among them; but the new Sovereign not having the good Fortune to please all the World, is quickly slain or dethroned, and another, call'd Gratian, is chosen in his Room. This last being a Man of a cruel and bloody Disposition, meets the same Fate, four Months after his Election.

As these two first Emperors did not answer Expectation, Constantine a common Soldier was next rais'd to the Imperial Dignity purely for the sake of his Name, which was thought to be fortunate. The new Emperor being a Man of Courage, and of a Genius far above his former Condition, beats back the northern People into their Country, and then concludes a Peace with them. This Success inspiring him with a higher Conceit of his Merit and Fortune, he is not content to reign in Britain only, but forms a Design to become Master of the whole Empire. To this end he draws together the Remains of those that can bear Arms, as well Romans as Islanders, and forming an Army, passes into Gaul. His Intention was to improve the present favorable Juncture. Honorius was then attacked by Alaric King of the Goths, who a few Years after, became Master of Rome. Whilst Constantine is making Preparations, he sends Embassadors to Honorius, to acquaint him with his being chosen Emperor by Britain, and to excuse his accepting the Imperial Dignity without his Knowledge. Honorius, now press'd by Alaric, is forc'd to admit of Constantine's Excuses, and own him for his Associate in the Empire. The Emperor's Condescension is not capable of satisfying the ambitious Constantine, whose Designs and Hopes are vastly enlarged. At his Arrival in Gaul, he associates his Son Constantian, taken out of the Monastery at Winchester; and leaving him an Army to maintain his Authority in these Provinces, marches towards the Alps in order to pass into Italy and dethrone Honorius. Constantian had for General of his Troops one Gerontius, who by his prudent Conduct, not only made his Master respected in Gaul, but also put him in possession of Spain. The young Emperor was so exalted with this unexpected Success, that for fear the Honour which he thought wholly belonged to himself, should be ascrib'd to Gerontius, he removed him from his Post. So ungrateful a Return goes not long unpunished. Gerontius, exasperated at the Affront, finds Means to assemble the Army, and causing Maximus, a Friend of his, to be proclaim'd Emperor, gains the Majority to his Side. Then he goes and besieges Constantine in Vienna, where he was retir'd. That Town not being then in condition to stand a long Siege, Constantine in a Sally wilfully rushes upon his Death, for fear of falling into the Hands of his Enemy.

Constantine seeing the Face of Affairs alter'd by the Revolt of Gerontius, and the Death of his Son, lays aside his Design of going into Italy, and retires to Aries, where he is besieged by Gerontius. But while Gerontius is pleas'd with the Hopes of having him soon in his Power, he is forc'd on a sudden to raise the Siege, and march against a more formidable Enemy. Count Constantius, to whom Honorius had given the Command of his Armies, upon the Peace lately concluded between the Emperor and the King of the Goths (1), was advancing with all Speed to curb the Insolence of the Tyrants of Gaul. Upon his Approach, Gerontius is suddenly deserted by his Army, and forc'd to fly into Spain, where he is slain by his own People. Constantine had no better Fortune than Gerontius. He was taken at Aries with his Son Julian and his Brother Sebastian. Tho' before the Surrender of the Town he had taken Prisic's Orders, he was nevertheless sent to the Emperor and beheaded.

The Britons thus left to themselves after the Departure of the Roman Soldiers and the Flower of their Youth, are quickly reduc'd to great Extremities. The Picts and Scots continue their Ravages without Opposition, by reason of the Weakness of their Enemies. This wretched State held some Years, and the Romans were not able to help it. They were too much taken up with their own Affairs to think of Britain. The Goths had renewed the War under the Conduct of Alaric, and having taken and sack'd the City of Rome, were now in possession of Gaul (2). On the other side, the Suets, Vandals (3), Catti, and Alani (4), had over-run Spain. In vain therefore do the Britons implore the Emperor's Assistance. He is neither able nor willing to give them any; Britain, so carefully preserv'd by his Predecessors, beginning now to be a Burden. Wherefore to free himself at once from their Importunities, he voluntarily resigns the Sovereignty of the Island, and discharges the Inhabitants of their Allegiance to the Empire. This solemn Renunciation was made in the Year 410, a little after Alaric's taking of Rome.

The Liberty, the Britons had thus recover'd, serv'd only to render them more miserable. Whereas before they might claim the Protection of the Emperor, they were now destitute of all Hopes of Assistance. However, the Affairs of the Romans happening afterwards to be somewhat reprov'd under Valentinian III, by the Victories of the famous Ætius over the Wisigoths and Burgundians, this General, out of Pity to the wretched Condition of the Britons, sends them a Legion commanded by Gallio of Ravenna or as some say, by Maximian. This Aid arriving unexpectedly, beat back with Ease the northern Nations, and forc'd them to retire into their Country. But the Emperor having occasion for the Legion, they were recalled just as the Enemies were preparing to renew their Devastations.

Before his Departure the Roman Commander told the Britons plainly, they were to expect no farther Assistance from the Emperor, who was wholly employ'd elsewhere against the northern Nations of Europe, whose Ravages extended to all parts of the Empire. After this Declaration, he advises them to insure themselves to Arms, that they may be able to withstand the continual Attacks of their Enemies; and considering their Weakness, exhorts them to repair the Wall of Severus to serve them for a Barrier; offering them the Assistance of his Soldiers and his own Direction in the Work. What could the Britons do in this their Extremity? They had no other Method to take but That propos'd to them by the Roman Captain, and therefore fell to work upon their Wall with all possible Diligence, which as soon as they had finish'd, the Romans took their last Farewel of Britain never to return more. The End of the Roman Dominion over Britain is to be fix'd to the Time of this Legion leaving the Island, in the Year 426 or 427 (5).

The Picts and Scots, who lived in strict Union after the Coronation of Fergus, began their Hostilities against the Britons with more Confidence than ever, when they heard of the Departure of the Roman Forces. The Wall of Severus lately repair'd, is attack'd afresh, and abandon'd at last, being defended only by Britons little us'd to War. After which, the northern People made large Breaches in several Places, that it might be no Obstacle to their future Incur-sions into their Enemies Country. About this Time Fergus dies as he is returning to Ireland, leaving his young Son Eugenius II a Minor, under the Regency of Graham his Grandfather by his Mother's Side.

The Weakness of the Britons was then so great, that despairing to resist their Enemies, they abandon'd part of their Country, and retir'd more Southward, by these Advantages, the Picts and Scots, grown more bold by these Advantages, form new Projects, and think of Means to drive the Britons entirely out of the Island. To this end, they resolve to send for Colonies from Ireland and the adjacent Isles, to fend the Lands forsaken by the Britons, as well as those people the Lands forsaken by the Britons, as well as those they hope to take from them hereafter. But Graham prevents, by his Authority, the Execution of this Project, fearing the Return of the Romans, and the making Scotland the Scene of the War. It may be, he was not altogether ignorant of the sad Condition then of the Roman Empire; but knew not how low it was; and therefore, thought fit to oppose the Designs of the Scots, and prefer a solid Peace with some real, tho' not great, Advantages, to a War which as he imagined, might be attended with dangerous Consequences. A Peace then was offer'd to the Britons upon honorable Terms, and by them gladly accepted. By the Treaty the Wall of Severus was to be the common Boundary of the two Nations. But for this Advantage the Britons were obliged to pay a considerable Sum of Money. The Scots thinking this Peace not advantageous enough, loudly murmur'd at it; but Graham took care to see it observ'd during his Administration.

As soon as Eugenius II was of Age to take the Reins of the Government into his own Hands, he resolv'd to break a Treaty, which his Subjects had protest'd against. He knew the Romans were not in condition to assist Britain, and the Opportunity appear'd too favourable to be neglected. Pursuant to this Resolution, he sends Ambassadors to the Britons, and haughtily demands all the Lands possess'd by the Scots before the late Treaty. The Chiefs of the Britons, surpris'd at this unexpected Demand, convene a general Assembly to consider of an Answer to the King of Scotland. The Majority of the Assembly, provok'd at the Haughtiness of their Neighbors, and knowing they only wanted an Excuse to renew the War, were of opinion to reject their Demand. "It is easy (say they) to perceive the Scots will not be satisfied hereafter with their present Demands. Their Aim is only to have an Entrance into the Country, that they may with less Difficulty become Masters of the whole; and it will be an easier Task to prevent them from entering, than to drive them out when once they are settled. In short, since a War is unavoidable, it will be very imprudent to grant what they demand, under colour of preserving a Peace which cannot last long." Others not so warm, knowing the extreme Weakness of the Nation, were of another Mind. They were for finding some Expedient to satisfy the Scots, and avoid, if possible, a War which must prove fatal to the Britons. "They desire the Assembly to consider what prodigious Numbers of Soldiers were drawn out of the Island by the Romans to supply their Armies abroad; how many Maximians carried with him that were settled in Gaul; and lastly, how the Country was drain'd of all that could bear Arms by Constantine. To this they add, the Weakness of the Nation was but too visible in their late War with the Scots, when their frequent Defeats oblig'd them to abandon the very Lands now demanded, the Possession of which was entirely owing to the Generosity of Graham; it is therefore better for the Britons to give up freely what they cannot keep, than for the sake of that, to run the risk of losing their All."

Tho' these Reasons were very weighty, they were over-ruled by the violent Party, and Conan, one of the wisest and most powerful of the Nation, for dwelling too long upon the Advantages of Peace, was deem'd a Traitor, and torn in pieces by them. After that, none daring to oppose it, the Ambassadors were sent back with an insulting Answer. This haughty Resolution was followed with a War more destructive to the Britons than their former ones, and which entirely weaken'd them by the Loss of fourteen or fifteen thousand Men in one single Battle. Reduc'd to Extremity, they have no course left but to sue in a suppliant manner for that Peace they so haughtily refused. They obtain it indeed, but upon very hard Terms. By the new Treaty, they are oblig'd to give up all the Country north

The Britons are beaten.

They obtain Peace.

"he fees but one way to save his Country from the Destructions he is threaten'd with, and That is, to call in to their Assistance a Nation that by their victorious Arms were settled in Germany, upon the Lands of the Romans. Then tells them, he means the Saxons; adding, they have indeed done some Damage to the Britons by their Pyracies, but are now ready to repair it with Advantage, since they can free them from the continual Irruptions of the Picts and Scots. This People, being parted from Britain by a small Arm of the Sea only, can be as speedy with their Aid as their preferring Occasions require: they are already grown formidable to the northern Nations, and by the Arrival of some of their Troops the Britons will quickly be in condition to resist their Enemies, and perhaps repay them in their own Coin." He concludes with representing, "The Thing will hardly admit of Debate, the Britons cannot be without a foreign Aid, and none but the Saxons are in condition to give them Assistance."

His Proposal is approved by the Britons, and the Saxons.

The Fears all were seiz'd with, and the Hopes of still enjoying their native Country, and recovering their lost Estates, do not doubt the Desire of Revenge, conspir'd to a joyful Reception of Vortigern's Proposal. But when they came to consider of the Terms to be offer'd the Saxons, great Debates arose. The Monarch, whose secret Purpose was to strengthen himself as well against his own Subjects as foreign Enemies, mov'd the allotting them some Province, that their own Interest might induce them to wage War more heartily and vigorously. But as no Lands could be assign'd them but what belong'd to some of the Assembly, it was no easy Matter to agree on this Point. At length, after great Disputes, it was resolv'd that the Saxons should have the Isle of Thanet in Kent, as being a proper Place to land their Forces, and convenient for them whenever they wanted to return into their own Country. It was farther agreed, that the Saxon Soldiers should be allow'd Pay, which should be settled by Agreement on both Sides. After this Resolution, Ambassadors were appointed to negotiate the Affair in Germany. Vortigern, pleas'd with having carried his Point without incurring Suspicion, imagin'd himself out of the Reach of all Danger. But see how blind and short-sighted is human Wisdom! This very Expedient, by the direction of divine Providence, prov'd his own and the Nation's Ruin.

But before I proceed to the Effects of this pernicious Advice, it will be necessary to give a more particular Account of these Saxons, who are to be the chief Subject of our History. They were so little known before their coming into Britain, and what is said of their Original so uncertain, that 'tis no wonder this Subject is but very slightly touch'd upon by the Generality of the English Historians. Some barely say, the Saxons were called in to the Assistance of Britain, without any farther Addition concerning them. Others say only, the Saxons were a German People, without mentioning the Parts they inhabited. Some again add, they were Pyrates from the Cimbrian Chersonesus that came and settled on the Coasts of the German Ocean. But as these Coasts are of a vast Extent, we are not much the wiser for that. In short, the most probable Account I can gather from the several Authors that have writ of this People, is as follows.

About the Time the Romans began to extend their Conquests into Germany, the Inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now called Jutland, leaving their Country, advanced towards the South. They possess'd themselves at first of the northern Parts of Germany, and doubtless spent some Years in settling themselves in those Quarters. But as the Romans had not yet penetrated so far, and we have no ancient Histories of the northern Countries, nor even of the western, but what the Romans have left us, there is little known of the first Irruptions made by the northern People into Germany. The Cimbri continually pushing their Conquests to the Southward, and the Romans advancing to the Northward, they at last approach'd one another. Then it was that the Romans had Opportunity to learn in some measure, the State of these hitherto unknown Nations. Their Historians however speak very confusedly of them, giving sometimes different Names to the same People, and sometimes the same Name to different Nations. The Cimbri that came from the Cimbrian Chersonesus, were divided into three Bands, one taking the Name of Suevi, another of Francs, and a third of Saxons. Some will have the Francs to have been a Branch of the Suevi. However that be, these three Nations, continually advancing Southwards, came at length to the Frontiers of the Roman Empire; the Suevi towards Italy, the Francs to the South-West, towards the Coast of Belgick-Gaul, and the Saxons to the West, towards the German Ocean. The Suevi especially were so terrible to the ancient Germans, that they look'd upon them as a Match for the immortal Gods, as Cæsar says in his Commentaries. As for the Francs, they are known to have over-run the whole Province of Gaul, and founded the noble and ancient Kingdom of France.

The Saxons possess'd themselves of all those Tracts of Land lying between the Rhine and the Elbe. Their Territories bounded on the West by the German Ocean, extended Eastward to the Borders of Thuringia. Consequently they were masters of Saxony, Westphalia, and all that part of the Low-Countries lying North of the Rhine. The Nations subdu'd by these Conquerors were in time called Saxons, in like manner as the Inhabitants of Gaul were named François or French, after their Subjection to the Francs. But however, whether the Saxons were not so rapid in their Conquests as the Suevi, or the Couste they took made it longer before they approach'd the Romans, 'tis certain they were not so soon known. The first Roman Historians that mention them, at least by the Name of Saxons, are Eutropius and Orysius, who inform us that Caracallus (as I have elsewhere taken notice) was sent to clear the Seas of the pyrratical Francs and Saxons. From that time they became formidable to the Romans, and oblig'd them to keep standing Forces to guard both the German and British Coasts, with a General Officer fill'd the Præfectus, or Count of the Saxon Coast. Upon the Decline of the Roman Empire, after the Death of Theodorus, the Saxons taking Advantage of it, weaken'd, made themselves Masters of the whole Country along the Coast of the German Ocean, and even extended their Conquests as far as the Isles of Zealand. Hence the Frisians, Batavians, and the neighbouring Nations were hardly known by any other Name but that of the Saxons.

Tho' several Authors have writ of the Saxons, we are still in the Dark as to their Original, or how to distinguish the Nations call'd by that general Name. And therefore the beginning of their History remains very confus'd and intricate, it being almost impossible it should be otherwise, considering Authors for the most Part have made no Distinction of Times or Places. One while, they are consider'd just as they left their own Country, and then are confounded with the Francs and Suevi, under the Name of Cimbri. Another while, they are view'd as beginning their Conquests towards the North-west of the Continent, and then they are represented as seated North of the Frisians, Batavians, Maryians, and other Nations of those Parts subject to the Romans. Some have placed them at once along the Coast of the German Ocean, and Banks of the Rhine, and even in the Isles of Zealand, as if they had from the very first inhabited these Regions. Others again, not considering that all their Conquests were term'd Saxony, and finding Saxons in the eastern Parts of Westphalia, have imagin'd they were a different People from those inhabiting on the Rhine. Just as if speaking of the Francs, I should make different Nations of those that conquer'd Gaul and those that settled in the Narbonnaise. However this be, it is certain when the Britons sent to desire their Assistance, the Saxons were in Possession of Westphalia, Saxony, East and West-Friseland, Holland and Zeeland.

I could wish the Origin of the Saxons were as well known as their Conquests: it would be a Pleasure to give here an Abstract of their History to the Time of their settling in Great-Britain. But the Thing is impossible, such Obscurity do we meet with in the Authors that have treated this Subject. Some take up the Saxons at the Tower of Babel, and leading them from Country to Country, settle them at last in Saxony, so call'd from them. Others derive them from the Saca or Sassanes of Asia, mention'd by Pliny. There are who will have them to be originally from Perfia, because of the Affinity between several Saxon and Perfian Words (1). But they that are willing to spare the Pains of so laborious a Search, are content to begin their History from the time of their coming forth from the Cimbrian Chersonesus. It is not impossible, perhaps, to reconcile most of the Opinions concerning this Matter, tho' seemingly very different, if Regard be had to the Times of their several Migrations. But since, in the main, Conjectures only are to be had, it is better to proceed at once to what is more certain.

The Saxons had for some time been in Possession of the Angles, Cimbrian Chersonesus, when driven thence by the Goths, (from whom that Peninsula was call'd Gothland or Jutland) they came and settled in Germany, in the Parts now call'd Lower-Saxony. Between that Country and the Chersonesus, were a People known by the Name of Angles, inhabiting about Sleswick in Holstein. Probably the little Country of Anglen in those Parts was so nam'd from them,

(1) Joseph Scaliger says, that Fader, Muder, Bruder, Tuteller, Band, and the like are still us'd in the Perfian Language, in the same Sense as Father, Mother, Brother, Daveller, Band are with us.

Deities (1). They had also Gods; to whom they attributed the same Powers the Greeks and Romans did to their Apollo and Diana. But seeing the Druids, who had the sole Management of Religious Affairs, never committed any of their Mysteries to Writing, it is no wonder we know nothing more concerning their Worship and Ceremonies, than what has already been taken notice of in the Introduction.

The Conversion of the Britons, as the Britons were converted by Joseph of Arimathea. Main. de Antiqu. Gloucest. Eccles.

Though it be difficult to know the precise time; yet all agree the Gospel was preached in Great-Britain soon after our Saviour's Death. But those who place this Event in the Reign of Tiberius, don't confider the first Gentile, in the Reign of Tiberius, don't converted till the Year of our Lord 40, that is, three Years after the Death of that Emperor. Barnabas, upon the questionable Authority of Simon Metaphrastes (2), which he himself justly rejects on several other Occasions, says, St. Peter first preached to the Britons. This Opinion is the more improbable, because it is certain St. Peter performed the Office of an Apostle chiefly in the Eastern Countries. Others affirm, that Simon Zelotes, one of the twelve Apostles, undertook the Conversion of the Britons. Nicéphorus Callistus (3), Dorabeus, in his Synopsis, and the Greek Calendar (4) say, this Apostle was crucified and buried in Britain. At the same time we find in the Roman Martyrology, and in those of Bede, Adon, and Usuard, that St. Simon suffered Martyrdom in Persia.

Whether the Britons were converted by Joseph of Arimathea. Main. de Antiqu. Gloucest. Eccles.

The most current Opinion for some time was, that Joseph of Arimathea first preach'd to the Britons. Tho' this Tradition, supported by the sole Testimony of William of Malmshury, a Writer of the XIIIth Century, stands upon no better Foundation than those above-mention'd, it has however been deem'd incontestable. Malmshury, in proof of the Antiquity of the Church of Gloucest or Glaffenbury, says, after Freulphus, that upon the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, the Apostles were dispersed throughout the whole World. St. Philip, (continues the Historian) at his coming among the Franks, sent twelve of his Disciples, with Joseph of Arimathea as their Head, to propagate the Gospel in Great-Britain, where they arrived in the Year of our Lord 61. After some Opposition from the Inhabitants, a certain King gave them a little Spot of Ground, surrounded with Fens and Bushes to dwell in. Not long after, two other neighbouring Kings having allowed them twelve Hydes of Land for their Subsistence, the Angel Gabriel commanded them from God, to build a Church in the Place now call'd Gloucest, but at that time Inquadrin (5). This Church was finished in the Year 63, and, as the Historian adds, was dedicated to our Saviour himself, as a Mark of Distinction, to the Virgin Mary. In proof of this Relation in the first Place, is produced a Manuscript Chronicle in the Abbey of Glaffenbury, in which it appears that the King's Name, who made the first Present to Joseph, was Aviragus. To this may be answer'd, that indeed Isidore mentions a British King by that Name in the Reign of Dominian. But this is nothing to the purpose, unless it can be proved that Aviragus lived in the time of Nero, since it is supposed the Land the Church stood upon was given to Joseph in the Year 61. In the next place is alleg'd St. Patrick's Charter, wherein it is said, that Gloucest Church was founded by twelve Disciples of St. James and St. Philip the Apostles. But besides several Marks of Forgery, there is no mention in this Charter of Joseph of Arimathea. In the third Place is produc'd a Charter of Ina King of the West-Saxons, who lived in the VIIIth Century, which makes the Church of Gloucest the most antient of all the British Churches. But neither in this Charter, whose authenticity is still more questionable, is there any mention of Joseph. To strengthen all these Proofs, a Charter of Henry II. King of England is produc'd, wherein King Henry, being grounded only upon the foregoing Proofs, is not to be regarded. Moreover it is certain, that the Franks were unknown at the time St. Philip is said to come into their Country. Besides, Eusebius and several others affirm, that this Apostle went and preached in Phrygia, and suffered Martyrdom at Hierapolis. Then for the Hydelands given to the Disciples of the Apostles, the Word Hyde alone is a sufficient Refutation of that Story, since it is a Saxon Term; and every one knows the Saxons came not to Britain till the Year 449. I think it needless to dwell any longer upon this Subject. Whoever has a Mind to see the Reasons more at large against this Tradition of Joseph of Arimathea, will find them in Collins's Ecclesiastical History.

Though the exact time of the Conversion of the Britons, The Britons were converted by Joseph of Arimathea. Main. de Antiqu. Gloucest. Eccles. is very uncertain, it is very probable the Gospel was preached in the Island not long after the Death of Christ. Theodoret assures us, the Britons were converted by the Apostles. Eusebius speaking of the Dangers the Apostles were exposed to in propagating the Gospel in the most remote Countries, mentions among the rest, the British Isles. Now the likeliest time to be assigned for the Conversion of the Britons, if it was in the Apostle's Days, is that between the Victory of Claudius and the Defeat of Boadicea. For at the time of the General Revolt, there were in the Island above 80,000 Romans, among whom very probably were some Christians, the Gospel having now got footing in many places, particularly at Rome. Upon this Supposition, there is no Absurdity in asserting with several modern Authors, that St. Paul first preach'd the Gospel in Britain. It is certain this Apostle, in the eight Years between his first Imprisonment at Rome, and his Return to Jerusalem, propagated the Christian Religion in several Places, especially in the Western Countries. He informs us of his Design of going to Spain; and it is not unlikely but his Desire of converting the Britons might carry him into their Island. This Opinion may be supported by the Testimony of Venantius Fortunatus in his Poem upon the Life of St. Martin, where he speaks of the Travels of St. Paul (6). But after all, these are only Conjectures, and of no other use but to make it more credible that the Gospel was planted in Britain soon after the Death of our Lord.

But supposing this Opinion were proved beyond all Dispute, it may be presumed the Christian Faith had taken no deep root in the Island; since, according to several Authors, Lucius a British King, sent Ambassadors to Pope Eleutherius to desire him to send over some Missionaries to instruct him in the Christian Religion. Now is it likely that Lucius should send so far for what he might have had in his own Country, had there been at that time any Churches, or even any considerable number of Christians, in Britain? However this be, Lucius having some Knowledge of the Christian Religion, and desiring to be more fully instructed, sends Eliwan and Medwin to Eleutherius the twelfth Bishop of Rome, to crave the wanted Assistance. Eleutherius very joyfully embraces the Opportunity of replanting Christianity in Great-Britain, where, probably it had been rooted out by the Violence of Persecutions. He immediately sets about instructing Eliwan and Medwin the two Ambassadors; and after baptizing and consecrating them Bishops, sends them back to their own Country. By their Means the Gospel flourish'd again in Britain, where it afterwards spread far and wide. I omit the many things that are said of this Lucius, particularly his building great Numbers of Churches in London, because it is not likely the Romans would suffer it. Neither shall I say any thing of his Travels, wherein he is said to convert several Nations, especially the Grisons, in whose Country he was martyred, there being no Grounds for these Things. It is possible however some Christian named Lucius might preach the Gospel to the Grisons, and suffer Martyrdom at Cair.

From the Conversion of Lucius to the Dioctian Persecution, the Ecclesiastical History of Britain is entirely unknown. It is very probable however, that during that Interval of eighty Years, the Christian Religion made great Progress in the Island, as appears from Tertullian, Origen, Bede, and Gildas. But what puts the thing out of all dispute, is, the Multitude of British Martyrs that suffered during the dreadful Persecution under Dioctian and Maximian his Colleague. Among these Martyrs St. Alban converted at Verulam (7) by a Priest, whom he had harbored in his House, is reckon'd the first. He was followed by Gildas, a great many more, as History informs us. How well inclined soever Constantius Chlorus might be to favour the Christians, he could not, whilst Governor of Britain, dispense with the Edicts of the Emperors, having then the Title of Cæsar only, which gave him no Power to oppose their Laws. But as soon as he came to the Empire, he put a stop to this violent Persecution, and gave the Christians some respite. Constantine his Son did yet more, for under him the Christian Religion flourish'd throughout the Roman Empire, particularly in Great-Britain, where some pretend he was born.

After this happy Change the Christians multiplied exceedingly, and the Island abounded with Churches. Some affirm there were British Bishops at the Council of Nice in 325. But though this cannot be sufficiently prov'd, it is not at all unlikely, since twenty-two Years after there were for certain three British Bishops at the Council of Arles (1); as there were also some at the Council of Ariminum in 359, but so poor that their Charges were borne by their Brethren (2). Their signing at this Council the Confession of Faith, wherein the Term Consubstantial was omitted, gave Occasion to some to imagine that Arianism was spread in Britain. But a modern Author has made it appear that the Faith of the British Church was the same in this Respect both before and after this Council, which had not the Effect the Hereticks promised themselves.

The British Church was much more justly accused of Pelagianism. Certain it is, several Bishops were seduced, not by Pelagius himself, who, though a Native of Britain, never returned to propagate his Errors, but by Agricola one of his Disciples. The Orthodox Bishops perceiving the Infection to spread, sent to desire their Brethren in Gaul to assist them in confuting this Heresy. The Gaulish Prelates touch'd with the Danger of the British Church, met in Council, and deputed Germanus Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus Bishop of Troye to go and assist their Brethren in Britain. At Verulam, in a Conference with the Pelagians, they defended the Truth with such Strength and Evidence, that they turn'd many from their Errors. But after their Departure, the Hereticks gaining Ground again, Germanus was desired once more to come over. Though he was now very old, he undertook a second Voyage into Britain, in Company with Severus Bishop of Troye. Germanus despairing to convince the Hereticks by Arguments, because of their Obstinacy, caused the Edict of Valentinian III, that condemns all Hereticks to Banishment, to be put in Execution against them. Before he left Britain, he erected Schools, which produced afterwards many Bishops famous for their Learning and Piety.

From this time to the Arrival of the Saxons we know but little of the Affairs of the British Church. No doubt the frequent Wars with the Picts and Scots, by destroying their Churches, and what is worse, by introducing a Corruption of Manners among the Clergy as well as Laiety, were very prejudicial to the Christians. However, if we may believe Gildas and Bede, it was not so much the Wars as the excessive Plenty immediately after the Famine, that corrupted the Manners of the Britons. The People, say these Historians, from a State of extreme Want, being on a sudden surrounded with Plenty, abandon'd themselves to all manner of Wickedness. The quiet they enjoyed by their Peace with the northern Nations, was spent only in sinking deeper into Excess and Debauchery. The Clergy out-doing even the Laiety, became exceeding vicious. Gluttony, Drunkenness, Avarice, Luxury, reigning among the Ecclesiasticks, they no longer preach'd to their Flocks the Precepts of the Gospel, which they themselves so little regarded. To this general Corruption, according to these two Historians, are to be ascrib'd the Calamities which fell upon the British Nation, and which are the Subject of the following Book.

(1) The Council of Arles was in 314, about twelve Years before this Council of Nice. The three Bishops are suppos'd to be Thos of London, Tork, and probably Caerleon. They had with them a Priest and a Deacon.
(2) Du Puy says, the Bishops of France and Britain chose rather to bear their own Expences than accept of the Emperor's Allowance, which they thought was beneath them. But it's more likely they accepted of the Emperor's Allowance, since they were but poorly endow'd under the Roman Emperors. And this perhaps may be the Reason why we find so few of them at any of those Councils that were held beyond the Seas.

BOOK II.

From the Arrival of the SAXONS to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales. Containing about the Space of a Hundred and Thirty Years.

The Britons
and Saxons call in us their Aid

N a desperate Disease, a desperate Remedy is us'd without scruple, because the Benefit only is consider'd that may be receiv'd by it. The Britons, tho' frequent Sufferers by the Incurions of the Saxons, fix'd their Thoughts solely on the Valour of that Nation, believing them alone capable of freeing them from their present Calamities. Had there been a Choice to make, perhaps they would have weigh'd the Inconveniences as well as Conveniences of calling in the Saxons to their Aid. But as they had no other Course to take, they never attended to what a just Fear might have suggested to them. Besides, Vortigern strove to divert them from the Considerations that might have induc'd them to alter their Resolution, by carefully displaying the Advantages that would be procur'd by the Assistance of the Saxons. By feeding their Hopes with his flattering Speeches, he prevented them from maturely reflecting on the Consequences of their Proceedings. Every Man therefore being wholly intent upon freeing himself from the present Evils, the Ambassadors were sent away in all haste, and the Negotiation strongly recommended to their Care, on the Success whereof entirely depended, as they imagin'd, the Safety of their Country. The Dominion of the Saxons reach'd then to the German Ocean, and their Conquests had been carried even into Zealand. Upon the Arrival of the British Ambassadors, Witigisl, General of the Saxons, having called an Assembly, to hear what they had to propose, the Head of the Ambassy made the following Speech:

Their Speech to the Saxons.

" Illustrious and Generous Saxons, the Britons, haras'd and oppress'd by the continual Inroads of the Picts and Saets, their Neighbours and Enemies, send us to you to implore your Assistance. The Fame of your Victories has reach'd our Ears. We are sensible your Arms are irresistible, and therefore are come to sue for your Protection. Britain for many Years made a considerable Part of the Roman Empire; but our Masters having abandon'd us, we know no Nation more powerful than " your selves, or better able to protect us. Grant but our Request, and in return we offer All that a rich and fertile Country, such as ours is, can afford. Put what Price you please on our Protection: We shall submit to what Terms you yourselves shall judge reasonable, provided by your Aid we are enabled to drive the Enemy out of our Country." (1)

The Britons having thus declared the Cause of their coming, the Saxon General return'd this short Answer; " Be assured the Saxons will stand by you in your pressing Necessities." So favorable an Answer inspiring the Ambassadors with hopes of Success in their Negotiation, they us'd their utmost Endeavours to bring it to a speedy Conclusion. At last, they had the Satisfaction to obtain an Aid of nine thousand Men, on certain Terms, the principal whereof was, That the Saxons should be put in Possession of the Isle of Thanet, adjacent to Kent, where they were to land, and their Troops paid and maintain'd by the Britons.

Britain was not unknown to the Saxons. They had long before begun to render themselves formidable to the Eastern Coasts of the Island, where they had even made several Defcents. If they had not yet attempted any Conquests there, it was because those they had undertaken on the Continent were thought to be of more Importance. It may be too, as they were hitherto ignorant of the Weakness of the Britons, they were afraid of engaging in any great Enterprize. However this be, the present Ambassy, at such a Juncture, was extremely proper to raise a Desire to settle in their Country. The Britons were themselves the Discoverers of their Weakness. On the other Hand, the Saxons were now seated along the Coasts of the German Ocean, from whence they might always have an Eye to what pass'd in Britain. It is no wonder therefore, if without much Deliberation, they promis'd their Assistance to the Britons, since they intended to improve so fair an Opportunity of settling in the Island. Hengist and Horsa (2), both Sons of Witigisl, were appointed to command the Troops design'd for the Aid of the Britons.

Hengist

Hengist was about thirty Years old. He first bore Arms under his Father Witigisl; after which, for his Improvement in the Art of War, he went and served in the Roman Armies, where the Emperors generally kept some Saxon Troops in their Pay. This young Warrior was endow'd with all the necessary Qualifications for accomplishing the Undertaking committed to his Management. His Valour and Experience, the Solidity of his Judgment, his Address, his easy and engaging Behavior warrant in some Measure his Success. All these excellent Qualities determin'd the Saxon General to procure for his Son so fair an occasion to display his Talents. As for his Brother Horsa, nothing particular is said of him.

The Saxons, notwithstanding their Promise, did not think proper to send over at once so considerable a Body of Forces as nine Thousand Men, into a Country but imperfectly known to them. Wherefore, pretending the reef were not ready by reason of their great Distance from the Place of Imbarcation, they caused only a Part to be put on board three Vessels (1). The very Name of these Vessels plainly enough demonstrates they could hold but a very inconsiderable Number (2). The Historians have not expressly mark'd the Place of this first Imbarcation. It may very probably be conjectur'd to have been in Zealand, as that Country was then in the Possession of the Saxons. Besides, it would have been difficult to chuse a more convenient Place, or one nearer the Isle of Thanet, where these Forces were to land.

Vortigern, having his own, much more than the Nation's Interest at Heart, was highly delighted with the Success of his Ambassy. He was not ignorant how his Subjects stood affected towards him. And this no less than the Desire of repelling the common Enemy had moved him to sue for the Assistance of the Saxons, flattering himself that he should easily engage these Foreigners to grant him a particular Protection. With this View and Expectation he goes to the Sea-side and waits their coming, to prepossess them in his Favour, by his Civility and Respect.

Mean while, Hengist and Horsa setting sail, arrive at Ebbsfleet in the Isle of Thanet. These first Saxon Troops are said by most Historians to land in the Year 449, though by some this Event is placed a few Years sooner or later. Vortigern receives his new Friends with extraordinary Careless, putting them immediately in possession of the Isle according to Agreement. When they had refreshed themselves a little, he led them against the Picts and Scots that were advanc'd as far as Stamford in Lincolnshire. In the first Battle, the Islanders according to Custom, began with throwing their Darts, which made but little Impression on warlike Troops that despised that way of fighting. The Saxons having stood this first Charge without the least Motion, advanced in good Order, and coming to close fight, quickly routed Enemies already terrified by their very Looks. The northern Men frighted at the Sight of these Foreigners, and forc'd to engage in a different Manner from what they were used to, made but a faint Resistance, and soon left their new Enemies in possession of the Field of Battle. Their future Attempts had no better Success, and in all their Encounters with the Saxons, they were continually worsted. Being quite discouraged by these frequent Defeats, they abandon their Conquests by degrees, and retire into their Country, dreading nothing so much as engaging with the Saxons.

Vortigern was overjoy'd to see his Projects succeed thus far so happily. But his main Point, the winning the Saxons to his particular Interest, was yet unexecuted. To that end, he presents the two Saxon Brothers with some Lands in Lincolnshire, where they gave the Enemies the first repulse (3). But if Vortigern was pursuing his Ends, Hengist was no less mindful of his own Interest. The Moment he perceives the Weakness of the Britons, he entertains Hopes of procuring a Settlement in Britain, and begins to lay his Measures accordingly. But he must proceed by degrees, and find means to execute his Design, without discovering his Intentions. The Lands given him by Vortigern, furnish him with an Opportunity to cause the Britons to fall into the Snare he intends to lay for them. He represents to the King, that the Service he was doing the Britons in the North, keeping him at a Distance from the Isle of Thanet, he had no Place to secure the Booty taken from the Enemies, and therefore had reason to fear that whilst he was employed in the northern Wars, he might be depriv'd of the Fruits of his Labours. For this Cause, he desires leave to build a little Fort somewhere on the Lands lately given him. Vortigern, who sought all Occasions to please him, readily complies with his Request. If Hengist most of the Historians may be credited, he only desired to wall in as much Land as an Ox-hide could surround, which being granted, he cut the Hide into small Thongs, and enclosing with them a Space large enough for his purpose, hastily ran up a Fort, before the Britons had time to oppose it. This Circumstance seems to be confirmed by the Name of the Fort itself, Thong-cafter (4), that is, the Castle of Thongs (5). It may indeed be objected, that the Name of this Castle gave occasion to apply it to the Story Juffin Jul. 1. 18. relates of Dido when going to build Carthage. But on the other hand, Hengist whilst he served in the Roman Armies, might, very possibly, be informed of this Artifice of Dido's, and practise it in Britain.

The Britons seeing a Castle built in the Heart of their Country, begin to murmur against their King, and suspect him of secretly favoring the Saxons. These Murmurs gave Hengist Opportunity, who had now divid'd into Vortigern's private Intentions, to make an Advantage of that Prince's Circumstances. He represents to them, "That the Britons are grown so insolent since their Deliverance from their Enemies, that they only wait an Opportunity to rob him of his Crown and give it to another." That this Intimation, coming from good Hands, ought to make him sensible that the Rebellion of his Subjects is no less to be feared, than the Invasion of the Picts and Scots, and therefore advises him to secure himself from the approaching Storm, by sending for more Saxons, and strengthening himself with their Aid against the ill Practices of his Subjects. The rest of the Saxons, (continues he,) design'd for the Assistance of Britain are all ready, and only wait your Orders." Vortigern gladly embraces this Advice, which suits so well with his Projects. Instead of raising Objections, he himself presses the Saxon General to execute a Design which to him seems so advantageous. Hengist having thus obtain'd Vortigern's Consent, desires his Father Witigisl to send over the rest of the Forces out of Hand. He acquaints him with the Fruitfulness of the Country, and Efficacy of the Inhabitants, assuring him, if the Saxons wisely improved this Opportunity, they might hope for a Settlement in Britain, no less advantageous and glorious than what they enjoy'd in Germany. Witigisl, who had great Expectations from his Son's Expedition, sends the desired Supplies without Delay. He equips sixteen large Vessels to transport the Forces, and with them sends Elicus and Raena, eldest Son and Niece (6) of Hengist. This second Body of Saxons arriv'd in Britain in 450, about a Year after the first.

As soon as the British Monarch and the Saxon General saw themselves thus strengthened, they behav'd in a very different Manner to the Britons from what they had done before. Vortigern grown more powerful, renders himself more absolute. He treats his Subjects with great Haughtiness, and thereby more strongly confirms their Suspicions of him. He even makes no scruple to assign Habitations for the new-comers, without ever advising with his Subjects. From that time, a strict Union is form'd between Vortigern and Hengist. They had need of each other for their mutual Defence against the Britons, who publicly express'd their Discontent.

Mean while, Hengist forgot nothing that could promote his Designs. Above all, he studies to know the Humor and Character of Vortigern, and easily perceives Love and Pleasure to be his predominant Passion. Accordingly he lays a Snare, which he thinks, the Monarch can hardly escape falling into. Having express'd on several Occasions, his Acknowledgments for the many Favors received at his Hands, he intreats him to honour him with his Company at Thong-cafter, where he earnestly desires to entertain him, and shew him some Marks of his Respect and Gratitude. Vortigern readily accepts of this Invitation, considering it as a fresh Means to strengthen the Friendship contracted with the Heads of the Saxons, and which is so expedient for him. Hengist receives him with all the Respect due to a great King, his Friend and Benefactor. A splendid and exquisite Entertainment is prepared for him, but nothing pleases the Royal Guest so much as the young Rewena, the greatest Beauty of her time. Hengist her Uncle, under colour of doing Honor to Portigern, but in reality that he might, during the Feast, feed his Eyes with so lovely an Object, order'd her to place her self just before the King. The Contrivance succeeded as Hengist expected. Portigern keeps his Eyes continually fix'd on Rouena, who by her Looks gives him to understand, she is not insensible of the Honor he does her. Hengist perceiving with Joy the sudden Effect of Rouena's Charms on the King, is unwilling to give his growing Passion time to cool. He makes a Sign to his Niece, who immediately going to the Side-Board, fills a Gold Cup with Wine, and presents it on her Knees to the King, saying in her Language, Liever Kynig, wass hal, that is, Dear King, your Health. Portigern agreeably surpris'd, turns to his Interpreter and asks what she said, and how he must answer her after the Saxon manner. Being informed, he looks very amorously on Rouena, and answers in Saxon, Drink Heal, that is, Do you yourself drink the Health. Whereupon, Rouena just putting the Cup to her Lips, presents it to the King, who taking it, rises up immediately and gives her a Salute. Rouena receives it in a very respectful manner, as sensible of the great Honor done her, and making a profound Reverence, withdraws, leaving the Monarch full of Love and Desire. This may be called a very fatal Moment for Britain, as will be seen hereafter. So true it is, the greatest Events spring sometimes from Things that appear at first of very little Consequence.

From that time Portigern's Thoughts are wholly employed how to secure the Possession of Rouena. Tho' he has a Wife, his Passion causing him to overlook all Obstacles, he demands her in Marriage. But Hengist, willing by Difficulties to inflame the King's Desires, answers, he cannot, contrary to the Custom of the Saxons, give his Niece to a Prince already married, adding, Rouena was not entirely in his disposal; and the Princes of his Nation, and particularly his Father, would not perhaps ever consent she should be married to a Christian Prince, how honorable soever the Alliance might be. But the amorous Portigern, who burns with excessive Desire to enjoy Rouena, finds Expedients to overcome all these Difficulties. He begins with divorcing his Wife, by whom he had several Children. Then he promises Rouena the free Exercise of her Religion, and to stop the Mouths of the Saxon Princes, whose Reproaches Hengist seems to fear, devises an Expedient, (or perhaps it is suggested to him) by which, as he imagines, he may reconcile Love and Policy. And this was to invest Hengist and Hersa with the Sovereignty of Kent, and give them leave to people it with Saxons. The Moment he came to this Resolution, all Obstacles began to vanish, and the politic Saxon, who had seem'd backward only to make the better Bargain, thought it time to give his Consent. He delivers therefore his Niece to the amorous Monarch, and takes Possession of Kent, magnifying this Proof of his Respect and Gratitude, as if the King were highly obliged to him. Portigern was so blinded by his Passion, that he thought himself a great Gainer by the Exchange (1). This Agreement was made so privately, that Gorergus (2), Prince or Governor of Kent, was dissatisfied before he could take any Measures to oppose it. So impatient was Portigern to conclude this fatal Bargain!

In vain did the Britons murmur against this Marriage, and complain of the King's Bounty. Hengist, regardless of their Murmurs, strengthen'd himself as much as possible in his new Sovereignty, considering withal of fresh means to aggrandize himself. But before he discover'd his Intention, he wanted to be out of danger from the Britons, who plainly shew'd how they stood affected towards him. Ever since it was known he intended to settle in the Island they could no longer rely on him, or rather, look'd upon him as a profess'd Enemy.

Whilst the Britons were venting their fruitless Complaints against their Monarch and the Saxons, Hengist was seriously thinking of his Concerns. Tho' he had a good Body of Troops under his Command, that was not sufficient to enable him to execute his vast Projects. He thought it proper therefore to conceal them till he was in condition to declare his Intentions. The Situation Portigern was in, made him hope it was not impossible to make that Prince subservient to his Designs, whilst he should imagine he was labouring only for himself. To that end, he pretended to be more attach'd than ever to his Person and Interest, and endeavour'd by sundry Means to persuade him he was entirely devoted to his Service. His Aim was to induce him gradually by these Marks of Affection, to be wholly guided by his Counsels. When he thought he had sufficiently gain'd his Confidence, he represented to him, "That his Subjects were displeased with him, and in all appearance waited only for a favorable Opportunity to execute the ill Designs they had form'd: That an Opportunity would infallibly offer when the Saxon Troops should be employ'd in the northern Wars; and then being destitute of the Assistance of his Friends, he would be in danger of being exposed to the Insults of those that hated him: That he pos'd to himself obliged to acquaint him, his Subjects thought himself obliged to acquaint him, his Subjects held Intelligence with Ambrosius Aurelianus, who was at the Court of Alfred King of Amorica, and probably had conspired to set that Prince on the Throne." There was some ground for Hengist's thus artfully hinting Danger Portigern was in from Ambrosius. That Prince was of Roman Extraction, and according to the general Opinion, Son of one of the Monarchs elected by the Britons after the Departure of the Romans (3). As he was very young when his Father died, his Youth screen'd him from the Jealousy of those that ascended the Throne immediately or shortly after. But it was otherwise when Portigern came to the Crown. A strong Party being form'd in favour of Ambrosius, the new Monarch was so filled with Suspicions, that he sought means to destroy the young Prince. The Danger Ambrosius was exposed to obliging him to quit Britain, he retir'd to Aldron his Relation, where he was waiting for a favorable Opportunity to come and head his Party. This being the Case between Portigern and Ambrosius, what the Saxon Prince said could not but make deep Impression on his Mind.

By these continual Marks of a seemingly disinterested Friendship, Hengist led the British Monarch by degrees to seek of his own accord, the means he design'd to furnish him with, namely, the sending for a greater Number of Saxon Troops. His Aim was to put himself in condition to have nothing to fear from the Britons, and withal to be independent of the King; which he could not attain to but by the means he intended. Portigern, despairing ever to regain the Affection of his Subjects, and considering Ambrosius, tho' absent, as a very dangerous Rival, saw his whole Refuge lay in the Saxon Prince, whom he deem'd his best Friend, and accordingly to him it was he applied for Advice and Assistance. Hengist tells him, "All the Saxons in Britain are at his Devotion, but their Number is too inconsiderable to protect him." Adding, "The Britons, in all likelihood, will not fail to show their Discontent, whilst the Saxons are in the North, and therefore he sees but one way to secure the King from their Plots, which is, to send for more Saxons to be commanded by trusty Leaders, who will implicitly follow his Orders." This Advice being agreeable to Portigern's Intentions, he immediately clothes with it. Hengist promises to send the new Troops into the North, against the Picts and Scots, whilst he stays himself in Kent to have an Eye upon the Malecontents. This Precaution seem'd very proper to prevent the Insurrection of the Britons, who by that means would be hemm'd in by the Saxon Forces.

Hengist having obtained the King's Consent, sent for a Fleet of forty Ships, conducted by Oda his Brother, who brought with him his Son Ebulf, and a great Number of Saxon Troops. These New-Comers begin with ravaging the Orkneys, then making a Descent on the Coasts of the Picts, oblige the Inhabitants to retire Northwards. As soon as the Picts had thus deserted part of their Country, the Saxons seated themselves there so strongly, that it was not possible to dispossess them. At first they settled on the North-side of the Time towards the East. Afterwards they advanced towards the South, and drove the Britons beyond the Humber; but this was done by degrees. This third Body of Saxons arriv'd in 452, three Years after the First. With these fresh Supplies, Hengist found himself strong enough to be in no great fear of any Attempt from the Britons: Nay, he began to show less Respect for Portigern, and under colour of wanting frequent Recruits to keep up the Number of his Forces, sent for continual Supplies from Germany without asking his Leave. At length he throws away the Mask, and making bitter Complaints that the Saxons were not duly paid according to Agreement, boldly demands the Arrears, threatening without prompt and full Payment, to do himself Justice.

The Britons, surpris'd at these Menaces, and greatly mortified to see Hengist in a condition to do as he proudly threatened, began to rouse themselves, and think of means to free themselves from these Foreigners. Portigern, eldest Son of Portigern, had beheld hitherto with extreme Regret, how the Saxons, by his Father's Fault, strengthen'd themselves daily, and had very much dreaded the Consequences thereof. As soon as he saw the Britons in Emotion, he improv'd the Opportunity, and represented to the leading Men that it was time to apply an effectual Remedy to the Evils they lay under. He told them, his Father's Cowardice, or perhaps Treachery, had been the Occasion of the Saxons becoming so powerful: that it was necessary therefore to prevent Vortigern from heaping any more Favours on these Foreigners, to the Prejudice of the British Nation, which was in danger of being over-run, if Measures were not taken to put a Stop to their growing Power. The Britons, convinc'd by these Reasons, awak'd at last out of their Lethargy, and by Vortimer's Instigations, the most powerful of them having entered into a private Confederacy, of which Vortigern had not the least Notice, suddenly compell'd him to make his Son Partner with him in the Government, and to leave the Administration of Affairs to his Care. The Plot was so well laid, that in an Instant Vortigern saw himself without either Fortrels, or Troops, or Credit, and constrain'd to do whatever was desir'd, he not having time to call the Saxons to his Aid. As he had not mistrust'd his own Son, he had taken no care to guard against him. Thus Vortimer was invest'd with the whole royal Authority, leaving his Father only the empty Title of King without any Power (1).

(1) This Story of Rouena is the least authentic, for not being mention'd by Bede or Gildas, and related by Malmesbury as a Romance only.

The new Monarch found no great Difficulty to persuade the Britons, that nothing but Force could drive the Saxons out of their Country. It was too plain, from their Proceedings, that they did not design to go away voluntarily. The War therefore being resolv'd, the Britons made Preparations to rid themselves of their Guests, whom they look'd upon as their mortal Enemies. Hengiſt, for his part, finding he was like to have a fierce War upon his Hands, made haste and concluded a Peace with the Picts, who were proud of having for Allies Men so formidable for their Arms. This Precaution enabled him to make a powerful Diversion in the North by the Help of the Picts, assisted by the Saxons lately settled in those Parts. As for Kent, Hengiſt look'd upon himself to be strong enough there to make head against Vortimer, who was preparing to attack him.

I am now going to enter upon the Recital of a War, which, after numberless Engagements, render'd the Saxons Masters of Britain. An Event so remote from the Expectations of the Britons when they sent for the Saxons to assist them, affords Matter of Wonder and Admiration at the Short-sightedness of Men, and the Uncertainty of their Counsels! But before I relate the Issue of this War, it will be proper to acquaint the Reader that he is not to expect a full and particular Account of Matters. Historians have been contented with relating some certain Facts, which just serve to carry on the Thread of the History, but hardly give us a general Idea of that Revolution which peopled Britain with new Inhabitants, and introduced a new Face of Things over the whole Island.

The Britons and Saxons being prepar'd for War, were not long before they came to an Engagement. In the first Campaign, the two Armies met at Egleyford (2) in Kent, the Saxons being commanded by Hengiſt and Horſa, and the Britons by Vortimer. The first Battle, according to the Historians, was very bloody. Hengiſt lost Horſa (3) his Brother, and with his own Hand slew Catigern (4), youngest Brother of Vortimer. If we may believe the British Historians, Vortimer not only obtain'd a complete Victory over the Saxons, but driving Hengiſt as far as the Isle of Thanet, compell'd him to embark and fly into Germany. But by what follow'd after this Battle, it is evident, if the Saxons were not victorious, at least they were not vanquish'd (5), since all their Historians unanimously affirm, that this very Year 455, immediately after the Battle, Hengiſt first took upon him the Title of King of Kent, which doubtless he would not have done, had he been defeated and obliged to fly into Germany.

One must not be surpris'd to find so great Contrariety among the Historians concerning Events so remote from our Time; when even the Authors that write of what has pass'd in our Days, very rarely agree in Facts, which, by their late Date, might easily be known.

Two Years after, another Battle was fought near Crecanford (6) in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated with the Loss of more than 4000 Men and his best Officers. Not being able to keep the Field, he was forced to shut himself up in London, till he could draw another Army together. In the mean while Hengiſt, to strike the greater Terror into the Britons, ravag'd the Country in a merciless manner. They that were most expos'd to the Fury of the Saxons, quitted their Houses, and fled to the Woods for Refuge. Some abandon'd their Country, and retir'd into Armorica, wherethey were civilly receiv'd by King Aldern. During these Devastations, the very Churches were not spared, but all that were in the Neighbourhood of the Saxons were reduc'd to Ashes. These barbarous Pagans, joining to their natural Fierceness a Religious Zeal, thought they honoured their Gods, by inhumanly treating the Christians, especially the Ecclesiasticks, who were the most cruelly dealt with.

The Britons being reduc'd to this Extremity, their Chiefs assembled themselves to consider of Means to prevent their total Ruin. Guithelin, Archbishop of London, and Head of Ambrosius's Party, advis'd them to apply to the King of Armorica for Assistance. He represent'd to them, "that as Aldern had always shown great Civilities to the Britons, "there was room to hope he would not abandon them in "this their pressing Necessity." Adding, "that since Vortigern and Vortimer were no longer to be depended upon, he thought it necessary to invite over Ambrosius Aurelianus, "who being sprung from illustrious Angles, and having all "the Qualifications to be desir'd in a General, would, in all "Probability, by his Valour and Conduct, free them from "their present Danger." As they had always hated Vortigern, and, since his last Defeat, were disaffected with Vortimer, the common, though unjust Fate of vanquish'd Generals, they readily embrac'd the Archbishop's Advice, and desir'd him to go himself and negotiate the Affair; which he gladly undertook, as enabling him to accomplish a Design he had long been forming. He sets out immediately for Armorica, and laying before Aldern the deplorable Condition of the Britons, obtains with Ease the Aid he demanded. Aldern, who had so generously receiv'd all the fugitive Britons, was willing to give the Nation a further Proof of his friendship, by granting them an Aid of Ten thousand Men. He plac'd Ambrosius at their Head, who conducted them safely to Totness. This General was received with great Demonstrations of Joy, being look'd upon as the only Support of the sinking Britons. But this Joy was not universal: Vortimer's Party, still powerful, consider'd Ambrosius as one come to usurp the Crown, under colour of defending it. G. Monm. And Vortimer himself threaten'd to punish severely those that should join him. Thus the miserable Britons, always a Prey to their intestine Divisions, instead of uniting against the common Enemy, prepared to destroy one another.

Mean while, Ambrosius and Guithelin perceiving the Conjunction to be favourable, conspir'd the Ruin of Vortigern and Vortimer. They began with representing to their Party, "that vain were the Hopes of driving out the Saxons, under the "conduct of these two Kings, the Son being a Prince "without Courage or Experience, and the Father an Enemy to the Nation, as appear'd by his strict Union with "the Enemies of the State; not to mention his excessive Liberalities, which oblig'd his Subjects to take the Administration out of his Hands. That in vain therefore were "their Preparations to drive out the Foreigners, if these two domestic Enemies were not first destroy'd, who were in "Arms only to favour and assist them." On the other hand, Vortigern and Vortimer told their Friends, "that Ambrosius, under Pretence of assisting, was come to subdue "them: That the Archbishop was an ambitious Man, who "fought to put the Crown on the Head of Ambrosius, only "to get the Administration of the Government into his own Hands, than which, such was his Arrogance, nothing "should more be dreaded by the Britons: That they must "willingly shut their Eyes not to see, that the Designs of these two Heads of their Party, were directly opposite to "the Good of the Kingdom: That instead of marching "their fysh Troops against the Saxons, they had done no "thing since their Arrival, but cabal'd with the People, and taken Measures to oppress those who were in Arms for the Defence of their Country."

The mutual Animosity of the two Parties was so violent, that they soon came to Blows, each preferring his private to the publick Interest. The first Battle was fought near Catwaleph (7) in Cernmarthenſhire. As it is difficult from the confus'd Accounts of Historians, to know on which side Victory inclin'd in this and several other Engagements, I shall only observe, that the Civil Wars lasted till the Year 465, to the great weakening of the Britons, whilst the Saxons had time to strengthen themselves both in Kent and beyond the Humbar. To so wretched a State were the Britons at last reduc'd, that Numbers of them, harass'd one while by the Civil War, another while by the Saxons, abandon'd their native Country, where they could no longer subsist. A Dutch Writer informs us, that some of those unfortunate Wretches going on board of a Gallies, and rowing toward the Mouth of the Rhine, landed at Catwaleph near Leyden, where they settled by the Sea-side in an old Roman Camp, to which they gave the Name of Brittenburge.

Thus Britain for seven or eight Years suffer'd all the Calamities of a Civil War. At length the wisest of both Parties, considering their Diffension would be the Cause of their common Ruin, made up the Breach by parting the Kingdom between the contending Princes. The two British Kings had the Eastern, and Ambrosius the Western Part, divided from

476. Ambrosius, as soon as he saw himself sole Monarch of the Britons, assum'd the Imperial Purple, after the manner of the Roman Emperors, creating at the same time Prince Arthur, who had signaliz'd himself in the War by many brave Actions, a Patrician (1). Could Britain have been fav'd, it would doubtless have been so by these two great Princes, who had all the Qualities of the most celebrated Heroes in an eminent Degree. But its Fate was determin'd. This noble Country was defin'd to undergo an extraordinary Revolution, and become a Prey to the Saxons. All that Ambrosius and Arthur could do, was to put off its Ruin for a Time.

Mean while, Hengist was not a little perplex'd to see his Country quite despoiled; for the Inhabitants refusing to live under a Prince that had given such evident Proofs of his Treachery and Cruelty, retir'd in Crowds into the other Provinces; so that his new Dominions were of no Use to him, there not being Hands enough to cultivate the Lands. In this Perplexity, he resolv'd to fend for Ellas, a Saxon General, from Germany, promising Part of the Territories granted him by Vortigern. Ellas receiv'd the Offer with Joy, and shortly after arriv'd in Britain, with his Sons Baldulphus, Colgrim, and Ciffan an Infant. He landed his Troops at Whitering in Suffex, but not without Opposition. The Inhabitants of the Country rising to prevent his Entrance, he became not Matter of the Shore till after a long Battle. At length he drove the Britons as far as the Forest of Andredswald (2), at that Time 65 Miles in Length, and 30 in Breadth. The Retreat of the Britons gave the Saxons Opportunity to settle by degrees along the Coast and towards the Thames. During the nine Years they were employ'd in extending their Conquests in those Parts, they had continual Wars with the Britons, the Particulars whereof are unknown. We are only told that the Saxons, settled along the southern Coast, were call'd Sud or South Saxons, and their Country Suffex. Hengist took care to strengthen himself, in the best manner he could, in the rest of the Country given him, and planted Colonies of his own Countrymen. Those that were seated to the East were call'd Egft Saxons, and their Country, Essex. The Country between Essex and Suffex, was term'd Middlesex. As for Kent, it retain'd its ancient Name, the only one perhaps the Saxons did not alter.

Hengist having thus settled Matters, gave those Soldiers, that desir'd it, leave to return into Germany. At their Arrival on the Continent, they built the Castle of Leyden, which is ascrib'd to Hengist himself, by a Dutch Poet, as well as by several others, who were of Opinion that he went back into Germany (3).

The Britons were not then in a condition to think of recovering the Provinces usurp'd by the Saxons. Harass'd by almost continual Wars for 60 Years together, it was time to breathe a while. However, they were griev'd to see the Saxons so firmly settled in the Country, and in a Capacity of strengthening themselves, by the Convenience of fending, whenever they pleas'd, for fresh Supplies from Germany. But they were forc'd to be patient, 'till their almost quite exhausted Forces were repair'd. Accordingly, without any previous Truce or Treaty of Peace, both Sides lay quiet for nine Years. Hengist, no less than the Britons, had need of some Respite, to put the Affairs of his Kingdom in order. During this Interval, Ellas gain'd Ground, the Britons not daring to oppose him, for fear of giving Hengist a Pretence to renew the War, which it was their Design to avoid.

The Britons having had time to recover their Strength, began to solicit Ambrosius to take up Arms. They represented to him, "that the longer the Saxons were left in " quiet, the stronger they grew: That since the War " ceas'd, Britain abounded with young Soldiers, fit to " fight for their Country; if this Opportunity therefore " was let slip, they might perhaps expect another in vain." Ambrosius told them, " he was convinc'd, as well as " they, of the Necessity to exert their utmost to expel the " Foreigners, but there was no Hopes of succeeding as long " as Vortigern was alive: That although he was old, and " in appearance incapable of acting, he had a powerful " Party, that would not fail of raising new Disturbances " as soon as the War broke out: That they had found by " fatal Experience, ever since the Arrival of the Saxons, " he had always favour'd them." In fine, " he put them " in mind, that all their Losses were owing to their Divi- " sions, and as these Divisions still prevail'd, it was to no " purpose to expect any better Success." He concluded with saying, " they had but one of these two Ways to " take, either to let the Saxons remain in quiet till Vor- " tign's Death, or to rid themselves of that domestick " Enemy, and unite their Forces against the Foreigners." Such was the Hatred of the Generality of the Britons against Vortigern, that they resolv'd immediately upon the latter of the two Methods, and with one Consent, prepar'd to put their Resolution in practice with all possible Secrecy and Expedition. Vortigern so little expected to be attack'd, that he was like to have fallen into the Hands of Ambrosius. He had but just time to throw himself into a Castle in Wales, where he was not very secure. Ambrosius, willing to complete his Work, instantly went and besieg'd him, being resolv'd not to let him escape. During the Siege, the Castle, whether by Accident, or the Engines of the Besiegers, taking Fire, was burnt to Ashes, and the unfortunate Vortigern perish'd in the Flames. This was the End of that Prince, advanc'd to a great Age, after a troublesome Reign of forty Years. He had, besides a Daughter, three Sons by his first Wife, Vortimer, Catigern Newnham, slain in a Battle with the Saxons, and Peiscentius, of whom I shall speak hereafter. By his Daughter, whom he de- bauch'd, he had a Son nam'd Faugus, who pass'd his Life in a Monastery, where he was distinguish'd for his Piety.

Ambrosius being thus rid of a very formidable, as he ever Ambrosius thought, and hated Rival, renew'd the War against the Saxons, which had been interrupted by the Weakness of both Parties, and the Divisions of the Britons. The Particu- lars of this War, after its renewal, are very imperfectly known: But considering the Valour and Activity of the two Generals, it may be supposed to have been very sharp. Historians relate but one remarkable Event, namely, the signal Victory obtain'd by Ambrosius, in the Year 487, over Ellas and his two eldest Sons. This is properly the first Victory the Britons could indubitably boast of, whatever their Historians say to the contrary. This Defeat oblig'd the Saxon General to retire to his strong Holds, in Expectation of fresh Supplies, sent for from Germany.

Hengist lived not to see the end of this War. He died in 488, aged about 69, of which he had pass'd 39 in Britain, and 33 on the Throne of Kent (4). He cannot be deny'd the Glory of being one of the bravest and most pru- dent Generals of his Time. It were to be wish'd for the English, that the Founder of their Monarchy had not, as H. Hunt- may say, cemented his Throne with the Blood of so many British Lords, whom he treacherously murder'd. An Action that must leave an indelible Stain on his Memory. Had it not been for this, his Reputation would have been uncommon, since by his Conduct and Valour he happily accom- plish'd a Design, the Execution whereof was extremely dif- ficult. Besides Kent given him by Vortigern and conside- rably enlarg'd by the Acquisition of Essex and Middlesex, he was in possession of some Lands in Lincolnshire, where he built Thong Castr. The Saxons beyond the Humber acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign. He left two Sons, Islelf. Efcus who succeeded him in the Kingdom of Kent, and Audacer who staid in Germany.

After the Defeat of Ellas, about a Year before the Death of Hengist, Efcus had been sent into the North, to assist Otha and Ebuza against the Britons. But as soon as he had notice G. Monm. of his Father's Death, he hasten'd to Kent to take Possession of the Kingdom. In the mean time Ambrosius improving his Victory, retok London, Winchester and Lincoln, seiz'd by the Saxons, after the Massacre of the British Nobles. Efcus, wanting the Qualities of his Father, never endeavor'd to recover these Places, but prefer'd his Ease before the Fatigues of War. In all Probability he obtain'd a Truce, since in the three following Years, there is no mention of any Hostilities on either Side.

During this Calm, Arthur, who had all along assist'd Ambrosius, finding his Presence was not absolutely necessary in his own Country, made a Voyage to Jerusalem. Ambrosius, in the mean while, by the Assistance of Samson Bishop of Dol, whom he had sent for from Armorica, and made Archbishop of Yerk, regulated the Affairs of the Church, that were in extreme Disorder by reason of the foregoing Wars.

The Truce or Discontinuance of the War lasted but three Years. The Northumbrian Saxons beginning to stir in 491, Arthur, who was return'd from his Voyage, march'd against, and defeated them. At the same time Ellas having receiv'd a strong Reinforcement from Germany, went into and besieged Andred-Castr (5), situated in the Forest of Andred's-Wald. The Resistance of the Besieged, and an Army of the Enemy pos'd on an advantageous Ground, made him lose a great deal of Time. But at length, after a vigorous Defence, the Town was carried by Storm, and entirely destroyed. Immediately after this, Ella assum'd the Title of King of Suffex or of the South-Saxons, which he durst not do while Hengist was alive. This Second Saxon Kingdom contain'd the present Counties of Suffex and Surrey. Ella was also elected Monarch or General of the Saxons in the room of Hengist. For it must be observ'd altho' Hengist was only King of Kent, yet was he consider'd also as Head of all the Saxons, according to the Custom of that Nation in Germany, where, in time of War, they had always their General in Chief, accountable only to the States. This same Custom the Saxons continued in Britain, and always elected a General, whom some Writers stile Monarch, because, as we shall see hereafter, he was Head over several Kings. In all appearance, Hengist's Son thought himself incapable to discharge this High Office, since he suffer'd Ella to be invest'd with it.

494. About two Years after, Arthur defeated the Northumbrians again, on the Banks of the River Douglas (1), where he had routed them three Years before.

The Year 495 was very remarkable for the Arrival of Cerdic, a Saxon General, not only upon the Account of his Conquests, but chiefly because from him the Kings of England are descended, in the Male Line, down to Edward the Confessor, and in the Female, down to the illustrious Prince who now sits on the Throne. If we trace him higher, we find, by the Saxon Annals, that he sprung from Woden, the Root of all the principal Families of the Saxons. He was famous also for founding a Kingdom to which all the rest in the End became subject, and consequently, he is to be look'd upon, if not as the first, at least as one of the principal Founders of the English Monarchy. This warlike Prince, having acquir'd great Reputation in Germany, and finding no farther Employment there, resolv'd to seek his Fortune in Britain, where he knew many Families of his Nation had already establish'd themselves. To that purpose he equip'd five Vessels, and taking his Son Cenric, advanced to Man's Estate, with him, now sail'd for Britain.

Ella, as I said, brought with him his three Sons, Baldulph, Colgrin, and Gissa who was very young; and the two eldest treading in their Father's Steps, bravely assisted him. They are called by some Gispenius and Plentius (2). Otha, Commander of the Saxons in the North, having been frequently defeated by Arthur, and perceiving himself too weak to guard all his Conquests, had divided them into two Parts, of which the Southern was call'd Deira, and the Northern, Bernicia. He had committed the Care of the First to Baldulph and Colgrin, reserving Bernicia to himself to defend it against the continual Attacks of the Northern Nations. Colgrin, after the last Defeat of the Northumbrians by Arthur, had shut himself up in York, where Arthur immediately went and besieg'd him. Nevertheless Baldulph having been inform'd of Cerdic's Design of coming to Britain, was gone into Norfolk to expect his Arrival, and favour his Landing. But Cerdic's Arrival being delay'd by some Accident, Baldulph march'd back towards York, with Intent to relieve it. He was met upon the way by Cador, Nephew to Arthur, who defeated him, and dispers'd his Army in such a manner, that he was forc'd to make his Escape all alone, disguis'd like a Peasant (3). In that Dress he safely reach'd the Walls of York, and making himself known, was drawn up with a Rope. The News he brought of Cerdic's being about to arrive from Germany with powerful Supplies, infusing new Life into the Besieg'd, they continued to make a vigorous Defence. Arthur push'd the Siege briskly, in Expectation of taking the Town before the Arrival of the Saxon Prince. All this while, Cador was in Norfolk, ready to oppose the Landing of the Saxons. But before Arthur had made any considerable Progress in the Siege, he receiv'd the ill News of Cerdic's landing at Yarmouth (4), and beating the Forces sent against him. Upon which he raises the Siege and retires to a Place of Security, till he could learn the exact Number of the Saxons, which Fame had exceedingly multiplied. Baldulph and Colgrin marching out of York, committed great Devastations in Lincolnshire, whilst the Britons were dismay'd and terrified at the Arrival of Cerdic. So great was their Terror, that Arthur thought fit to keep at a Distance from the Saxons for some Time, for fear of not being able to inspire his Troops with Resolution enough to look these formidable Enemies in the Face. But this was not All that followed upon the Arrival of Cerdic.

Pascentius, Son of Fortigern, having long conceal'd his secret Disgust at not having any of his Father's Dominions assign'd him, laid hold of this Juncture to obtain what he thought his Due. With the Assistance of those that, like him, were displeas'd with the Advancement of Ambrosius, he drew some Forces together, and being join'd by his Friends in Wales, Ambrosius being grown sick and old, Arthur took upon him to chastise the Rebel, and marching against him, gave him Battle, and entirely routed him near the little River Douglas (5).

The next Year, Arthur in the same Place gain'd another Victory, and so warmly pursued the British Prince, that he forc'd him to submit and sue for Pardon. Pascentius got more by his Submission, than by his Arms. For besides his Pardon, it procur'd him the possession of Brecknock and Radnor (6) in Wales, which being erected into a Kingdom, his Posterity enjoy'd it for many Years. I imagine that his Father Fortigern's private Demons lay in those Parts, and that Ambrosius did but give him the Lands belonging to his Family before Fortigern was King. If he invest'd him with Sovereignty, it was only to give him some Satisfaction concerning his Pretensions to the Crown of Britain.

About this Time the Saxons in the North conquer'd the little Kingdom of Galloway (7) from Gabran Nephew of Arthur. This Country, now part of Scotland, had remained in the Hands of the Britons and withstood the continual Attacks, as well of the Saxons as Picts. Gabran having lost his Dominions, retir'd to his Uncle Arthur, to whom he was very servicable in his Wars.

Shortly after, Porta landed at Portland (8), so call'd from him, with fresh Supplies of Saxons from Germany. This at a Time the Saxons began to be Superior, oblig'd Arthur to quit the Field and retire to London. Tho' he had generally the better of the Saxons in all their Encounters, yet his Troops were considerably diminish'd; whereas the Enemy's Forces were continually increasing by fresh Recruits from Germany. Nay, whole Bodies, under the Conduct of famous Leaders came over to Britain, in order to procure a Settlement, or for the sake of Plunder only. Arthur, who had not the same Supplies, would have been reduc'd to Extremity, without the Assistance of Heel King of Armerica his Nephew. This young Prince, greedy of Glory, and glad of an Occasion to signalize himself in the Service of his Uncle, put himself at the Head of 15000 Men, and landed at Southampton. With this Aid, Arthur went and attack'd the Northumbrians, grown formidable by the Valour of Baldulph and Colgrin, their Leaders, and meeting them in Deira, obtain'd a complete Victory over them. The two Saxon Brothers, not being in condition to withstand him after their Defeat, had no other Course to take, but with the Remains of their Army to join Cerdic, then besieging Lincoln. But Arthur, fearing the Loss of that Place, follow'd them with Speed, and surpris'd Cerdic in so sudden a manner, that not being able to continue the Siege, or raise it, without Danger, he was constrain'd to hazard a Battle (9), which prov'd fatal to the Saxons. Cerdic being defeated, was forc'd to betake himself to the Forest of Calidon, where having suffer'd great Hardships, he at length found Means, tho' with great Difficulty, to retire towards the Western Coasts. Some Historians assure us, that seeing he must inevitably perish if he staid in a Place where he could neither have Provisions, nor hope for Assistance, oblig'd himself by a Treaty with Arthur to return into Germany with the Remains of his Troops. They add, that being embark'd with Intent to perform his Promise, he alter'd his Mind at Sea, and came and landed at Toston (10) in the West. However this be, Cerdic certainly remain'd in the Island, and lay quiet for some Time, having lost in the Battle above 6000 Men.

After Cerdic's Defeat, all the Saxons were equally concern'd to oppose the Progress of Arthur, who, like an able General, wisely improv'd his Victories to the utmost. The Dread he struck them with, made them resolve to unite all their Forces, and endeavour to retrieve their Affairs. They were sensible that by dispersing their Forces in several Parts, they endanger'd in one Place what they had got in another, which was never the way to procure a lasting Settlement. Wherefore Elsus King of Kent, Ella King of Suffex, Cerdic, Porta, the Northern Saxons assembled all their Troops, and conferr'd the Command in Chief on Cerdic. The Infirmities and old Age of Ella, who had been Monarch ever since 492, were probably the cause of his not heading the Army at this time. Cerdic having divided his Troops into two Bodies, gave the Command of the least to Baldulph and Colgrin, and headed the other himself with his Son Cenric. While the Saxons were employ'd in making Preparations, the Britons were exerting their utmost to raise an Army capable of withstanding so powerful Enemies. In this so pressing an Occasion, where they had need of all their Forces, those that could bear Arms came in Crowds, and lifted themselves under their Generals. So that it was thought on both Sides a decisive Battle would quickly ensue. Ambrosius, called here by Historians, Nazaleod, though very old, and almost past the Time of Action, could not see all these Preparations without having his Courage rous'd, which Age seem'd to have lain asleep. He put himself at the Head of his Army, and detaching Arthur to follow Baldulph and Colgrin, who were marching towards the Wesst, resolv'd to go in quest of Cerdic. Arthur, every where victorious, coming to an Engagement with the Saxon Brothers in Cornwall, obtain'd a signal Victory over them (1).

Whilst this great General was causing the Arms of the Britons to triumph in those Parts, Ambrosius advances towards Cerdic, who had no thought of retiring. The two Armies being engag'd, Ambrosius broke through the right Wing of the Saxons, commanded by Cerdic, and put them to rout. But whilst he was eagerly pursuing his Victory against a Body that made but a faint Resistance, Cenric had the same Advantage over the right Wing of the Britons, which he more wisely improv'd. Instead of losing Time in pursuing the Run-aways, he flies to the Assistance of his Father, and falling upon Ambrosius in Flank, puts him in irreparable Disorder. By this prudent Conduct, he gave Cerdic Time to rally his Troops, and compleat the Victory by an entire Defeat of the Britons.

Ambrosius, vex'd to see the Victory snatch'd out of his Hands, did all he could to renew the Fight. In spite of Age and Infirmities, he threw himself amongst his Enemies, in order to animate his Troops by his Example. But all his Efforts serv'd only to crown his glorious Life with an honourable Death. The Fall of Ambrosius caus'd an universal Rout among the Britons, who precipitately abandon'd the Field of Battle to their Enemies. The Success of that Day was, by the public Acknowledgment of his Father, attributed to Cenric. This Battle was fought in 508, near a Place call'd by the Saxons, Cerdic's-Ford (2).

Before I proceed any farther, it will be proper to observe, that the Name of Nazaleod, given by Historians to the British Monarch slain in this Battle, has made some imagine it was not Ambrosius. But the Opinion of Camden and several other good Writers, who assert the contrary, is doubtless to be prefer'd. All the Historians agree that Ambrosius fell in Battle. Now after the Beginning of this Prince's Reign, there was no other Battle, except this, wherein a British Monarch was slain. Besides, Historians would not have omitted to mark the Time of the Death of so famous a Prince, had it happen'd in some other Action.

Arthur was elected Monarch in the Room of Ambrosius. He was doubtless the fittest Person to command the Army, his Very Name being terrible to the Saxons (3). Between Ambrosius and Arthur, some Writers place Uther Pendragon, who, they affirm, was Arthur's eldest Brother, and both of them Sons of Ambrosius. Others will have it that Arthur was Son and Successor of Uther. But they that are most vers'd in the English History, maintain that Uther was only a Surname given to the great Arthur on account of his Victories, the Word being capable of that Sense in the old British Language.

Arthur, after his Coronation at Caerleon, which he had retaken from the Saxons, march'd against the Northumbrians, and defeated them on the Banks of the little River Rilroyt that runs through Lancashire. This is reckon'd his Truth Victory over the Saxons. In the mean time Baldulph and Colgrin, the invading the Wesstern Parts, made such Devastations, that he was oblig'd to leave Northumberland, and march against the two Brothers. However, he le Heol his Nephew in Bernicia, to oppose the Saxons there, who, though often beaten, were still formidable. His usual Success attended him. The Saxon Brothers being compell'd by him to come to an Engagement, were routed near Cadbury in Somersetshire (4).

Mean while, Cerdic having receiv'd fresh Supplies from the Saxon Princes in Britain, as well as from Germany, laid Siege to Bath. Baldulph and Colgrin having joined him also with what Troops they could draw together, his Army was so strong; that he with'd the Britons would attempt to raise the Siege. He had his Desire. Arthur, resolving to hazard All to save that Place, came and gave him Battle, which proved the bloodiest that had ever been fought between the two Nations. It lasted from Noon till Night, without any visible Advantage to either Side. Both Armies kept the Field; waiting for the Day to renew the Fight. The Saxons, during the Night, posted themselves on a little Hill, call'd Bathnedun, which was of great Importance, tho' it had been neglected by both Sides the Day before. As soon as it was light, Arthur, perceiving the Advantage the Saxons had gain'd by seizing that Post, was resolv'd to dislodge them, which he effected after a long and obstinate Fight. The Britons, animated by the Preference and Valour of their King, perceiving the Saxons in retreating down the Hill had put themselves in some Disorder, press'd them still more vigorously, and at last entirely routed them (5). They gain'd, on this Occasion, a most complete Victory. Baldulph and Colgrin were both slain, and Cerdic, with the Remains of his Army, retir'd to an inaccessible Post.

An unexpected Event gave the Saxons time to breathe, and prevented Arthur from improving his Victory. The Picts, who were in Alliance with the Saxons, knowing Arthur to be at a Distance, and his Nephew Heol sick at G. Monm. Archele, resolv'd to besiege that Town, in Expectation of taking it before it could be reliev'd. But Arthur was too quick for them. Instead of pursuing his Advantage upon Argent. l. 2. Cerdic, he flew to the Assistance of the King of Armorica, and compell'd the Picts to raise the Siege. The British Monarch was so provok'd with the Picts for this Diversion, which came so opportunely for the Saxons, that he ravaged their Country from one End to the other, and would have entirely destroy'd it, had not the Bishops by their Intercession diverted him from his Purpose.

During this Expedition, died Gueniver Wife of Arthur who was buried in the County of Angus (6). As she had no Children, the Women of the Country fancied, All that walk'd over her Grave, would, like her, be barren. For which Reason great Care was taken to hinder the young Damsels from approaching it. Heol, after this Expedition, return'd to his own Country, the Victory of Badon having secur'd Arthur, for some time, from any Attempts of the Saxons. Arthur, in his Return from the Country of the Picts, made some Stay at York, which the Saxons had just abandon'd since the Battle of Badon. His chief Intent was to regulate the Affairs of the Church, which were, from the time the Saxons had been Masters of that City, in great Confusion.

Elsin King of Kent died in 512, memorable only for leaving his Name to all his Successors Kings of Kent, from him were call'd Elsingians. He was succeeded by his Son Ossa.

Two Years after died Ella King of Suffex, and Monarch of the Saxons, having enlarg'd his narrow Territories at the Expence of the Britons, during a Reign of twenty three Years. His two eldest Sons having been slain at Badon, Cissa, the youngest succeeded him in the Kingdom of Suffex; but his Monarchy of the Saxons was conferr'd on Cerdic.

Cerdic, ever since the Battle of Badon, had lain quiet in his own Country, expecting a Supply from Germany, which arrived in 514, under the Conduct of Stuff and Witgar his Nephews (7). Upon this he took the Field again, and committed great Devastations in the Country of the Britons (8). Arthur, tho' weaken'd by his own Victories, not having the same Recruits as the Saxons, made however powerful Struggles to oppose the Progress of this formidable Enemy. The many and bloody Battles between the two Nations did not decide the Quarrel, since Victory inclin'd sometimes on one Side, and sometimes on the other. But at length in 519, Cerdic defeated the Britons in such a manner, as made them despair of ever driving out the Saxons (9). Wherefore, Arthur saw himself under a Necessity of taking other Measures. As he found his Army irreparably destroy'd, he thought it more prudent to conclude a Peace with Cerdic, and grant him a Part, rather than hazard the Whole of his Dominions, by endeavouring to deprive him of All. This Consideration moved him to surrender by Treaty a certain Tract of Land, containing the present Counties of Hampshire and Somersetshire. The Saxon Prince was pleas'd with these Terms, being desirous, after so long a War, of enjoying some Repose in his declining Age. As soon as he was in Possession of his new Territories, he found the Kingdom of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, so call'd because it lay West of Kent and Suffex.

Arthur.

Four Epi-

Rings of Arthur.

He was crown'd at Winchester, twenty-three Years after his Arrival in Britain (1). Thus, by his Valour and Perseverance, he procured himself a Settlement in the Island, as well as his Countrymen Hengist and Bla.

Arthur took this Opportunity to rebuild some of the Churches destroy'd by the preceding Wars, and to repair, as far as lay in his Power, the Damages Religion had hitherto sustain'd.

From the time Hengist had peopled Essex and Middlesex with Saxons and Jutes, they had been govern'd by a Deputy under the King of Kent. But in 527 Brihtenwin, descended from Woden, assumed the Title of King of Essex, or of the East-Saxons. This Kingdom lying Eastward of the other three, contain'd the two Counties of Essex and Middlesex, of which London was the Capital. Who Brihtenwin was, how long he had been in Britain, and what Right he had to this new Kingdom, Historians inform us not. I suppose he was Governor under Otha King of Kent, and taking advantage of his Weakness, engag'd the People to acknowledge him for King.

About this time Multitudes of Angles, under the Conduct of twelve Chiefs, all of equal Authority, but whose Names, except Uffa, (of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter,) are unknown, landed at some Port on the Eastern Coast of Britain, where, without much difficulty, they possess'd themselves of some Port, those Parts being ill guarded by the Britons. In time, as they were continually enlarging their Conquests towards the West, they compell'd the Britons at length to abandon the Country along the Eastern Shore. The Angles, thus situated, had an Opportunity of sending from time to time for fresh Colonies from Germany, with which they founded a fifth Kingdom, by the Name of the Kingdom of East-Anglia, or of the East-Angles. But as their first Chiefs assum'd not the Title of Kings, the Beginning of this Kingdom is generally brought down to the Year 571.

During the eight Years Peace between Arthur and Cerdic, the King of Armorica being disturbed by the Rebellion of Frellon, one of his Subjects, sent to his Uncle Arthur for Aid. As Britain was then in a State of Tranquillity, Arthur would go in Person, and assist the King his Nephew. To that end he passes into Armorica, where he revenges Hoel, by slaying Frellon with his own Hand in the first Battle they fought.

Arthur was still with Hoel when the Angles arriv'd in Britain. His Absence very probably gave them an Opportunity of making greater Progress than they would have done, had he been in the Country. Cerdic also taking Advantage of Arthur's Absence, and of the Angles, broke the Peace, and made some farther Conquests. He was constantly attended by his Son Cerdic, who bravely seconded him in all his Undertakings, and by his Valour and Conduct caus'd him to gain a signal Victory in Buckinghamshire, at a Place call'd Cerdic's Lega, now Cheridley (2).

Arthur at his Return found his Affairs in extreme Disorder, by reason of Cerdic's new Conquests, and the Arrival of the Angles. However, perceiving himself unable to renew the War with his Enemies, whose Number was continually increasing, he chose to make a new Treaty with Cerdic. Immediately after this Treaty, Arthur is said to assume the Title of Emperor, of which his Seal found at Wynminster is pretended to be a Proof. Leland says, he saw the Impression of it on red Wax, with these Words round it: Patr. Arturius. Britanni. Gall. Germ. Dac. Imper. that is, Patricius Arturius; Britannicus. Gallicus. Germanicus. Dacicus. Imperator. These proud Titles perhaps were the Occasion of ascribing to him so many pretended Victories in foreign Countries, and of styling him Conqueror of the Gauls, Germani, and Dacians. But whether this Seal be genuine or not (3), there is Foundation enough for these Titles from the Exploits now related of this Prince. He might be call'd Britannicus, from his being Monarch of the Britons. The Title of Gallicus might be owing to his Expedition into Gaul. The Surname of Germanicus was no less proper, since he frequently defeated the Saxons, who came from Germany. Lastly, his being styled Dacicus might be founded on his Victory over the Jutes, who were mix'd with the Saxons, and by some have been confounded with the Danes and Dacians. Be this as it will, if he assumed the Title of Emperor, as it is very likely, since Ambrosius did the same, the four different Times of his attaining to the four several Dignities, must be carefully distinguish'd. 1. He mounted the Throne of Dannunium in 467, at fifteen Years of Age. 2. In 476, he was created Patrician by Ambrosius. 3. In 508, he was elected Monarch of Britain. 4. In 528, he assumed the Imperial Purple. These Epecha's thus distinguish'd, remove in great measure the Confusion in the History of this great Prince, with respect to Chronology.

(1) Some place this Fact sooner, some later, Rapin.

(2) Milton confounds this with the Battle of Baden-Hill. Rapin.

(3) There is great Reason to suspect its Genuinez; very probably it was the Invention of some Monk of Glastonbury. See Nicolson's Hist. Librar. p. 37.

Hoel, King of Armorica, was enjoying the Repose procur'd him by Arthur, when he heard that the Wijgath, then in Possession of Part of Gaul, were preparing to invade his Dominions: Wherefore he desired Arthur to come on, more in Person to assist him against so formidable Enemies, that were already Masters of Part of Gaul. How necessary it was for Arthur's Presence might be in his own Kingdom, he readily gave Hoel this full Proof of his Affection and Gratitude. As he was like to be detain'd abroad some time by the Affairs of Armorica, he left Modred his Nephew, whom he design'd for his Successor, Regent in his Absence, at the same time entrusting him with the Care of the Queen his Wife.

Arthur was no sooner gone, but Cerdic, taking advantage of his Absence, attacks and subdues the Ile of Wight, destroying almost all the Inhabitants in a cruel Manner. But this Loss was nothing to Arthur, in comparison of what shortly after follow'd by the Treachery of Modred, to whose Treachery of Care he had committed what he held most dear. This Traitor, finding the Wife and Kingdom of Arthur in his Power, falls in Love with both, and not fatished with debauching the Queen in private, publicly marries her. In order to avoid a second Crime, by the Punishment of the first, he resolves moreover to seize the Crown of his Uncle, his King and Benefactor. The more easily to accomplish his Design, he judges it necessary to make Cerdic his Friend, and by his Means to gain all the rest of the Saxon Princes to his Interest. He was very sensible, it would be very difficult to support himself in his Usurpation, if he were immediately forc'd to engage in a War with the Foreigners. Besides, he could not find a readier or more powerful Protection. But the Saxon Prince not being of a Humour to neglect his own, for the sake of another's Affairs, Modred could not possibly attain this Protection, without paying dear for it. However, as he had no other way to support himself, he resigns to Cerdic one Part of the Dominions usurp'd upon his Uncle, and enters into a League offensive and defensive with him. What the Saxon Prince got by this Treaty, lay extremely convenient for him, and vastly exceeded what was before given him by Arthur. It contain'd, besides Part of Dannunium, or Cornwall, the present Counties of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire. This with Hampshire and Somersetshire, which he was before possess'd of, render'd his Kingdom much larger and more considerable than the three other Saxon Kingdoms already establish'd. The Treaty being executed, Modred was crown'd at London; those who privately abhor'd his treacherous Doings, not daring to oppose it, for fear of being oppress'd before the Return of their lawful Prince.

In the mean time, Cerdic, after having much enlarg'd his Dominions, was incumber'd with his Greatness. As since Saxons most of his Subjects were Britons, on whose Loyalty he could not wholly rely, he believ'd it necessary, in order to preserve his new Dominions, to people them with Saxon Colonies. To that end he sent word into Germany, that All who were willing to come and settle in his Kingdom, should meet with great Encouragement. This Invitation induces a great many of the Saxons and Jutes to embrace the present Opportunity. Soon after, above eight hundred Vessels are seen to arrive, freighted with Families in quest of Settlements in Cerdic's new Kingdom. These Colonies were joyfully receiv'd and planted in Habitations, from whence Cerdic took care to drive such Britons as he most suspected, especially upon the Frontiers. Thus Britain was fill'd, by degrees, with new Inhabitants, and began to lose the Superiority in Number she had hitherto had above the Foreigners.

Cerdic having settled these New-Comers, was crown'd a second time at Winchester, the Metropolis of his Dominions, by the same Title of King of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, that he had before assum'd. This Ceremony was thought necessary, by reason of the great Number of his new Subjects, Saxons and Jutes, that were lately added to the old. This Kingdom was very advantageously situated, being bounded on the North by the Thames; on the West, by the Severn; on the South, by the Sea; and on the East, by the Kingdom of Essex. As for the Britons that were still in Possession of the greatest Part of Dannunium, they could not be very formidable to Cerdic, being divided from the rest of their Nation by this new Kingdom and the Severn.

Cerdic was but too well acquainted with the Valour and Activity of Arthur, to imagine he would sit still at his Return; and therefore us'd all his Endeavours to put himself in a Posture of Defence. To that end, he repairs all his strong Holds, adds new Works, and takes all other Precautions his Prudence suggests to him, not to be surpris'd when he comes to defend his Dominions. Every thing being put in order, he rewarded his Nephews Stuff and Wibgar, who Thus Cerdic was prepared against the Attacks of Arthur, when Death took him out of the World in the Year 534, sixteen Years after his first Coronation, and thirty-nine after his Arrival in Britain. He must have been of a great Age when he died, for thirty-nine Years before, Cenric his Son was able to assist him in his Wars. The Time this Prince pass'd in Britain was a continued Scene of good and bad Success, which serv'd equally to show his Ability to improve his Advantages, and to repair, with a wonderful Readiness, the Disorder his Affairs were frequently thrown into by the Fortune of War. Cenric, his Son, the faithful Companion of all his Labours, succeeded him both in the Kingdom of Wessex, and also in the Monarchy or Generalship of the Saxons and Angles. Cerdic's Successors were firm'd Gewissians, from Gewis, one of their Ancestors, famous no doubt in his Generation.

535. Arthur re-
turnit
Arthur, after a four Years Absence, at length quitted America. We are ignorant of the Cause of his long Stay there, so very prejudicial to his Affairs, which at his Arrival was in a desperate Condition. Madred was in Possession of his Throne, and moreover in strict Alliance with the Saxons. On the other hand, these last being now Masters of good part of the Island, were led by their own Interest to support the Usurper, and maintain him on the Throne. However, Arthur, tho' broken with Age, and almost destitute of Friends, resolv'd to undertake the Recovery of his Kingdom, and to punish the treacherous Madred. This bold Resolution rous'd the Courage of those that dar'd not at first to declare for him. A great Number of Officers and Soldiers, who could not bear the Thoughts of fighting against him that had taught them to conquer, deserted the Usurper, and came and lifted themselves under the Banner of their lawful Prince. Thus Arthur saw himself on a sudden at the Head of an Army capable of making Madred uneasy, if not by the Number, at least by the Bravery, of the Troops, and the Valour and Experience of the Leader. Madred, on his part, omitted nothing for his Defence. As he was not ignorant of the People's Inclination to his Uncle, he had Reason to apprehend a general Dejection; and therefore had strengthen'd himself with the Assistance of the Saxons; and upon the same Account made an Alliance with the Picts (2). He easily engag'd the Picts to his Interest, since they passionately desir'd to be reveng'd of Arthur, who had formerly carried Fire and Sword into their Country. Thus Arthur, with a Handful of Friends, was forc'd to stand against the Saxons and Picts in Conjunction with the Britons that sided with Madred. But the want of Numbers was supplied by his Courage and Experience. Tho' his Troops were much inferior to those of his Enemy, he found Means however to engage him in a very disadvantageous Post, and obtain a signal Victory. In this Action he lost Caliban and Angulaf, two Princes of his Blood, who had faithfully serv'd him both in Prosperity and Adversity.

Madred
Tho' Madred was defeated, the Supplies he receiv'd from the Picts and Saxons soon enabled him to give his Uncle a second Battle, but with no better Success. As the Particulars of this War are confusedly deliver'd, and besides contain nothing material, it will suffice, I believe, to relate the Issue. Madred, tho' constantly worried, found means to prolong the War seven Years, without Arthur's being able to destroy the Usurper, much less wrest out of the Hands of the Saxons, what had been surrendr'd to them. During this War, there happen'd two Eclipses of the Sun, which credulous Historians have expressly remark'd, fancying they were Prefages of the utter Ruin of the Britons, which fell out soon after.

H. Hist.
The Superiority of Madred's Forces being balanc'd by the Valour and Experience of Arthur, the War had now last'd several Years without any thing decisive. Madred, tho' several times vanquish'd, was still at the Head of a very numerous Army. On the other hand, Arthur, tho' extreme old, and with an Army weaken'd by the several Battles he had given his Enemy, supported himself by his great Experience in the Art of War. At last the fatal Blow was given in the Year 542. Arthur pursuing his Enemy from place to place, drove him to the Extremity of Dannemum, where he could not avoid fighting. This last Battle was fought by the River Cambalan (3), near Camefjordi. It prov'd fatal to the two Leaders, as well as to all the Britons, who having lost their best Troops, were never after able to stand against the Saxons. During this bloody Battle, the Uncle and Nephew happening to meet, rush'd upon one another so furiously, that nothing but Death could part them. Madred was slain upon the Spot, and Arthur, mortally wounded, was carried to Glaffenbury, where he died, aged 90 Years, 76 of which he had spent in the continual Exercise of Arms. Tho' he had reign'd but 34 Years, yet before he mounted the Throne, he had long commanded the British Armies under Ambrosius. Some have put an Interval of several Years between Ambrosius and Arthur, because they were at a loss where to place their Uther Pendragon, whom they will have, at any rate, to be a King different from Arthur. But the best Authors are of Opinion, that the Name Uther, signifying in British a Club, was given to the great Arthur, for the same reason that Charlemain's Grandfather was call'd Marte, or Hammer. As to the Surname of Pendragon, it owes its Origin, as 'tis pretended, to Arthur's wearing a Dragon on the Crest of his Helmet.

Arthur was, undoubtedly, a great General. It is pity his Actions have serv'd for Foundation to numberless Fables that have been publish'd concerning him: whereas his life was worthy of being recorded by the gravell and most able Pen. He is said to have instituted the Order of the Knights of the Round Table, so famous in Romances. Tho' this Institution has given occasion for many fabulous Relations, it is not therefore to be deem'd altogether chimerical. For where is the Improbability that Arthur should institute an Order of Knighthood in Britain, when we learn from the Letters of Cassiodorus, that Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, instituted one in Italy in the same Century?

Such was the Love and Esteem of the Britons for this Hero, that many would never believe he was dead. Nay, there were some for several Ages after, that imagining he was travell'd into foreign Parts, expected his Return (4): This would seem incredible, had there not been, in the 16th Century, an Instance of the like Folly with regard to Don Sebastian King of Portugal. It is this perhaps that gave occasion to some Writers, desirous of pleasing the Britons, to invent Arthur's Travels and numberless Victories in foreign Countries. The Titles of Germanicus, Gallicus, Dacicus, assum'd by that Prince, might serve for Foundation to such Fictions. These pretended Voyages and imaginary Victories, have prov'd an inexhaustible Fountain of absurd and ridiculous Things, attrib'd to him by the Writers of Romances. Hence it is, that his History has been so disfigur'd, as to cause many to doubt whether there was ever such a Man as Arthur in the World; and no wonder; for it is impossible to reconcile all the Contradictions that occur in his fabulous History. But if we distinguish Truth from Falshood, and reject what favours too much of the Romances, we meet with nothing in the Life of this Hero, unbecoming the Character of a great Prince: The Times of his Life and Reign are so confounded by these fabulous Writers, that they are very difficult to be clear'd, and therefore Recourse must be had to the four several Epoche's before-mention'd. He was born at Tindagel in Cornwall in 452 or 453, and died in 542. He was buried in the Monastery at Glaffenbury, by Gutuniver his second Wife. He had two others of the same Name, the first died in the Country of the Picts, and the third prov'd false to him. By this last he had a Son call'd Noem, who died an Infant: Arthur when he was about to expire, sent his Crown to Constantine his Cousin, Son of Cador, and Grandson of Ambrosius, declaring him his Successor; which must be understood only of Dannemum, for the Monarchy of Britain was extinct by his Death. It is pretended, that his Body was found whole and entire in Glaffenbury Monastery in the Reign of Henry II. with the visible Marks of a mortal Wound, one whereof only seem'd mortal. But what spec. Hist. is said of his Stature is unquestionably fabulous, namely, that the Distance between his Eye-brows was a Span, and the rest of his Body in Proportion: We have the particular Names of his Arms in the ancient Romances. His Shield was call'd Pridwen, his Lance Ron, and his Sword Caliburn. This last was presented in 1191 to Tancred King of Sicily, by Richard I. King of England.

After Arthur's Death, by whose Valour and Experience the Affairs of the Britons had been supported, they were no longer able to resist the Saxons. Indeed, the Saxons had been great Sufferers too in the frequent Battles between the two Nations: but the Circumstances of the two Parties were unlike. Whatever Loss the Saxons sustain'd, it was soon retriev'd by means of their continual Supplies from Germany. But it is easy to perceive the Britons, being destitute of foreign Aid, must have been drain'd by the incessant Wars they had maintain'd since the Departure of the Romans. Nay, they could not make use of all the Soldiers Britain might have supply'd them with; for many of their Countrymen, seeing no End to their Miseries, were fled for Refuge to the Picts, or into Armerica. Such Numbers retir'd to Armerica, that by their Junction with the Briths Families long before settled there, they became more numerous at last than the Natives. Hence 'tis pretended, that this Province of Gaul, call'd Armerica, that is, Menitime, by reason of its Situation, took the Name of Britagne from the great Number of Britons that fled thither. Armericus, who wrote the History of that Country, pretends, Armerica was antiently call'd Bretagne, and that the Inhabitants sending Colonies into Albion, gave that Island the Name of their own Country (1). It is probable indeed, the Armericans peopled some part of Great-Britain; but in all that this Author alleges in proof of his Assertion, there is no sufficient Reason to shew, that before these Colonies Armerica was call'd Bretagne, much less, that the Armericans alter'd the old Name of the Island of Albion.

As soon as it was rumour'd in Germany that Arthur was dead, and the dismay'd Britons had neither Power nor courage to defend themselves, great Numbers of People resolv'd to go over and settle in Britain. Ida, by Nation an Angle, and descended from Woden, having embark'd on board forty Vessels abundance of Families of his own Countrymen, landed at Flamborough in Yorkshire, then in Possession of the Northern Saxons, so call'd from inhabiting North of the Humber, had maintain'd themselves in that Country ever since the time of Hengist, and had all along been in some Dependence on the Kings of Kent. They had often favour'd the Enterprizes of their Countrymen in the Southern Parts by frequent Diversions, which had several times drawn into the North the Arms of Ambrifius and Arthur: but tho' frequently defeated, they without its appearing how they were govern'd from the Death of Offa and Ethelwulf to the Year 547, Ida, when he first arriv'd in their Country, (whether he had made an Agreement with them before he left Germany, or they were tir'd with being in Subjection to the Kings of Kent, from whom, by reason of their Distance, they could expect no Assistance) found them ready and willing to obey him. It may be, they were not in condition to oppose Ida, who had brought with him a strong Army. However this be, Ida was acknowledged for Sovereign of the Northumbrians, as well as of the Angles his Followers, under the Title of King of Northumberland (2). The Readiness of the Saxons to mix with the Angles, and obey a King of that Nation, confirms what I have elsewhere observ'd, That the Saxons and Angles were in Germany but one and the same People. The Name of the Saxons still remains in Germany, whilst that of the Angles is entirely lost; and on the contrary, this latter is perpetuated in Britain where the former is almost forgotten. Northumberland was the fifth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons. Ida, the first King, was a Prince of great Fame; and yet as he establish'd himself without any Obstacle, there is but one Particular recorded of him in History, and that is, his building the City of Bebbanburgh, so call'd from his Queen Bebba. This City, after many Years, was destroy'd: however there still remains the Castle of Bamberough.

The Memoirs concerning the Settlements of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain, are so short and imperfect, that it is impossible to frame a regular History of them. We must therefore be satisfied with a certain Number of Facts transmitted to us; by the Help whereof, the Thread of the History may, in some measure, be pursu'd. In the Year 552, notwithstanding their weak Estate, the Britons made an Effort to recover part of their Lands from Cenric King of the West-Saxons, but were repuls'd with great Loss near Salisbury. We find also in the Saxon Annals, (3) that three Years after two Sons of Medred, by the Assistance of the Saxons, attempted to dethrone Constantine, to whom Arthur had bequeath'd the Kingdom of Dannemum. But Constantine, being better prepar'd than they expected, not only put them to rout, but pursuing them to Glasfenbury, slabb'd them himself in the Arms of the Abbot, who interceded for them in vain. (4)

Ida King of Northumberland died in 559, having reign'd twelve Years. Tho' the profound Peace he enjoy'd during his whole Reign, gave him no Opportunity of shewing his Valour, yet all the Historians agree, he was a most accomplished Prince (5). 'Tis pity we have not a fuller Account of his Life. After his Death, Northumberland, for some unknown Reason, was divided into two Kingdoms. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, or the Northern Part, and of Ida, descended from Woden, of Deira or the Southern Part. Adda left twelve Sons, half by Wives and half by Concubines, who form'd several Branches, as may be seen in the Genealogy of the Kings of Northumberland, which the Reader should now and then take a View of, if he desires to understand fully the History of these Saxon Kingdoms.

The next Year Cenric King of Wessex, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, died after a Reign of twenty-six Years. The Reputation he had gain'd during his Father's Life, made it believ'd he would push his Conquests farther. But when he was on the Throne, he shew'd no Signs of Ambition, he was on the Throne, he came and attack'd him. Of the four Sons the Britons, who came and attack'd him. Of the four Sons he left, Ceaulin, the eldest, succeeded him both in the Kingdom of Wessex, and the Dignity of Monarch of the Saxons.

Ceaulin was no sooner on the Throne, but he form'd vast Projects to enlarge his Dominions by new Conquests. He was an ambitious Prince, who, not content with the prerogatives he was vested with as Monarch, consider'd the other Saxon Kings as his Vassals, pretending to keep them in a rigorous Dependence. As he was sensible it would be very difficult to obtain the Submission he expected from them, he made extraordinary Preparations, which alarm'd both the Saxon and British Princes. The last especially could not but be in extreme Contention, by reason of their deplorable State. After the Death of Arthur, they liv'd in a sort of Anarchy. What remain'd of their Country, was canted out into little independent States, which weaken'd one another by the Discord that reign'd among their respective Princes. The British Historians give such a Character of these petty Sovereigns, that the Nation in general could have but small Hopes of Assistance from any one or of all of them together. Constantine King of Cornwall was a cruel and bloody Duke. Prince, polluted also with abominable Lusts. Aurelius Cananus, whose Kingdom lay eastward of the Severn, was guilty of Parricide, and reign'd with unheard-of Tyranny. Fortipore King of Demetia [or South Wales] was overgrown with Pride; he gloried all in having no Religion, and persecuting the Clergy. Cunglas, whose Dominions were North of Cambria (so the Country was call'd between the Severn and the Western Sea) was grown old in Vice, and famous for his wicked Deeds. Maglocum or Malgo (6) King of Mona or Anglesey, thought of nothing but pillaging his Neighbours and Subjects, and heaping up Riches by Rapine and Violence. In a Word, Britain was in a terrible Confusion. After Arthur's Decese, every one liv'd as he pleas'd, and the Authority of the Tyrants was in proportion to the Licenise their Subjects were suffer'd to take. These Sovereigns were divided among themselves, and, as they had no Confidence in one another, could not agree upon proper Means to free themselves from the impending Calamities. Each therefore pursuing only his own Interest, the Saxons were left at liberty to establish themselves upon their Ruins.

Caulin's Preparations, however, rous'd them a little out of their Lethargy, and oblig'd them to think of their Defence. To that end they chose Malgo to command them, purely for the sake of his Giant-like Stature. But what could this unexperienc'd General have done, if the Saxons had united their Forces against him? He would have lost, perhaps, in a single Battle, what the Great Arthur had taken so much Pains to preserve. But happily for him and the Britons, the Saxon Monarch was possess'd with the Project of subduing his Countrymen first, so turn'd against the Saxons the Arms that should have been employ'd against the common Enemy. He could not discover his Designs without incurring the Enmity and Jealousy of the neighbouring Princes. But as no one of them in particular was able to withstand him, his Kingdom being much stronger than any of the rest, each dreaded being oppress'd, should he declare against him singly. They were therefore by degrees forc'd to submit to a much greater Dependence on their Monarch or General, than their Laws and Customs requir'd. Mean while, they griev'd in private to be thus kept under, fearing withal that Caulin's Designs would extend farther.

At length, Hermenric King of Kent, dying in 564, Ethelbert, his Son and Successor, could not bear the proud and haughty Proceedings of the West-Saxon, which were the more grievous to Ethelbert, as being a Descendant of Hengist, he thought he had a better Right to the Dignity of Monarch than any other Prince. Prepossession'd with this Notion, he resolves to revive the Pretensions of the Kings of Kent, neglected by his Predecessors, and declares War with Cautilin, not considering the Disproportion between his Forces and those of his Enemy. Cautilin, disdainful to be attack'd by a young Prince of no Reputation, march'd towards Kent with design to prevent him, and meeting him at Wibbandune (1), entirely routed him. Ethelbert being defeated a second time, was totally disabled, and forc'd to sue for Peace. His Vexation at so unexpected a Disappointment, was increas'd by the Jefts of the other Princes, who rallied him for his Presumption. He had occasion for this Lesson, to teach him that Courage alone is not sufficient for War, but must be accompanied with Prudence and Strength. He improv'd so much by it, that he afterwards became one of the wisest and most illustrious Princes of his Nation. This was the first Civil War among the Saxons, which was follow'd by many more, caused by the Rebelliousness and Ambition of the Princes. As soon as they were out of Danger from the Britons, they quarrell'd among themselves with such Animosity, that if another Arthur had appear'd, the Britons might have recover'd all they had lost. But Divine Providence had otherwise decreed.

Uffa, the only Survivor of the Twelve Chiefs of the Angles before-mentioned, assum'd in 571 the title of King of the East-Angles, and his Kingdom was call'd East-Anglia. As this was forty Years after his Arrival in Britain, he must have been of a great Age when crown'd. This was the sixth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons (2).

Cautilin was so elated with his Success against Ethelbert, that he look'd upon the neighbouring Saxon Princes as his Subjects and Vassals. Indeed the Kings of Northumberland and East-Anglia, being separated from him by a large Tract of Land possess'd by the Britons, had not much to fear from his Ambition. But the Kings of Kent, Essex and Suffex, were forc'd to submit to him, as superior to each of them in Extent of Dominions. After this he turn'd his Arms against the Britons with design to make new Conquests. I can't possibly relate the Particulars of this War, being very slightly pass'd over by the Historians. They only tell us, that Cutha, Brother of Cautilin, frequently defeated the Britons, and would, in all probability, have very much enlarg'd his Brother's Dominions, had not Death snatch'd him away in the midst of his Victories (3).

Before this War was ended, Uffa, first King of the East-Angles died in 578, leaving his Crown to his Son Titulus.

Such was the deplorable Condition of the Britons, that the time of their utter Destruction seem'd to approach. Press'd on the South, by the Saxons of Wessex, Suffex and Kent, on the East, by those of Essex or East-Anglia; and on the North, by the Northumbrians; they were, in a manner, surrounded by their Enemies. There was, however, one Refuge left, which help'd to keep alive, for a while, their faint Expectation of being able to withstand so many Misfortunes. As the necessity of their Affairs had formerly oblig'd them to fend for the Saxons to defend them against the Scots, a no less pressing Occasion compell'd them at this time to implore the Assistance of the Scots against the Saxons. This Resolution being unanimously taken, Ambassadors were sent to Aidan King of Scotland, to engage him in their Quarrel. "They represent'd to him, that their Ruin would infallibly draw on his; for the Saxons had in view no less than the Conquest of the whole Island, great part whereof was now in their possession: That if these Foreigners should at length over-run what remain'd in the Hands of the Britons, the Scots were to expect no better Quarter than the Picts, who were already dispossest of part of their Country." To this they added, "That the Saxon Monarch was an active and ambitious Prince, capable of forming Designs, the Consequences whereof were to be equally dreaded by all his Neighbours, if care were not taken in time to put a stop to his Progress." Aidan, prevail'd upon by these Considerations, put himself at the head of a powerful Army, and joins the Britons, in order to attack the common Enemy. Cautilin having notice of his March, made all possible Speed to meet him with what Troops he could assemble. But as the neighbouring Kings, his Countrymen, were not very forward to lend him Assistance, his Forces were far from being equal to those of the Britons and Scots. How great soever the Superiority of his Enemies might be, he courageously attacks them: But, after long disputing the Victory, his Army, overpower'd by Numbers, is cut in pieces, his Son Cuthwin slain, and himself narrowly escapes. The Britons were so elevated with their Success, that they began now to form Projects to drive the Saxons entirely out of the Island: but they were far from being able to put them in practice. The Alain is the Saxon Princes, though well enough pleas'd to see Cautilin humbled, thought it not for their Interest to let the Britons and Scots enjoy the Advantage they had gain'd by their Victory; and therefore soon put their Monarch at the head of a much more numerous Army than the former. Upon which, impatient to be reveng'd, he goes in quest of his Enemies, and meets them without delay. In a second Battle he repair'd, by a signal Victory, his former Disgrace, and convinc'd the Britons of the Vanity of their Projects. Aidan retiring into Scotland after his Defeat (4), the Britons, who saw all their Measures broken, thought only of preserving what they had left, content with dividing their Country with the Saxons, since they were unable to expel them. But Divine Justice that had long punish'd them, was not yet satisfied. They were still to be reduc'd to greater Distress, and behold the best and richest part of their Island taken from them by a Nation whom God had chosen for the Instrument of his Vengeance.

Scarce were the unfortunate Britons recover'd from their late Confutation, when a great Fleet appearing on their Coasts, quite sunk their Courage. This Fleet, the most considerable of any that had come from Germany, brought great Numbers of Angles, conducted by Crida a Leader of the same Nation, of the Race of Woden. I have not been able to learn where they landed, but probably it was in East-Anglia, and having march'd cross that Kingdom, they advanced towards the middle of the Island, upon the Territories of the Britons, who were unable to oppose their Arms. As Crida advanced in their Country, Disorder and Confusion increas'd among the miserable Britons. Some vainly projected to defend themselves, whilst others sought only to save their Goods, their Wives and Children, abandoning their Lands to the Angles. Crida taking advantage of their Terror, spread himself far and wide, and becoming Master of the Field, drove his frighted Enemies before him. In vain did they fly to their wall'd Towns; the want of Provisions for such Multitudes, soon compell'd them to surrender at Discretion.

The Britons being unable to defend themselves against these new Invaders, supported by their Countrymen already settled in the Island, took the only course left them, and retir'd into Cambria beyond the Severn. They had no other Retreat, being press'd on all other Sides by the Saxons and Angles. Their Flight put Crida in possession of all the Country lying between the Humber, the Severn, and the Thames, by which he was bounded on the North, West, and South. To the East of him lay the Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia.

Out of all these Conquests, Crida form'd a Kingdom larger and more considerable than any of the other six, by the Name of the Kingdom of the Middle-Angles. This Kingdom was afterwards more generally call'd Mercia. Crida the first King was crown'd in 584.

Cambria not being sufficient to contain so many Families, the Multitudes of miserable Britons fled into Avonia, where the great Numbers of their Countrymen were already settled. Others submitted to the Saxons or Angles, content to become Hewers of Wood and Drawers of Water for a wretched Subsistence. Those that remain'd in Cambria, a Country defended by Nature, kept their ground against all the Power of the Conquerors, who could not till long after extend their Conquests beyond the Mountains. This little corner of the Island, where the Britons were coo'd up, was afterwards divided into several petty Kingdoms, which were one while separated, another while united, according to the Ambition or Power of their Kings (5). Here I shall leave the Britons for the future, as making a State by themselves, and having no relation to the History of England, but what is commonly found between two neighbouring Nations. It is true they made from time to time several Attempts to recover what they had lost: But their Efforts prov'd ineffectual, as did the Endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to force them in these Retreats.

The Saxons gave the Britons the Name of Gualdys, or Walls, which is, Gauls; taking them to be, as in all appearance they were, of Gaulish Extraction. For this reason Cambria was by them term'd Wallsish-land; from whence came the Name of Wales, us'd by the English at this day, and chang'd by the French into Gallie, upon account of their being deriv'd from the Gauls. The Walloons also, and Walachians, have still kept these Names, and in some Places in Germany, the Italian Tongue is call'd Welsch, because of Gallia Cysalpine inhabited by the Gauls. As for the Name of Cambria given by the native Britons to Wales, I suppose, that before the Arrival of the Saxons, the Britons, who call'd themselves Cumri or Cumbri, nam'd their Country Cambria; and that after their Retreat beyond the Severn, the same Name which before was common to all Britain, became peculiar to Wales.

About the same time, the Anglo-Saxons unanimously agreed to call the seven Kingdoms in general by the Name of England, that is, the Country of the Angles. Whether this was done because the Angles were more numerous than the Saxons and Jutes, and possess'd the largest and most considerable of the seven Kingdoms, or for some other reason, is uncertain. Perhaps Engl-land is only a Contraction of Engle-Saxe-land, a Name deriv'd from the two principal Nations that were settled in Great-Britain. But the Picts, Scots, and Irish, were not fond of this change of Names. They continu'd to call the new Possessors of Britain, Saxona or Saxons, and their Country, Saxenage. I suppose, as the Saxons were first known in Britain, the neighbouring Nations, accusom'd to that Name, did not think fit to receive the Alteration introduc'd by the Conquerors.

I am very sensible that the Changing of the Name of Britania into that of England is generally ascrib'd to Egbert King of Wessex, about two hundred and fifty Years after the time I am speaking of. But this Opinion is founded on the Authority of an Historian that is far from being infallible (1). Others, who seem to go on much better Grounds, positively affirm, the Name of England was given to that Part of Britain conquer'd by the Saxons, a little after their Arrival in the Island; which may very well be understood of the Time immediately following the Arrival and Conquests of Cerdic. But how is it possible to extend this little after to the Reign of Egbert, which began not till the Year 800 (2)?

After the Death of Ida, and the Division of Northumberland before-mention'd, Alia reigned in Deira, and Adda, eldest Son of Ida, in Bernicia, who dying in 563, four Kings, all Sons or Brothers of Ida, successively fill'd the Throne of Bernicia till the Year 586, when Aethelric, Ida's youngest Brother, was plac'd thereon. But as he was very old, Adelfrid his Son held the Reins of the Government by his Father's Authority.

In the Year 587, Egbert, first King of Essex, died, after a Reign of sixty Years, and was succeeded by his Son Sledda.

Thus we have run through, in this Second Book, the most remarkable Events that happen'd in Great Britain, from the Arrival of the Saxons to their Establishment in the Island, during a War of 150 Years. We have seen the Efforts of the Britons, who, after a resolute Defence, were forc'd at last to give up their Country to the very People they had call'd to their Assistance. In the following Book, we shall see what pass'd in the Heptarchy, the Name given to the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, when consider'd as making but one Body under the same Government. The Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, that conquer'd the best part of Britain, looking upon themselves as one and the same People, as they had been in Germany, establish'd a Form of Government, as like as possible to what they had liv'd under in their own Country. They form'd their Wittena-Gemot, or Assembly of Wisse-men, to settle the common Affairs of the Seven Kingdoms, and conferr'd the Command of their Armies upon one chosen out of the Seven Kings, to whom, for that reason, no doubt, some have given the Title of Monarch, on Pretence of his having the Precedence and some Superiority over the rest. But to me that Dig-nity seems rather to have been like that of Stadtholder of the United Provinces of the Low Countries. There was however some Difference between the Saxon Government in Britain, and that in Germany. For Instance, in Germany the Governor of each Province entirely depended on the General Assembly, where the King was Sovereign in his own Dominions. But notwithstanding this, all the Kingdoms together were, in some respects, consider'd as the same State, and every one submitted to the Resolutions of the General Assembly of the Seven Kingdoms, to which he gave his Consent by himself or Representative. And therefore the Form of Government may be very justly compar'd to that of the United Provinces, each whereof is Sovereign and Independent, tho' they submit to the Determination of the States-General. A Free Election, and sometimes Force, gave the Heptarchy a Chief or Monarch, whose Authority was more of less, according to their Strength. For tho' the Person invest'd with this Office, had no Right to an unlimited Authority, there was scarce one of these Monarchs, as will be seen hereafter, but what aspir'd to an absolute Power.

If we enquire into the Causes of the Revolution that happen'd in Great-Britain by the Conquests of the Saxons, it must be own'd, in the first Place, that God was pleas'd by a just Judgment to punish the Britons for their enormous Crimes, from which, according to their own Historians, neither People, nor Kings, nor Clergy were free. Tho' the Divine Justice does not always punish, in a visible manner, every Nation guilty of the like Crimes, yet we must perceive the Hand of God, when it manifests itself upon a particular Nation, by such terrible Effects. But as the Divine Justice generally makes use of natural Means to execute its Designs, it is these chiefly we may and ought to look after. And first, it is plain, that the Dissension of the Britons was the principal Cause of their Destruction. Had they been more united, they would have better defended themselves against the first Saxons, and thereby, no doubt, discourag'd others from attempting to settle in their Island. In the next Place, their long Subjection to the Romans had enervated their Courage, and extinguish'd their natural Inclination for War. Lastly, they long wanted a General capable of conducting them and making them sensible they were no less Brave than other Nations. For how different a People did they seem to be under the Conduct of Ambrosius and the Great Arthur, from what they were when unable to defend themselves against the Picts and Scots? So great an Influence has the Good or Bad Qualities of Princes upon the Publick Affairs, and the very Manners of their Subjects, as is evident from the Histories of all Nations. We shall find in the Sequel, that the Civil Wars of the Anglo-Saxons were no less fatal to them, than intestine Divisions had been to the Britons. They gave occasion to the Strong to oppress the Weak, and at length made way for One to subdue All the rest.

THE STATE of the BRITISH CHURCH. FROM

The Arrival of the SAXONS, to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales.

*The History of the British
known.*

AFTER having seen what Calamities Britain was expos'd to by the Saxon Wars of 130 Years, a regular Account of the British Church is not to be expected during that Space. It is easy to perceive, that the Ecclesiastics, who were then the only Writers, were otherwise employ'd than in penning Histories. And tho' some might have found Leisure, it would have been difficult for their Writings to defend to us. We must therefore be satisfied with a few traditional Events, without Order or Connexion, since there is no exact History of the Affairs of the British Church, whilst the was thus grievously afflicted.

*Several Schools erected.
c. 17-21.*

Before the Arrival of the Saxons, Germanus Bishop of Auxerre came twice into Britain, as we have said, to extirpate the Pelagian Heresy, that had taken deep Root. This Prelate perceiv'd in these his two Voyages, that the Clergy were so little ignorant than corrupted, and that their Corruption was chiefly owing to their Ignorance. To apply some Remedy to this Evil, he believ'd the most beneficial Thing he could do for Britain would be to erect Schools for the Instruction of Youth, and particularly for those that were design'd for the Service of the Church. Pursuant to this pious Resolution, he founded several, among which, those of Dubricius and Ilutus were the most famous. Dubricius, Bishop of Llandaff, was made Archbishop of Caerleon, and Metropolitan of all Cambria. He had two Schools, where he taught himself, one at Henland, and another at Mockryst. Ilutus taught at Llan-twit, that is, The Church of Ilutus. There was also at Banger in Cambria a famous Monastery where Youth were educated. It is not to be doubted that these Schools of Germanus were of great Benefit to Britain, since they afterwards produc'd many illustrious Men that govern'd the British Churches in the most perilous Times. Amongst the Advantages the Britons receiv'd from the Presence of Germanus, some reckon also the Change he made in the Publick Service of the Church, by introducing the Gaulish Rites and Ceremonies. This is almost all we know concerning the British Church, during the Time the Saxons were employ'd in their Conquests. I can only add a few Particulars relating to some Ecclesiastics famous for their Sanctity, who flourish'd then in the Island; with which I shall close my Account of the Church of Britain, till the Conversion of the Saxons give me occasion to speak of the Church of England.

St. Patrick.

Patrick was one of the most remarkable for the Conversion of the Irish, which is generally ascrib'd to him, tho' Anastatius and Pelladius preach'd in Ireland before him. In all probability Patrick made the greatest Progress, and therefore he liv'd long, and still do, reverence him as their Apostle and Protector. It is proper to observe, there were three noted Men of this Name: Patrick the Elder, who died in 443, and is mentioned in the Chronicle of Glaffenbury Church: Patrick the Great, the Converter of the Irish, who died in 473, having govern'd the Church of Ireland 60 Years: Patrick the Younger, his Nephew, who surviv'd his Uncle some Years.

Dubricius.

Dubricius, Bishop, or rather Archbishop of Caerleon, was illustrious for his Piety, Learning, and the abovemention'd Schools; and lastly for his Synod at Brévi in Cardiganshire, against the Pelagians (1).

St. David.

David, Son of a British Prince, and Successor of Dubricius, remov'd the Archiepiscopal Seat from Caerleon to Menevia, from him call'd St. David's. He was noted for his austere Life, and his Synod at Vittoria, where the Canons of Brévi were confirm'd. Several Miracles are attributed to him, particularly his giving to the Bath-waters the Virtues they still retain. He is said to have liv'd 146 Years.

Samson the Elder, and Samson the Younger. The first Samson, being Bishop of Dal in Armorica, was sent for into Britain by Ambrosius, and made Archbishop of York. The second, of Royal Race, was made an Archbishop, without any particular See assign'd him, with Power to perform the Archiepiscopal Functions where-ever he came. The Saxon Wars forc'd him to return Home, where he was made Archbishop of Dal. He is said, when he left Great-Britain, to carry with him several Memoirs that would have given us a more perfect Knowledge of the Affairs of the British Church, had they been carefully preserv'd.

Cadoc, Abbot of Lancarvan spent his whole Income, Cadoc, which was very considerable, in maintaining 300 Priests. He liv'd to the Year 570.

Patern, of a noble Family in Armorica, having studied 20 Years in Ireland, came and settled in Cambria, where he usefully employ'd his Time in promoting Peace among the several Princes. He generally resided at Carigan, where is still to be seen Llan-Badarn-vaur, that is, The Church of Great St. Patern, which for some Time was a Bishop's Seat. Patern died in his native Country, where he was so distinguish'd for Holiness of Life, that no less than three Festival-days were dedicated to his Memory.

Petroc, a Native of Cornwall, was famous for his Piety, Petroc, and gave Name to Petroc-stow or Padstow in the same County (2).

Kenigern, Son to a Prince of the Picts, was Abbot of Kenigern, Glasgow, from whence he went into Cambria, and founding a Religious Society, return'd to his Monastery (3). His Austerities are mightily extoll'd, and particularly his strict Abstinence from Flesh.

Asaph, the Disciple of Kenigern, wrote his Master's Life, Asaph, by whom he was made Abbot of the Monastery, founded in Cambria; he liv'd to the Year 590, and left his Name to the City of St. Asaph.

Columba, nobly descended in Ireland, founded there a Columba, Monastery, call'd Dearmach, that is, The Field of Oaks, because situated in a Forest. Some Time after he came into Britain, to preach the Gospel to the Highland-Picts, of which they were yet ignorant. God was pleas'd so to bless his Labours, that he had the Satisfaction to see those Savages converted to the Christian Religion, with their King Brydinus, who gave him the little Island of Iona or Hy, call'd since Colchil, where he founded another Monastery that afterwards became very famous (4). These two Monasteries for a long Time supplied the Scotch Churches both in Ireland and Great-Britain, with Bishops and Priests. It is observable, that according to the Institution of Columba, the Abbot of Iona retain'd a Jurisdiction not only over several Monasteries which branch'd forth from that, but also over the Monks that went from thence to be Priests or Bishops. Bede's reason for this is, because Columba the Founder was himself a Priest. It might be added, that the Monks who had vow'd Obedience to the Abbot of Iona, when they came to be Bishops, did not think the Episcopal Character freed them from their Vow. This Instance somewhat perplexes the Sticklers for the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, who endeavour to get off, by alleging it was an ill Custom crept into that Country, against the general Practice of the Church throughout Christendom (5).

Gildas of Badon, or Bath, was Scholar to Ilutus, and a Gildas Monk of Banger Monastery. He was born in the Year of the Battle of Badon, according to Usher in 520, but according

(4) Iona, Hy, Hy, or Columba-Isle, one of the Hebrides, two Miles in Length, and one in Breadth. Cadogan. "This Island was given by the long time the Chief of almost all those of the Northern Seat, and all those of the Picts, and had the Direction of their People." (Bede, l. 3. c. 14.) There were in it two Monasteries, one of Monks, dedicated to St. Columba the Apostle of the Picts, (from whom this Island was called Columba-Isle), that was the Seat of the Bishop of Hy; and the other of Nuns. (Card. p. 1091. Buchan, l. 2.) This Island is famous for the Burial of the ancient Kings of Scotland, forty-four of whom are said to have been buried there. (Buchan, ibid.) This Account seems more authentic than that given by Victor Bac et al. According to him, this Monastery was founded, A. D. 579, when Maximus, or Melannus, having banished the Scots out of Britain, ... Exulante Cyprian sacerdos ex Britannia, per Maximianum, ... et alios ... governa magna pars in Hebrides delata, in Iona insula sacrum confinio Carmum, &c.

(5) Bede says, speaking of Iona or Hy "This Island is always wont to have for its Governor the Abbot or Presbyter, to whose Authority all the Priests, and even the Bishops themselves, after an unusual Order, ought to be subject, according to the Example of their first Teacher, who was not a Bishop, but a Monk." Bede, l. 3. c. 4. "The Saxon Chronicle is more express, and says, "There must be always in Hy an Abbot, and ing to my Calculation, built upon Reasons too long to be inserted, in 511. Gildas wrote a Treatise entitled, De Excidio Britannie, Of the Destruction of Britain, wherein he boldly censures the British Princes of his Time, that is, those who after the Death of Arthur, divided the Country into several petty States. From him chiefly it is that we know what passed among the Britains about the Time he wrote, in 564. There is another History, or rather Romance, under the Name of Gildas, who is by some call'd Albanian, and suppos'd to be different from him I am speaking of. But the learned Stillingfleet asserts, they are Both the Works of one Author, and that there was no other Gildas but he of Baden.

Orig. Brit. Columbanus an Irishman, Disciple of Congal Abbot of Behgor in Ireland, pass'd great Part of his Life in Britain (1). From thence going into Burgundy, he founded the Abbey of Luxeuil, of which he was the first Abbot. Twenty Years after, Thierry King of Austrasia, and also of Burgundy, banish'd him his Dominions, for too freely censuring his Conduct, and forc'd him to fly to Agilulph King of the Lombards. At length he founded near Naples the Monastery of Bobio, where he died (2).

Colombanus. These were the most noted Ecclesiasticks in the British Church, from the Arrival of the Saxons to the Retreat of the Britons into Cambria. It is obvious, we have the Names only of those that flourish'd in Cambria, Ireland; or Scotland. As for the other Parts of Britain, we know nothing of what pass'd with respect to Church-Affairs. We have not so much as the Names of the Bishops, except Theon and Thadick, Archbishops of London and York, who were forc'd also in the end to fly into Cambria. It is very likely, all the Monuments of the British Churches were destroy'd, where-ever the Saxons became Masters; and that it was not possible to preserve any but those of the Churches of Wales, where the Saxons could never penetrate. It is easy to imagine, that the Church was in a very mournful State, whilst the Saxons were exercising their Fury. These mercilels Idolaters, as well out of Duty as Wantonness, not only trampled upon every thing relating to the Christian Religion, but let loose their Rage against the Christian themselves. Gildas and Bede have painted out their inhuman Proceedings, in such a manner, as shows their Barbarities were carried to the highest Degree imaginable. From the East to the West, says Gildas, nothing was to be seen but Churches burnt and all destroy'd to their very Foundations. The Inhabitants were extirpated by the Sword, and buried under the Ruins of their own Houses. The Altars were daily profan'd by the Pile of these slain thereon. Bede, who was a Saxon, and therefore not to be suppos'd to aggravate the Cruelties of his Countrymen, expresses himself thus: By the Hands of the Saxons a Fire was lighted up in Britain, that serv'd to execute the just Vengeance of God upon the wicked Britons, as he had formerly burnt Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The Island was so ravag'd by the Conquerors, or rather by the Hand of God, making use of them as Instruments, that there seem'd to be a continued Flame from Sea to Sea, which burnt up the Cities, and cover'd the Surface of the whole Isle. Publick and private Buildings fell in one common Ruin. The Priests were murder'd on the Altars; the Bishop with his flock perish'd by Fire and Sword, without any Distinction, no one daring to give their scatter'd Bodies an honourable Burial.

Further Antiq. Gaul. To these mournful Descriptions may be added, that the Britons, who escap'd the Fury of their Enemies, not finding wherewithal to subsist in the Woods and Mountains, were forc'd at length to surrender to the Conquerors, deeming themselves happy in being able to purchase their Lives with the Loss of their Liberty. Some fled into foreign Parts, and those whom the Love of their native Country kept at home, and the Dread of Slavery prevented from submitting to the Saxons, dragged on a wretched Life, in miserable Want and perpetual Fear. It is therefore no wonder that the Accounts of the British Church are so imperfect, since the Saxons used their utmost Endeavours to destroy all the Monuments that might have been preserv'd.

Ulster. Brit. Antiq. "and yet a Bishop, and that all the Bishops of Scotland ought to be subject to him." Hence some have infer'd, that Bishops were not then thought so necessary, since the Abbot of Hy, without being ordain'd Bishop, exercis'd Episcopal Authority over those that were Bishops. To this I have answer'd, That this Authority of the Abbots of Hy, their exercising Jurisdiction over the Bishops of Scotland, was a Superstition, not more just than, and not as Ouer; and unto the Annals of Ulster to prove that a Bishop always resid'd in Hy." De Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 16. Lloyd præs. that Columba was ordain'd by Ennas, Bishop of Meath, c. 5.

(1) He came into Britain in the Year 589.

(2) To these may be added, Talassien the famous British Poet, whose Verses are preserved to this Day. Top. p. 144

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK III.

Concerning the most remarkable Events during the HEPTARCHY of the ANGLO-SAXONS, to its Dissolution, and the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Containing the Space of Two Hundred and Forty Three Years.

THE Revolution caus'd by the Conquest of the Anglo-Saxons, introduc'd a new Face of Things in Great Britain. The Country formerly inhabited by the Britons was now possess'd by Strangers. The very Names of the Towns and Provinces were chang'd, and the Country divided in a very different Manner from what it was by the Romans. It will therefore be requisite, before we proceed to the Affairs of the Anglo-Saxons (which are to be the Subject of this third Book) briefly to shew the State of Great Britain after this Revolution.

Great Britain, canted out into several Kingdoms, was shar'd among four different Nations, namely, the Britons or Welsh, the Scots, the Picts, and the Anglo-Saxons. Under the Britons were compriz'd all those Foreigners, Romans or others, settled in the Island ever since the Reign of Claudius, who being incorporated with the Natives, became one People with them. The Descendents of these Foreigners were undoubtedly very numerous, it being the constant Policy of the Romans to diminish, as far as lay in their Power, the Natives of a conquer'd Country, and to send thither large Colonies either of Veterans, or of People taken from their other Conquests. As Britain had been in their possession four hundred Years, very probably they had not neglected, with regard to that Island, a Custom they practis'd every where else. Before they left Britain, their Colonies were distinct from the Natives. But the War, carried by the Picts and Scots into the Roman Province, after Honorius had renounc'd his Right, and that of the Britons and Romans settled in the Island, with the Anglo-Saxons, so confounded them, that we don't find from thenceforward in any History the least Sign of Distinction between the Roman Colonies and British Natives. The Britons therefore, now retir'd beyond the Saxons, are to be consider'd as a People compos'd of the ancient Inhabitants of Great Britain and the Roman Colonies. The Fenelani, settled about Cambridge, were also reckon'd as Britons, and involv'd in the same Ruin with them. After the Establishment of the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, the Britons had nothing left but Cambria, and the Western Part of Danmonium. Cambria (the Name formerly of all Britania) was chang'd by the Saxons into Wales. As for Danmonium, it was, in all appearance, a Roman Name. The Britons call'd that Country Kernaw, from Kern, that is, in their Language, Horns, because of the many Promontories that shoot out into the Sea like Horns. Hence doubtless the Saxons gave it the Name of Cornwall, that is to say, the Country of Kernaw, inhabited by Gauls or Britons. They seem'd to study to leave neither to the Inhabitants nor Countries, any Sign of the Roman Names, since they even stil'd Welsh, a People the Romans had call'd Britons above four hundred Years. The Natives kept their Ground a good while in that Corner of the Island, as well as in Wales, till at length they were entirely subdu'd, as we shall see hereafter.

The North Part of Great Britain was in Possession of the Picts and Scots, separated from the English by the Est and Tweed, and the Mountains between these two Rivers. The Picts were on the East, and the Scots on the West Side. The Grampian Mountains serv'd them for a common Boundary, from the Mouth of the Nid to the Lake of Lomond. Aberneth, now a small Town in the County of Strathern, was the Capital of the Picts, from whence the Bishop's Seat was removed to St. Andrews. Edinburgh belong'd also to the Picts, and whatever the English possess'd beyond Severus's Wall was taken from the same Nation. The Territories of the Scots extended towards the North and West, as far as the Sea that bounds the Island on these two Sides.

The Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, who are all to be consider'd as one People, and comprehended under the Name of English, had conquer'd all the Southern Part of the Island, from the Channel to the Wall of Severus, and a little beyond, towards the Est. This Part of Great Britain, possess'd by these three Nations, was divided into Seven Kingdoms, whereof the Saxons and Jutes had four, namely, Kent, Essex, Suffex, and Wessex; the Angles alone had two, Merca and East Anglia; but in Northumberland were mix'd with the Descendents of the Saxons that first took possession of the Country beyond the Humber, under Ossa and Ebulla.

The History of these seven Kingdoms is what I am now to give a general Knowledge of. I say general, because it is impossible to be very particular, by reason of the Barrenness of the Authors that have writ on this Subject. As the greatest Part intended only to write bare Annals, they have omitted what might contribute most to the composing a regular and coherent History of each Kingdom, or of all together. Some, particularly intent upon the History of one of the seven Kingdoms, scarce make any mention of what pass'd in the rest. Hence it is that hardly any thing is known of the Affairs of some of these Kingdoms, the Histories whereof have been neglected, or, it may be, lost by some Accident.

Another great Difficulty occurs, in the Choice of a Method. If the History of the seven Kingdoms be given at once, by placing the Events, that happened in each, according to the Order of Time, the Thread of the Narration must be continually broken, and Confusion introduc'd, which will be farther increas'd by the Difficulty of remembring Names now grown barbarous. On the other hand, if the History of each Kingdom be given apart by itself, it will be hardly possible to avoid a tedious Repetition of Facts common to two, and sometimes three of the Kingdoms, by reason of their Wars with one another. Besides, in this Method, the Reader will lose the Benefit of seeing a perpetual Synchronism of the Affairs of the seven Kingdoms, which is no little Help to the giving a distinct Idea of the State of England, during the Heptarchy.

After weighing the Conveniencies with the Inconveniencies of these two Methods, I am resolv'd in some measure to follow both. To that End, I shall first make some Remarks on the Anglo-Saxons in general. In the next place, I shall give a brief Summary of the History of each of the seven Kingdoms in particular. Lastly, I shall represent, in Synchronical Tables, the principal Events which happen'd in each Kingdom, that the History of all the Kingdoms together may be seen at one View. I hope by this Means to give a complete Idea, if not of all the Affairs of the Heptarchy, at least of what is most material.

Of the HEPTARCHY in General.

BY the Heptarchy is meant the Government of the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, consider'd as making but one Body and one State. The Anglo-Saxons, as I said before, establish'd in England a Form of Government not unlike what they had liv'd under in Germany; that is, considering themselves as Brethren and Countrymen, and being equally concern'd to support themselves in their Conquests, they conceiv'd it necessary to assist one another, and act in common for the Good of All. To that End they judg'd it proper to appoint a General in Chief, or, if you please, a Monarch, invest'd with certain Prerogatives; the Nature and Number of which we are not fully inform'd of. Upon the Death of this General or Monarch, another was chosen by the unanimous Consent of the seven Kingdoms: But there were sometimes pretty long Interregnums caus'd by the Wars or Divisions between the Sovereigns who could not meet or agree upon a Choice.

Besides this Monarch, they had also, as the Center of the Heptarchical Government, an Assembly General, consisting of the principal Members of the seven Kingdoms, or their Deputies. This is what was call'd the Wittenagemot, or general Parliament, where the Concerns of the whole Nation only were consider'd. But each Kingdom had a particular Parliament, much after the manner practis'd in the United Provinces of the Low Countries. Each Kingdom was Sovereign, and yet they consulted in common, upon the Affairs that concern'd the Heptarchy; and the Acts and Resolutions of the Assembly-General were to be punctually observ'd, since every King and Kingdom had assented thereto. Such was the Form of the Heptarchical Government, on which I shall no farther insist, desiring to speak more fully of it in another Place.

But as Time and Circumstances often cause Alteration in the best Constitutions, it happen'd that the Ambition or Restlessness of their Kings did not suffer the Anglo-Saxons to remain long in that Union, the Form of their Government suppos'd. The most Powerful often took Advantage of the Weakness of the rest to aggrandize themselves at their Cost. Hence their frequent Wars with one another, which ended in the Destruction of some of the seven Kingdoms that were annex'd to others, and at last in the Union of All under the Government of a single Prince. Herein chiefly consists what is transmit'ted to us of the History of the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons; I mean their continual Wars from the Beginning to the End of the Heptarchy.

Another Cause of their Wars, was the Ambition of their Monarchs, who, not content with the Prerogatives annex'd to their Dignity, were for stretching their Rights. Had the Historians that writ of the Heptarchy been pleas'd to have given us an exact Account of the Prerogatives of the Monarch, we should have been able to judge, in some measure, of the Causes of the Wars, so frequently occasion'd by the Disputes on that Head. But as they have only mark'd the Time and Success of these Wars, without letting us know the Reasons and Motives of them, the History is render'd very imperfect and incapable of being so coherent as one would wish, since the Annals give us only a bare Relation of Facts, without any manner of Connexion. All we can gather from them is, that the Anglo-Saxon Kings were naturally very restless, and Enemies to Peace. But this Character is not peculiar to them, since in the following Ages there has been no greater Union among the Princes of Europe.

Besides these Wars, to which the Historians and Annalists have chiefly confin'd themselves, there were, no doubt, many more agreeable and affecting Events, that would have embellish'd and enliven'd their Histories. But unhappily these Writers being all Monks, had not Judgment enough to make Choice of such Matters as would have render'd their Works entertaining. The Affairs of Religion, and especially the Founding of the Monasteries, and the Privileges of the Monks and Clergy, were the only Things they enlarg'd upon. As their sole View was to shew the Origin of these Foundations, and the Endowments of the Monasteries, in doing this, they could not help informing Posterity that there were in England seven different Kingdoms; whose Kings founded such and such Monasteries, and granted them such Revenues and Immunities. By this they were led to write a Kind of History of the Heptarchy, otherwise the Ground of their Rights would not have appeared. But on the other hand, as their Design required nothing more, they were satisfied with relating the Succession of the Kings in the several Kingdoms, with some of their principal Actions. This is properly all the Assistance we have for the History of the Heptarchy, the chief Subject whereof consists of Religious Affairs. Of which therefore it will be necessary to say a few Words.

When the Saxons arriv'd in England, they were all Pagans and Idolaters. It was one Hundred and Fifty Years after their Arrival, before they were instructed in the Christian Religion. Their Conversion began in 597, with the Kingdom of Kent, by Austin a Benedictine Monk, sent by Pope Gregory I. and ended in 653 with the Kingdom of Mercia, by the Ministry of certain Missionaries from Northumberland. During these 56 Years (scilicet) propagating the Gospel, Revolutions happen'd in some of the seven Kingdoms, whereby Christianity was so rooted out, that it was again to be planted, as if it had never been heard of. This was the Case of the Kingdom of Elfric, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. So from the beginning of these Conversions to the End, there was in England a mixture of Christians and Idolaters; some of the Kingdoms being converted, whilst others remain'd in Paganism; neither were all of the same Kingdom converted at once.

Austin preach'd to the Saxons of Kent, Mellitus to the East-Saxons, Paulinus to the Northumbrians, Birinus to the West-Saxons, Wilfred to the South-Saxons, Felix to the East-Angles, and the Northern Monks to the Mercians. But all these preach'd not with the same Success, because the Conjectures were not every where alike favourable. However, in the Space of about 60 Years after the coming of Austin, all England was converted. But no more of this at present, as I intend to speak more largely of the Church of each Kingdom.

GENEALOGY OF THE KINGS OF MERCA

GENEALOGY OF Y^E KINGS OF NORTHUMBERLAND

I have another, and no inconsiderable Remark to make, and that is, the Monks, in converting the Anglo-Saxons, took care to inspire them with a Reverence for Monasteries and the Monastick Life. They wrought so upon the Minds of the Kings and Great Men, that it is astonishing what Number of Monasteries, from the Conversion of the English to the Dissolution of the Heparchy, that is, in 200 Years, were founded in England, and what immense Riches the Monks had acquir'd in that Time. Religion seem'd to consist in enriching the Monks, and the highest Perfection in embracing a Monastick Life. For this Cause Kings and Queens, Princes and Princesses, strip themselves of all their worldly Grandeur, to pass the Residue of their Days in a Monastery; some to expiate their enormous Crimes, others as believing it the readiest Way to Heaven. The Monk did not neglect to cherish the Fervour of this Sort of Devotion, extolling to the Skies those that resolv'd to offer such Sacrifices to God, and Sainting all that died in these pious Dispositions. Hence the great Number of Saints of both Sexes, recorded in the Ecclesiastical History of England, among whom are several Kings, as being of all others the best able to purchase a Sainthood this Way.

After these general Remarks, I proceed now to the particular History of each of the seven Kingdoms, of which I shall relate only what is material, to avoid as much as possible, the Driness which usually attend such kind of Summaries.

SUMMARY of the HISTORY

O F

NORTHUMBERLAND.

Northumberland, its Bound.

THE Kingdom of Northumberland was situated on the North of the Humber, as its Name imports. It was bounded on the South and parted from Mercia by that River, on the West by the Irish Sea, on the North by the Country of the Picts and Scots, and on the East by the German Ocean. It contain'd the present Counties of Lancashire, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, York, and Durham. The principal Cities were York, Dunelm, (since call'd Durham), Carlisle, (nam'd by the Romans, Luguballia), Hexham or Hagustad, Lancaster, and some others of less Note. This Country was divided into two Parts, Deira and Bernicia, each, for some time, a distinct Kingdom of itself. Bernicia was partly situated on the North of Severus's Wall, and ended in a Point at the Mouth of the Tweed, Deira contain'd the Southern Part of Northumberland, as far as the Humber. The greatest Length of the whole Kingdom, including both Parts, was 160 Miles, and its greatest Breadth 100.

I D A.

Ida, the first King, began his Reign in 547, and died in 559. After his Death Northumberland was divided into two Kingdoms, namely Bernicia and Deira. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, and Alla of Deira, but the Occasion of this Division is unknown.

In Bernicia.

572. FRIDULPH.
579. THEODORIC.

In Deira.

559. ALLA, died in 588.

Of all these Kings there is nothing known but the Time of their Death.

Athelrick being very old when he came to the Crown, his Son Adelfrid govern'd the Kingdom in his Name, without the Title of King; and having espous'd Acca, Daughter of Alla King of Deira, who died in 588, got possession of that Kingdom, tho' Alla left a Son of three Years old, named Edwin.

A DELFRID.

Adelfrid (1), succeeding his Father in 590, became very powerful and formidable to his Neighbours, particularly to the Welsh, as well as to the Scots and Picts. But of his Wars Historians have related only this remarkable Particular: Adelfrid preparing to lay Siege to Chester, then in the Hands of the Welsh, these last were bent to give him Battle; and to procure the Blessing of God on their Arms, twelve hundred and fifty Monks from the Monastery of Bangor were order'd to pray near the Field of Battle, during the Fight. The Monks making too much haste to the Place appointed, were met by Adelfrid, who being told the Reason of their leaving their Monastery, put them all to the Sword. This Massacre was follow'd with a signal Victory over the Welsh; after which Adelfrid enter'd Wales, and entirely demolish'd the Monastery of Bangor (2), where was still above 1000 Monks, since Bede assures us they were divided into seven Chapels, the least of which consisted of above 300. Two of the Gates of this immense Edifice were above a Mile asunder. As this was a very ancient and famous Monastery, in all probability the Monks driven out of Britain by the Saxons had taken refuge there.

Whilst Adelfrid was aggrandizing himself by his Conquests, and growing formidable to all his Neighbours, Edwin, Son of Alla King of Deira, wander'd from Place to Place, destitute of the necessary Assistance to recover his Father's Dominions. Nay, it was even difficult for him to find where to remain in Safety. Adelfrid his Enemy was so powerful, and so dreaded, that not one of the English Princes dur'd to hazard his Dominions in Defence of a distressed Orphan. At length Redwald King of the East Angles, pitying his Condition, afforded him a Retreat at his Court. He was then about 30 Years old, of a noble Presence, and withal possess'd of such good Qualities, as gain'd him the Love and Esteem of Redwald and his Queen. Scarce had he begun to enjoy the Sweetness of his Retreat, when he saw himself on the Brink of Destruction by Adelfrid's Enmity and Redwald's timorous Conduct. Adelfrid learning the King of East-Anglia was forming some Project for the Restoration of Edwin to the Throne of Deira, sent Ambassadors to him, to desire him to deliver up Edwin, or put him to Death; and in Case of Refusal, to proclaim War against him. Redwald, surpris'd at this Demand, was some time

(1) Adel, Athel, Ethel, signify Famous or Noble: Fred, Frid, Frith, signify Peace: Adelfrid or Ethelfrid (i. e.) famous for Peace: Athelric, Nobly Strong; Ric signifying, Strong or Powerful.
(2) This Monastery was in Flintshire, near the River Don. Camden, p. 556. Yrr. p. 164. One may judge of the Magnificence of this Monastery by Malaguth's Description of it: Quorum incredibilem mŕid atque numerum fuisse, indicio sunt in quibus candelis ut semper Patres Ecclesiarum, ut agnoscant partem, tanta turba candelarum, quantum quis alibi cernat.

This Prince carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy, higher than any of his Predecessors. He claim'd an absolute power over the other Kings, and treated them with little or no respect. He shew'd the most regard for Ethel King of Kent, whose Sister Ethelburga, a Princess of great worth, he desir'd to espouse. He imagin'd his being Monarch would cause his proposal to be gladly received; but he met with more difficulty in his Courtship than he expected. Ethelburga, being a zealous Christian, would not hear of marrying an idolatrous Prince, tho' otherwise never so much to her advantage. Her Brother was no less averse to the match, and when propos'd to him, refused to give his Consent, unless his Sister had free Liberty publicly to profess her Religion. Tho' this Condition was by no means pleasing to the Monarch, yet the desire of possessing a Princess whose Worth was universally known, inclin'd him to agree to whatever was required. On the other hand, Ethelburga was prevail'd with to consent, in expectation that after the Example of Botha of France her Mother, she should be able likewise to lead her Spouse and his Subjects to the knowledge of the Truth. Every thing being settled to the King of Kent's satisfaction, Ethelburga set out for Northumberland, accompanied with some Ecclesiastics, and particularly Paulinus, consecrated Bishop by Justus Archbishop of York. This was the same Paulinus that convert'd Edwin and the Northumbrians to the Christian Religion, as will be more fully related in the History of the Church.

Edwin liv'd several years in a profound Peace, both feared and esteem'd by all the Kings of the Ugtry. He improv'd these favourable Junctures, not only in maintaining his Dominion over the other Kings, but also in establishing good order in the State, and enacting wholesome Laws, which he caus'd to be strictly observ'd. Historians remark, that in his reign Justice was administered with that impartiality and rigor, that a Child might have gone over the whole Kingdom of Northumbria with a Piece of Gold in his hand, without danger of robbery. But Edwin's chief care, after his Conversion, was to spread the Christian Religion where it was yet unknown, and replant it, where it had been abolished. By this Intigation, perhaps by his absolute order, it was, that Erpwald King of East-Anglia, permitted the Gospel to be preach'd again in his Dominions, and at length turn'd Christian himself. Edwin, who could but ill brook the least Opposition to his Will, pretended to have an Authority over the rest of the Kings, of which he was extremely jealous. By an Ensign carried before him in the form of a Globe (1), as a symbol of the Union of the Heptarchial Government in his Person, he gave them to understand, he would be considered, not only as their Head but their Master.

Of all the Anglo-Saxon Princes, Penda King of Mercia, was the most envious at Edwin's Greatness. This Prince being naturally selfish and proud, and looking upon his dependence on the King of Northumberland as dishonorable, was extremely desirous to cast off that Badge of Slavery. But as he did not dare to undertake alone so great an Enterprise, he impatiently waited for a favorable opportunity to act. At that very time, there was another Prince in the Island, who, being in the same case, no less ardently desir'd to throw off the English Monarch's Yoke. This was Cadwalla King of Wales, who deem'd it a dishonor to him and his Country, to pay tribute to a foreign Prince. These two Princes knowing at length each others thoughts (2), enter into a league against Edwin, and make preparations, which as they could not be concealed, caus'd Edwin to resolve to prevent them if possible. Accordingly he advances as far as Heathfield (3), where meeting the confederate Kings, the two armies came to Engagement. The Battle was fought on both sides with desperate fury. The Mercians and Welsh confided in their numbers, and the Northumbrians in the valor and prudence of their King. Edwin, tho' inferior in number of Troops, supplied that defect by his courage and conduct, and kept the balance even, which made him hope victory would at last incline to his side. But a fatal Accident robb'd him of that presence of Mind he had all along preserv'd, and which was then more than ever necessary. Offrid, his eldest Son, bravely seconding him, was slain at his feet with an arrow, which threw him into such a rage, that he rush'd among the thickest of his Enemies, without minding whether he was follow'd by his Soldiers. He was immediately run thro' in many places, and with his Life lost the Victory. Upon Edwin's disappearing, the dismay'd Northumbrians begin to fall into disorder, and at last relinquish the Field of Battle, and take to flight.

Edwin began to fall into disorder, and at last relinquish the Field of Battle, and take to flight.

Thus fell Edwin, in the forty eighth year of his Age, the sixteenth of his Reign, and the ninth of his Monarchy. By his first Wife, Daughter of Charles King of Mercia, he had two Sons, Offrid and Edfrid. By his second, Ethelburga of Kent, he had two other Sons, and two Daughters, who all died in their Infancy, except Affeda, Wife of Osric King of Northumbria. Edwin reled at Deoraby, now Aldby (4) in Yorkshire.

INTERREGNUM.

The two conquering Kings behav'd upon their Victory, more with all imaginable Cruelty. As the Northumbrians, after the Loss of their King and Army were unable to resist them, they enter'd Northumberland and ravag'd the Country in a terrible manner. Cadwalla, tho' a Christian, carried his Barbarity to that height, that Edfrid, Son of Edwin, dreading to fall into his Hands, surrender'd himself to Penda, from whom he expected more favor. He was received at first with some Civility, but was afterward, by Penda's Command, murder'd in his Palace. Queen Ethelburga and Paulinus fled to the King of Wales, who gave his Sister some Lands to found a Monastery, where she pass'd the residue of her Days. As for Penda, he was by the same King's means, made Bishop of Rechester.

The Northumbrians were so weaken'd by their defeat, and the cruelty or rather fury of the two victorious Kings, that they remain'd a long time before they recover'd themselves. At length, seeing no end to their Misfortunes, they judg'd it more honorable to die with their Swords in their Hands, than perish by the barbarity of the two Tyrants, who breath'd nothing but blood and slaughter. Accordingly, being resolv'd to sell their lives dear, they consider'd of choosing a Leader. But when they came to the Election, the old jealousies between the Brettons and Danes reviv'd, they could not agree upon choosing a King in common. The Men of Deoraby chose Osric, a relative of Edwin; and the Brettons set Anfrid on the Throne. This last, after the defeat and death of his Father, was sent into Scotland with Osfrid and Osby his Brothers, where they were all three baptiz'd.

These two Kings were no sooner on the Throne, but they abjur'd the Christian Religion, which they had before profess'd. But if their rebellion against God was pardon'd, their punishment was no less so, being both slain in the first year of their reign. Osric valiantly besieging Cadwalla in Wales, with an Army of unskill'd Troops, the Welsh King, declining to be thus brav'd, falls out and attacks him so briskly, that his Army is routed, and a much slain on the spot. After which he marches against the King of Brettona, who was at the head of twice the number of Men, and amusing him some time with propositions of Peace, till he was within distance, fell upon him unexpectedly, and made a terrible slaughter of the Northumbrians, Affrid himself being killed in the Battle.

INTERREGNUM.

It is easy to conceive the wretched condition of Northumberland, after so many successive Losses. Cadwalla's rage, being inflam'd by the efforts of the Northumbrians, seem'd incapable of being glutted with less than the entire destruction of the miserable Nation. His barbarities at length oblig'd Osfrid, Brother of Affrid, to resolve to hazard all, in order to relieve a People so cruelly oppress'd. In this generous resolution, he assembles a small body of Forces, with which he boldly opposes the Tyrant. Tho' the King of Mercia was now return'd to his Kingdom, Cadwalla looking upon Osfrid's army with the utmost contempt, march'd against him, not doubting of Success (5). Osfrid being inform'd of his approach, intrench'd himself in an advantageous Post, where he absolutely expected him. But as he relied more on the assistance of Heaven, than his own strength, he erected a Cross before the Camp, and falling down on his knees with the whole Army, humbly implor'd a blessing on his Arms. In the mean time, Cadwalla advanc'd full of Confidence, not questioning in the least but the Superiority of his Forces

(1) In Latin, Taffia; Lophus on Vigernus speaks of it.

(2) Cadwalla says Goffry of Monmouth, being forc'd by King Edwin to fly into Ireland, soon after return'd with a great Army of Irish, and overcame Penda King of the Mercians, oblig'd him to join his Forces against Edwin.

would procure him the Victory. In this belief, to encourage his Men by his Example, he attains in person to the Enemy's Intrenchments, wholly intent upon satisfying his insatiable Rage. But while he is endeavoring to open a passage to join his Friends, he is thro' thro' by an arrow, which put an end to his Projects and Life. His death calls for a general among his Troops, who were by degrees to retreat. Then the Northmen, finding out of their Rintreechments, fill upon their Enemies, driving out that they are entirely routed. Then it is gloriously, that the protection of Heaven appears to visibly increase the Friesth, that the Field of Battle was nam'd Hebden, or Heaven Field, the same that is now call'd Hebden (7).

OSWALD.

After this great Victory, Oswald took possession of the two Kingdoms of Northumberland, to which he was Heir, namely, to Brenda by his self his Father, and to Deira by his Mother, Sister, of Eborac. He was the most knowing as well as most pious Prince of his Age, having been educated in the Christian Religion whilst in Scotland. His strict Virtues, great Humility, and Zeal for the advancement of the true Religion, gained him to such a degree the love and esteem of his Subjects, that they revered him as a Saint at his death. He had the happiness and satisfaction to see his Country men the Tyneside of Caledonia, to unite the two Kingdoms of Northumberland, under his dominion, and moreover to be erect a Monach of the Anglo-Saxons. It is even pretended that the Irish, Scots, and Picts, were tributary to him. He took satisfaction care to restore the Christian Religion in his Dominions, from whence the late Troubles after Edwards Death had entirely banished it.

The Prince spent four Years in this foible and necessary work, but at length was obliged to leave off in order to possess the dignity of the King of Moria, who was preparing to attack him. Penda, ever restless and haughty, could not bear to see Oswald his superior, as Monarch; and therefore to free himself from so uneasy a dependence, without any declaration of War, he suddenly raised up arms to fight him. Oswald being sensible that it was of the utmost consequence speedily to oppose the King of Moria's Designs, made haste to meet him before he had assembled all his Forces. Penda taking advantage of this Precipitation which rendered him superior to his Army in number of Troops, gave him Battle, and obtained a signal Victory, which would have retounded soon to his Shame, had he not fulfilled it by his cruelty.

Having march'd Northward, he laid siege to Philostratus, a strong Town built by Ida, where meeting with more resistance than he expected, he resolv'd to retreat to Athens. To that end, having laid under the walls a great quantity of Wood, he set fire to it as soon as the wind serv'd his design. But Ida was the fire lighted, when the wind came about and blew the flame suddenly into Philo's Camp, by which the besiegers were great Sufferers. This stratagem failing, he rais'd the Siege, and quitting Northwardland, caus'd the War into East-England. Philo, retreat affording the Northwardians a little respite, the Eastward place Ofusa, Brother of Ofusald, upon the Threne; and the next year Ofusald, Son of Ofrica slain by Ofusald, was crowned King of Deira.

Often thought he was very unjustly dealt with in being deprived of part of his Brother's Dominions; but as he dreaded another Invasion from Penda, it was no proper Season to do himself justice. As long therefore as he was under that apprehension, he lived in a good understanding with the King of Diura. But the moment he sees Penda engaged in other wars, he asserts his claim to Diura, and opens a quarrel with Osavin, who after trying several ways to satisfy his Enemy, is forc'd at last to take up arms in his own defence. Ojays was a mild and peaceable Prince, more devout than brave, and tho' drawn into the war purely by necessity, yet for all that he could not conquer his Scruples. He verily believed, the shedding his Subjects blood in his quarrel, was the greatest of Sins, and therefore withdrawing privately from his army, he retir'd to a certain Earl's House (5), whom he suppos'd to be his best Friend, with design to betake himself from thence to some Monastery. But before he could put his project in execution, his treacherous Friend betray'd him to Ojays, who order'd him to be inhumanly murdered, in expectation of seizing his Kingdom with the greater ease. This barbarous Action did not however procure him the advantage he hop'd for. The people of Diara, exasperated against him, and desiring to fall under the dominion of so cruel a Prince, immediately set Adewale, Son of Ojewal his Brother, upon the Throne, who was better able to defend himself than his Predecessor. Some time after, Ojays touch'd with remorse, founded a Monastery in the very place where Ojwin was murder'd (4), flattering himself he should atone for his crime by this slight Penance.

OSWY 652. ADELWALT ill in Revue in Deira.

It was hardly poffible for Ojuy and Aduvala, tho' very near Relations, to live in a good understanding. Ojuy felt prevail'd his claim to the Kingdom of Diara, and Adi-uals could not be ignorant of it. Consequently it was his intereft not only to fufpect his Uncle's Defigns, but even to put it out of his power, if poffible, from giving him any affiftance. Upon this Reafon, he readily listen'd to the propofal of a League with the Kings of Mercia and East-Anglia, againft Ojuy, Penda, tho' feventy eight years old, was the neareft of Age to Ojuy. Ojuy being inform'd of it, did all that lay in his power to divert the impending Storm, even to the offering Money to Penda, to bribe him to defert from his Enterprize. But nothing could affuage that Pikes, the irreconcilable Enemy of the Nor-thumbrians, who feem himfelf fupported by the Armies of East-Anglia and Diara, believ'd he had now a favourable opportunity to gratify his Paflion. Ojuy therefore found he was oblig'd to ftand alone againft thefe three Enemies, whofe united Forces could not but infpire him with fome dread. In this preffing neceffity, he made a vow to fword a dozen Monks, and make his Daughter a Nun, if God would give him the Victory. To this vow it is that Hiftorians ascribe the Succels God was pleas'd to vouchfafe him in this War.

Whilst the two armies were advancing towards one another, Adwalew form'd new Projects. He consider'd to which side hever the Victory inclin'd, it would prove equally dangerous to him, since he had the same reason to fear, as he being deprived of his Dominions by Penda as by Offo. And therefore he resolv'd to save his own Troops and fland neuter during the Battle, that he might be in condition to defend himself against the Conqueror. When the two armies came in fight, Penda, who had not devied into Adwalew's design, boldly attack'd the King of Bernicia, not doubting of being followed by the Deirans and Eagls-Anglians. But when the Mericians saw Adwalew draw off his Troops, each arden alvated, and thinking they were betray'd, began to give ground. Mean while, the King of Merica and Eagls-Anglia did their utmost to revive the Courage of the flighted Troops. But being both slain in endeavouring to renew their fight, their army was put to rout. This Battle was fought in Yorkshire on the banks of the Aire, and the place was afterwards call'd Wanslyfield (c).

After this Victory, Ofus, without loss of time march'd into Mercia, and became master of that Kingdom, which he enjoy'd but three years. In that Interval, the Monarchy, vacant ever since the death of Ofwald his Brother, was conferr'd upon him. Penda was properly the only Prince that could justly pretend to it, but withal the most dangerous to be entrusted with it.

Ofwy held Mercia by right of Conquest, whilst the Sons of Penda were forc'd to seek for refuge among their Friends. Their misfortune would doubtless have been of longer continuance, had not the rigorous proceeding of Ofwy's Officers compell'd the Mercians to take up Arms. They concert'd their measures so well, that when Ofwy least expected it, the Northumbrians were on a sudden driven out

A few Years after Ofuy in some measure repair'd this Loss, by the acquisition of Deira, upon the death of Adwalu, who died without Heirs. Thus Northumberland was once more united into one Kingdom.

O S W Y alone.

This Re-union however did not hold long. Ofuy's tender affection for his natural Son Alfred, induc'd him to divide Northumberland again, and make him King of Deira, tho' contrary to the People's Inclination.

in Deira.

Ofuy, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, died in 670 (1). The beginning of his Reign was disturb'd with wars, but his good fortune prevail'd at last, and procur'd him some quiet. Bede, for reasons taken notice of in the History of the Church, ranks him among the most illustrious Kings of the Heptarchy, and loads him with praises; tho' his Reputation was very much sullied by the murder of Ofuin. By Austada, Daughter of Edwin, he had two Sons and three Daughters. Egfrid his Son succeeded him both in his Kingdom, and in the Monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons. The Deirians, upon Ofuy's death, revolted against Alfred, and put themselves under the dominion of Egfrid, who thereby became King of all Northumberland. Alfred retir'd into Ireland, where he applied himself chiefly to his Studies, in expectation of a favorable opportunity to recover his Dominions.

E G F R I D alone.

Egfrid, tho' he came to the Crown young, soon made himself both esteem'd and fear'd. The Picts invading his Territories, were defeated several times, and forc'd in the end to purchase a Peace with part of their Country. Wulpher King of Mercia, thought likewise to make some Conquests in Northumberland; but before the end of the War, was very glad to preserve his own Dominions. Egfrid's good success in the beginning of his Reign, procur'd him the dignity of Monarch, which his Father enjoy'd before him.

In the Year 684, he sends an Army into Ireland for the conquest of that Island, under the Conduct of Berfrid, whose Cruelties to the Irish, especially in not sparing their very Churches and Monasteries, caus'd the Enterprize to miscarry. The Irish recovering out of their first surprize, defend themselves so well, that Berfrid is forc'd to return home with his almost ruin'd Army.

Egfrid not being able to gain any thing from that quarter, resolves to enlarge his bounds towards the North, and to that end carries his arms into the Country of the Picts, who little expected an Invasion. For which reason they betake themselves to their Morasses and Fens, to avoid the first attacks of their Enemies. Egfrid was so unwise as to follow them, and lead his Men into unknown Defiles, which he could not get clear of. Whereupon, the Picts, who were perfectly acquainted with the Country, harass'd his hunger-starv'd Troops in such a manner, that he lost above half his Army. And at last, to open a Passage, he was forc'd to come to a very unequal Engagement, wherein he lost his Life, in the fortieth year of his Age, and fifteenth of his Reign.

Egfrid was twice married; Adelfrida his first Wife, Daughter of Amas King of the East-Angles, and Widow of Thombert, an English Lord, is said to remain a Virgin, tho' he had two Husbands, and at last to be entirely parted from Egfrid. She founded a Monastery at Ely, and was the first Abbess herself. She was reverenc'd in England by the Name of St. Audry.

The death of Egfrid, and loss of his Army, were extremely prejudicial to the Kingdom of Northumberland, which from that time never recover'd its former Lustre. The Picts improv'd their Victory by the Conquest of part of Bernicia, which lay convenient for them. The Welsh, on the other hand, possess'd themselves of the two Provinces, that formerly compos'd the Kingdom of Archeute, and out of them erected the Kingdoms of Lenox and Cumberland; the first of which was taken from them some years after.

Egfrid leaving no Issue, the Northumbrians recall'd Alfred from Ireland, and crown'd him King of both Kingdoms, which from thenceforward remain'd always united.

The Picts and Welsh having had time to secure their Conquests before Alfred was sett'd in his Throne, it was not possible for him, after Egfrid's death, to recover them out of their Hands. All he could do, was to defend, and that with great difficulty, the rest of his Dominions from the frequent attacks of his Neighbours. The Monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons went to the Kings of Wessex.

Alfred ended his days in 705, having reigned twenty years after his Restoration. He left his Son Ofred to succeed him at eight years of Age, under the Guardianship of a Lord nam'd Brithric.

O S R E D.

The Minorities of Princes being generally attended with Troubles, it happen'd in the beginning of This, that Edulph, a certain Lord of the Country, taking advantage of Ofred's youth, made an attempt upon the Crown. A powerful Party having own'd him for King, Ofred and his Guardian were oblig'd to retire to Bamborough-Castle, where they were immediately besieged by Edulph. The length of the Siege giving Brithric time to look about him, and his Friends an opportunity of rising in favour of their lawful King, Edulph found himself desert'd on a sudden, and forc'd to raise the Siege in confusion and hurry. Whereupon, Brithric improving this happy Turn, fall'd out in pursuit of the Ufurper, and taking him prisoner, ordered him to be beheaded, about two months after his Revolt.

When Ofred came of age, and was master of himself, he fell into a wicked and lewd course of Life; but especially he had little or no regard for the Monks, which was look'd upon Then as the height of Impiety. He made no scruple, as 'tis pretended, to debauch the Nuns, and even to force them when fair means would not prevail. Tho' this Imputation cannot be said to be certainly true, yet the Effects of it were great. After Alfred, Ofuy's natural Son, came to the Crown, all the Bastards of the Kings, or their Descendants, imagin'd they had the same right to aspire to the Throne. This prov'd the occasion of many Troubles in the Kingdom. Cenred and Ofrie, descendants of Ogga, natural Son of Ida, seeing Ofred was neither esteem'd nor belov'd, form'd a Party against him, which was abetted to the utmost of their Power by the Regular and Secular Clergy, whose interest it was to have a new Sovereign. This Party became at length so strong, as to be able to give Ofred Battle, wherein he was slain, in the nineteenth year of his Age, and eleventh of his Reign. Cenred, the principal Author of the Revolt, was his Successor.

C E N R E D.

This Prince died in the second year of his Reign, and Ofrie that assist'd him in obtaining the Crown, mounted the Throne after him.

O S R I C.

He reign'd eleven years without doing any thing remarkable, and left his Crown to his Cousin Ceolulph.

C E O L U L P H.

This Prince turning Monk in the seventh or eighth year of his Reign, pass'd the residue of his days in the Monastery of Lindisfarne. Edbert ascend'd the Throne after him.

E D B E R T.

The Coronation of Edbert was immediately follow'd by an Invasion of the Picts in the northern Frontiers. This War obliging him to march all his Forces towards the North, the King of Mercia taking advantage of their distance, fell upon the southern parts of Northumberland, and carried off a great Booty.

Edbert, towards the end of his Reign, having made a League with Oengulfa King of the Picts, recover'd the City of Archeute (2), Capital of the Kingdom of Lennox, taken by the Welsh in the Reign of Alfred. Droevana, General or Prince of the Welsh, endeavouring to relieve Archeute, was defeated by the confederate Kings. Shortly after, Edbert retir'd into a Monastery, leaving his Crown to his Son Ofulph.

OSULPH.

73. Osulph was assassinated in the first year of his Reign: and Alfred succeeded, though not of the blood-royal, was raised to the Throne.

MOLLON-ADELWALD.

74. Mollon-Adelwald's election was a fresh occasion of sundry Contentions that afflicted Northumberland, and prov'd in the end the destruction of the Kingdom. The Northumbrians having been lately of the error of placing on the Throne a King not of the Royal Family, all the Great Men thought themselves entitled to the Crown, as well as the Princes of the blood. Hence those many factions, that ended at last in the entire loss of the publick Liberty. Some of the Nobles finding Adelwald had rais'd himself to the Throne by help of a powerful Party, believ'd it allowable for them to do the same. Osulf, one of these Lords, led the way, but dash'd the King from this Competitor. Afterwards, Alfred, descended from Ida, by Alaric, one of his natural Sons, following the example of Osulf, and secretly conspiring against Mollon, found means to insinuate him and put him to death; after which he was crown'd in his stead.

ALCREDE.

75. Mollon's Faction, that was very much humbled by his death, having in time recover'd the superiority they had lost, Alfred was forc'd to fly to the King of the Picts, for fear of falling into the hands of his Enemies. As soon as he was gone, Ethelred, Son of Mollon, was plac'd on the Throne by his Father's Party.

ETHELRED.

76. As Ethelred had been rais'd to the Crown by the interest of his faction, he judg'd the best way to fix himself in the Throne, would be by the death or banishment of the Heads of the contrary Party. Accordingly, three of the principal opposers of his Election were put to death for forg'd or flight Crimes. But this method, instead of having the expected Effect, serv'd only to hasten the plots of his Enemies, whom the death of the three innocent Lords surpris'd with a plausible pretence to take up Arms. In a short time, they were able to bring into the Field an Army, that gave the King some uneasiness. The King however leading his best Troops against them, under the command of a General entirely devoted to his Service, was in hopes of speedily reducing them to obedience. But his Army was overthrow by the Rebels. This defeat, which was soon follow'd by a second, threw them into such an ill Situation, that he was oblig'd to fly for refuge to some of the neighbouring Kingdoms. Upon his retiring, Alfwald, Son of Osulf, and Grandson of Egbert, was plac'd on the Throne by the victorious Party.

ALFWALD I.

77. Alfwald I. reigned eleven years with great Justice and Moderation. But however, it did not prevent his being assassinated by one of the contrary Faction. He was honoured by his Followers as a Saint after his death.

OSRED II.

78. Osred, Son of King Alfred, was chosen in his room, who, very unlike his predecessor, became so contemptible, that he was confin'd to a Monastery the first year of his Reign. Alfred's Party were deeply concern'd in deposing Osred, as he had interest enough to recal and place him again on the Throne, after twelve years exile.

ETHELRED restor'd.

Ethelred began his new Reign with two acts of Cruelty, () Sons of Dorestan, and Hroddu say, that Osred went from his Monastery into exile. From whence being invited over by some of his Party, but afterwards deserted by them, he was taken up by Ethelred and put to death. S. Daniel. p. 112. Brook. p. 405. So that he was no Monk, as Kep & Call say.

that very much exasperated his Enemies against him. He put Osred his Predecessor to death, who, tho' a Monk, made him uneasy (1): And then dispatch'd out of the way Alphas and Alfwin, Sons of the good King Alfwald.

During this Reign, the Danes made a descent into Northumberland, and burnt Lindisfarne Monastery. Allur'd by the booty, taken in this first Expedition, they came again next year, and pillag'd Tinmouth Monastery, founded by King Egfrid. Ethelred, by the assistance of his Father-in-law, Offa King of Mercia, prevented them from carrying their Ravages any farther, and drove them back to their Ships; where almost all of them perish'd in a sudden and violent storm on the English Coast.

After Ethelred was recall'd, his cruel and revengeful temper very much inflam'd the enmity of the opposite Faction towards him. Mean while, regardless of the murmurs of his enemies, he thought only of glutting his Revenge, and establishing himself in his Throne, by the death or banishment of those, he most fear'd. At length, attempting to send Aradulph, one of the principal Lords of the Country, into exile, he gave the contrary Party an occasion to rebel. After the civil War had lasted two years, the Malecontents, finding they had taken a tedious and uncertain way to get rid of their King, caus'd him to be assassinated. However his faction was still powerful enough to place Oswald, one of their own party, on the Throne.

Charles the Great, Ethelred's Friend, was so incens'd at him, with the Northumbrians, that he was going to proclaim war against them, as appears in Alcuin's Letter, on this occasion, to Offa King of Mercia.

OSBALD or OSRED.

Whilst people were intent upon the publick rejoicings at the election of the new King, the opposite party laid their measures so well, that Oswald was dethron'd twenty-seven days after his Election, and Aradulph chosen in his room.

ARDULPH.

The divisions that prevail'd in Northumberland, still continued to rend that unfortunate Kingdom. Aradulph was supported in the Throne only by one of the Factions that was then the most powerful. But this did not hinder the other Party from frequently attempting to get up Alfred, formerly King of Northumberland, but a Son nam'd Almund, who was head of this Party. This Prince, beginning to grow formidable, Aradulph put him to death, judging it necessary to sacrifice him to his Safety. His death being look'd upon by his Friends as a Martyrdom, Almund was rank'd in the number of the Saints. But this was not all that follow'd upon his death. It awak'd the King's enemies a pretence to rise in arms, and set Alfwald, a Lord, at their head. But this General being vanquish'd, and slain in battle, the Malecontents remain'd quiet for some time, in expectation of a more favorable opportunity. And indeed, the face of Affairs was quickly chang'd. For the opposite party became at length so powerful, that the King was glad to escape out of his Enemies hands, by flying to the Court of Charles the Great, where the English were always welcome.

ALFWALD II.

After the retreat of Aradulph, Alfwald II. who had chas'd him away, was plac'd on the Throne, and reigning about two years, by his death, left the Crown to Andred.

ANDRED.

In Andred's Reign it was that Northumberland submitted to the dominion of Egbert, King of Wessex, who put an end to the Heptarchy.

History of the Kingdom of MERCIA.

Mercia.

THE Kingdom of Mercia was bounded on the North by the Humber, by which it was separated from Northumberland; on the West, by the Severn, beyond which were the Britons or Welsh; on the South, by the Thames, by which it was parted from the Kingdoms of Kent, Suffex and Wessex; on the East, by the Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia. Thus Mercia was guarded on three Sides by three large Rivers that ran into the Sea, and served for Boundary to all the other Kingdoms. Hence the name, Mercia, from the Saxon Word, Merc, signifying a Bound, and not, as some fancy, from an imaginary River call'd Mercia. The Inhabitants of this Kingdom are sometimes term'd by Historians, Mediterranei Angli, or the Mid-land-English, and sometimes South-Humberians, as being South of the Humber; but the most common Name is that of Mercians. The principal Cities of Mercia were Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, Leicester, Coventry, Lichfield, Northampton, Worcester, Glocester, Derby, Chester, Shrewsbury, Stafford, Oxford, Bristol. Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy this was the finest and most considerable. Its greatest length was a hundred and sixty Miles, and its greatest breadth about one hundred.

Malmsh.

This Prince was fifty Years old when he came to the Crown. Ethelbert had not without reason pass'd him by after his Father's Death, he being the most restless and stirring Prince that ever reigned before or since in England. He hated Peace worse than Death. I have already in the History of Northumberland, spoken of his Wars with Edwin, Oswald and Osby. His War with the Kings of Wessex and East-Anglia, to avoid Repetition, shall be related in the History of these two Kingdoms.

c. 21.

In 653, Penda caus'd Peda his eldest Son to be crown'd King of Leicester, and then sent him into Northumberland to espouse the Daughter of King Osby, where he was converted to Christianity. He brought back with him some Missionaries, who preach'd the Gospel in Mercia with good Success. But Penda lived and died a Pagan.

Bede, I. 5.

Malmsh.

At length Penda was slain in Battle in the eightieth Year of his Age, as was related in the History of Northumberland. He left five Sons, Peda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Mercwald, and Mercelm, and two Daughters, Ciniburga and Cinjuintha.

(1) The Saxon Annals, say in 625.(2) He also defeated Crocanhild, King of Wessex, at Aston, near Wallingford. *Sax. INTERREGNUM.

After the Defeat and Death of Penda, Osby became Master of Mercia, and kept it three Years. However he left Peda his Son-in-law the little Kingdom of Leicester. But Peda being soon after poisoned by his Wife, Osby seized that too, and held it with the rest of Mercia, till he was driven thence by Wulfer, as we have seen in the History of Northumberland.

WULFER.

Wulfer was almost as much a Stranger to Peace as his Father Penda. He wag'd War at several times, with all the neighbouring Princes, with various Success, one while Conqueror, another while vanquished. As the Particulars of these Wars are not very material, and besides are but lamely related by the Historians, it is needless to insist upon them. I shall only observe, that he took Adelwalch King of Suffex Prisoner, and brought him to Mercia, after having conquer'd his Kingdom (2). Some time after Adelwalch turning Christian during his Imprisonment, Wulfer gave him the Isle of Wight, which he had likewise subdu'd. There is room to conjecture, that Wulfer had also conquer'd the Kingdom of Essex, since it is well known he dispos'd of the Bishoprick of London in favour of one Wina.

bloody Battle with such equal Success, that neither could boast of the Victory.

715. Cœlred was far from being of his Predecessor's Mind to prefer the Monk's Habit before a Crown. He not only dis- regarded the Monks and the rest of the Clergy, but if the Historians are to be credited, violated their Privileges with- out any scruple. This Behaviour, so contrary to that of all the other English Princes, raised great Clamours against him. The Monks in particular took all occasions to paint him in the blackest Colours. Their Animosity followed him even into the other World. After his Death, which hap- pen'd in 716, they gave out, that he reign'd his last Breath, blaspheming and talking with the Devil. Such kind of Reports against those that were not in the Interest of the Monks, were not spread without Design. The Histories of those days are full of the like Tales. Ethel- bald, Grandson of Egppa, Brother of Penda, mounted the Throne after Cœlred.

ETHEL BALD.

716. This Prince was one of the most illustrious Kings that had hitherto worn the Crown of Mercia, to which he added the Dignity of Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, resign- ed by Ina King of Wessex, when he turned Monk. This Dignity seems to have confided originally only in presiding at the general Assemblies, and commanding the Armies of the seven Kingdoms, and some other Prerogatives, which conferr'd no right of Sovereignty over the other Kings. At least, the Electors looked upon it in this Light. But the Monarchs generally consider'd it after a very different man- ner. They were no sooner invest'd with it, but their first care was to grasp at an unlimited Power, to which they thought themselves intitled by the Examples of the pre- ceding Monarchs. Ethelbald, improving some favorable Junctures in his Reign, carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy to the highest degree, and thereby grew very troublesome and formidable to the other Kings (1). For which reason the Kings of Wessex and Northumberland agreed to attack him from two different Quarters at once. As Mercia was situated between these two Kingdoms, Ethelbald was oblig'd to send half his Army towards the North, whilst with the other half he march'd himself against the West- Saxons commanded by Ethelun. The Particulars of this War are unknown, except that Ethelbald was vanquish'd and his Army put to rout (2).

Four Years after, this Prince was slain (3) in a Mutiny of the Army rais'd by a Monk named Beornred, who was proclaimed King by the Soldiers.

BEORNRED, the Ufurper.

757. Beornred's Election by the Army, who had no right to assume such an Authority, was very displeasing to the Mercian Lords, especially as the King elect was no ways related to the Royal Family. And therefore, before Beornred had time to establish himself in his Usurpation, they forthwith placed on the Throne Offa Nephew of the late King. Presently after, Offa drawing an Army to- gether, gave the Ufurper Battle, and obtained a complete Victory. Some say, Beornred was slain, and others, that he maintain'd his Ground for a while in some part of Mercia.

Mat. Par. a.

Offa was one of the most famous Kings that reign'd in England during the Heptarchy, not only for his being in- vest'd with the Dignity of Monarch, but for his Victories over the Welsh and the neighbouring Saxon Princes (4), and for several other things which I shall briefly relate. One of his greatest Victories was that over Aldric King of Kent in 774.

Nothing was more common than to see those who were invest'd with the Monarchy, aspiring to a sovereign Authority over the other Kings. Offa, treading in the Steps of his Predecessors, never ceased to disturb his Neighbours on that occasion, and was engag'd by his Ambition in continual Wars with such Princes as disput'd his pretended Rights.

But these Wars are so confusedly and lamely related by the Historians, that all I could say, would not suffice to give a clear Notion of them. We must therefore be contented with what has been said of him in general, which may serve to discover the Character of King Offa.

Whilst Offa was employ'd in subduing the Saxon Kings, the Welsh, always upon the Watch to improve the Advan- tages afforded them by the frequent Diffentions of the English, thought they had now a fair Opportunity to attack him. This unexpected War, wherein the Welsh at first were successful, caus'd Offa to conclude a Peace with the English, in order to turn his Arms against the Welsh. He quickly reduced them to such a Condition, that they were forced to abandon not only their late Conquests in Mercia, but also part of their own Country beyond the Severn, which Offa seiz'd and peopled with English Colonies. But to prevent the Welsh from ever retaking it, he threw up a Rampart, defend'd by a large Ditch, by means of which he parted his Conquests from the rest of Wales. This Rampart, in length twenty four Miles, reaching from the Mouth of the Dee, to the place where the Wye runs into the Severn, was call'd Claudioff, or Offa's Dike (5).

In 786, Offa made his Son Egfrid Partner with him in the Government, and gave his Daughter Eldburg in Mar- riage to Heribric King of Wessex.

What call'd the greatest Blemish on Offa's Reputation was his Treachery to Ethelbert King of the East-Angles. This young Prince desirous to marry, came to the Court of Offa and demand'd his Daughter Aethelfrida in Marriage. He was receiv'd at first with great Marks of Affection and Esteem. But soon after the Scene was changed, Offa, by the pressing and repeated Intigations of Quendrida his Wife (6), who represented to him that he ought by all means to embrace so fair an Opportunity of becoming Master of East-Anglia, was persuad'd to break the most sacred Laws of Honor and Hospitality, by the Murder of Ethelbert (7). Which done, he marches into East-Anglia with a numerous Army, before the East-Angles had time to prepare for their Defence, and meeting with no Opposition, seizes the Kingdom, and unites it to Mercia.

He had no sooner committed this horrid Fact, but he was tormented with cruel Remorse. His Crime was con- tinually before his Eyes, and tortured him to such a De- gree, that he could not enjoy a Moment's Ease. To ap- pease his raging Conscience, he resolv'd upon a Journey to Rome, (which he perform'd in 794) to obtain a Pardon from the Pope, and secure himself from the Punishment due to his Crime. The Pope (8) granted his Request, on con- dition he would be liberal to the Churches and Monasteries: for that was the only way then of atoning for Sins. It were to be wish'd that Reformation had also been join'd as a necessary and previous Condition.

Among the Liberalties of Offa to the Churches of Rome, we must not omit one of great Consequence for England. Ina King of the West-Saxons, had now founded at Rome a College for the Education of English Youth; for the Main- tenance whereof the Founder order'd a Penny to be col- lected yearly of every Family in his Dominions (9). This kind of Charity was term'd Remscot, that is, Tribute of Rome, or sent to Rome. Offa extend'd this Tax through- out Mercia and East-Anglia, the Lands belonging to the Monastery of St. Alban only excepted: And because this Money was paid at Rome on a Holy-day, call'd St. Peter's ad vincula (10), this Tax was nam'd Peter-Pence, instead of Remscot. By this means the Directors of the College were abundantly supplied wherewithal to defray the Expence they were at from the great Concourse of the English, who came to study at Rome. In process of Time, the Popes pretending it was a Tribute paid by the English to St. Peter and his Successors, convert'd it to their own use, 'till it was entirely abolished by Henry VIII (11).

Before Offa left Rome, he obtain'd of the Pope the Can- onization of St. Alban, the first British Martyr, whose Relicks were pretended to be found at Verulam. At his re- turn, he built there a fine Church and a stately Monastery, to which he granted great Privileges and a large Revenue. From that time Verulam was call'd St. Alban. Offa was also very munificent to the Church of Hertford, where the Body of the King of East-Anglia lay buried, that Prayers might be incessantly made for the Murdered and Mur-therer.

William of Malmubury, speaking of King Offa, doubts whether he should rank him among the good or bad Princes (1). The Canonization of St. Alban, procured by his means, and the founding a noble Monastery in Honor of that Saint, being put in the Balance against the Murder of Ethelbert, is the Ground of that Historian's Uncertainty.

The Reign of Offa is memorable upon several Accounts: His Dike: The Union of East-Anglia to Mercia: The erecting of Lichfield into an Archbishoprick (2), of which I shall speak elsewhere: Peter-Pence: A Body of Laws published under the Title of Mercian Laws, (i. e.) Laws of the Mercians (3), which served for Pattern to his Successors, and the greatest part whereof were inserted in King Alfred's Laws, published about the end of the next Century (4).

Offa had contracted a close Friendship with Charles the Great. We meet with some of their Letters in the Life of Offa, at the end of Matthew Paris's History: A Life wherein are almost as many Fables as Truths.

This Prince died in 796, after a Reign of thirty nine Years. Egfrid, who had already been crowned as his Partner, succeeded him both in the Kingdom of Mercia, and Dignity of Monarch.

E G F R I D.

Egfrid, who survived his Father but four or five Months, employed that time in enriching the Monks, and particularly those of St. Alban. Cenulph, descended from Wibba by another Branch, succeeded him in both his Dignities.

C E N U L P H.

Cenulph was no sooner on the Throne, but he declared

War against Edbert-Pren King of Kent, the motive whereof is unknown (5). We are only told, it proved fatal to the King of Kent, who being taken Prisoner, was carried to Mercia, where Cenulph ordered his Eyes to be put out (6), after he had placed another King (7) on the Throne of Kent (8).

Cenulph died in 819, after a glorious Reign of twenty four Years. He left a Son very young, named Cenelm, and two Daughters, Quendrida and Burganilda.

C E N E L M.

Quendrida, eldest Sister of Cenelm, hoping to mount the Throne, if her Brother was out of the way, caused him to be assassinated by one Ascobert, who threw his Body into a Well, where it was found, as 'tis pretended, by a Miracle. Quendrida did not reap that Benefit from her Crime, she expected, for the Mercians placed on the Throne Cenulph Uncle of the late King.

C E O L U P H.

This Prince after a Year's Reign was deposed by Bernulph, one of the principal Lords of the Country.

BERNULPH, 821. LUDICAN, 823.
WITGLAPH, 825.

I shall say nothing here of these three last Kings of Mercia, because I shall have occasion to mention them in the History of the Kings of Wessex.

History of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE Kingdom of the East-Angles was bounded on the North by the Humber and the German Ocean: On the East by the same Ocean, which surrounded it almost on two sides: On the South, by the Kingdom of Essex; and on the West, by Mercia. Its greatest length was eighty, and its greatest breadth fifty five Miles. It contain'd the two Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, with part of Cambridgeshire. The chief Towns were Norwich, Thetford, Elp, and Cambridge. I have already related, how this Kingdom was founded by the Angles that landed on the eastern Coasts of Britain, under twelve Chiefs, the Survivor of whom, Uffa, assum'd the Title of King of the East-Angles.

U F F A.

We don't find this Prince acted any thing remarkable after his being King. He died in 578, leaving his Son Titulus to succeed him.

T I T I L U S.

All we know of this King is, that he died in 599, and had for Successor his Son Redowald.

This Prince was the most illustrious of all the Kings of East-Anglia, if not of the whole Heptarchy. As I have had occasion to speak of him largely in the History of Northumberland, I shall only observe here that he died in 624, leaving his Crown to his Son Erpwald.

Erpwald made but a very indifferent Figure in the Heptarchy, being all along in Subjection to Edwin King of Northumberland, who might have depriv'd him of his Kingdom, with the Consent of the East-Angles, if the Obligations he had receiv'd from Redowald his Father would have suffer'd him to have been guilty of so black an Ingratitude. However he was in reality the Sovereign of East-Anglia, tho' he left Erpwald the Title of King. Erpwald was assassinated in 633, after he had reign'd about nine Years.

I N T E R R E G N U M.

After his Death, East Anglia had no King for three Years, the Reason whereof is unknown. In 636 the East-Angles plac'd on the Throne Sigebert, half Brother of their last King.

S I G E B E R T.

This Prince, who was banish'd by Erpwald his Brother by the Mother's Side, on suspicion of aspiring to the Crown, had retir'd into France, where he became a Christian. As soon as he was King of East-Anglia, he made it his chief Business to bring his Subjects to the Knowledge of the true God; which indeed was planted among them in the Reign of Redowald, but having made no great Progress, was now almost extinguish'd. After he had effected this Work by the Assistance of Felix a Burgundian Priest, he retir'd into a Monastery, resigning his Crown to Egric his Cousin.

E G R I C.

Egric soon after his Coronation, being attack'd by Penda King of Mercia, the East-Angles having no great Confidence in their new King, petition Sigebert to quit his Monastery, and put himself at the Head of their Army. He stood out a good while against their Intreaties: But posses'd with a Notion that Heaven must crown so pious a Prince

(1) Probably the true Reason why W. Malmubury gives him an indifferent Character, is, because he seized the Lands of several Monasteries, particularly of that at Malmubury. See W. Malm. p. 30.

(2) Upon his conquering Kent he remov'd the Archbishoprick See from Canterbury to Lichfield. See M. Paris, p. 978, 979. Malm. de Pontif. p. 199.

(3) Concerning this Matter, see Nicoll's Hist. Libr. p. 45. and his Preface to Dr. Wilkins's Saxon-Laws.

(4) Geffroy of Monmouth, l. 1. c. 203; and Ranulph of Cestry, l. 1. c. 50. confound these Mercian Laws with the Laws of one Martia, Wife of Canute, a British King. Alfred the Great says in his Preface to his Laws, That he had taken them from the Laws of Ethelbert King of Kent, Ina King of Wessex, and Offa King of Mercia. Rapin.

(5) Malmubury alleges no other Reason for it, but that he was push'd on by an inveterate Animosity against them, which he inherited from Offa, p. 33.

(6) W. Malmubury says, that he ordered him to be set at Liberty soon after, p. 33.

(7) Catbed. Malmubury.

(8) He restored Adlard, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Dignity of Metropolitan. Malm. libid.

with Victory, they press him so earnestly, that at length he yields to their Request, and heads the Army with Egric, carrying nothing but a Switch in his Hand. God, who is not directed by the Imaginations of Men, gave the Victory to the Mercians, both the East-Anglian Kings being slain on the spot. They were succeeded by Annas, Son of Ennius, Nephew of Redowald.

ANNAS.

644. Annas was one of the most illustrious Kings of East-Anglia. By his Aid it was, that Cenwalch King of Wessex, who fled to him for Refuge, was restored to his Kingdom, of which he had been depriv'd by Penda in 645.

654. This Action drew upon him the Hatred of Penda, who Ann. Sax. of Revenge, resolv'd to carry Fire and Sword into East-Anglia. Annas died whilst he was preparing for his Defence, leaving the Management of this dangerous War to Ethelric his Brother and Successor (1).

ETHELRIC.

654. Ethelric dreading the Valour and Power of Penda, bribes him with a Sum of Money to desist from his War with the East-Anglians, and to induce him to invade Northumberland, offers to accompany him with all his Forces. I have already related how they were both slain in an Engagement with Ofsa, Adawald, Brother of Ethelric, mounted the Throne after him.

ADELWALD.

655. We know nothing more of this Prince, but that he died in 664, leaving his Crown to Adulph his Nephew, Son of Ethelric.

ALDULPH.

Of this Prince all we can learn is, that he was alive in 680, and assisted at the Council of Hatfield. His Successor was Alfwald.

ALFWALD.

Alfwald died in 749, and was succeeded by Beorna and Ethelbert, who divided the Kingdom (2). Florist. M. W. A.

BEORNA and ETHELBERT.

Ethelbert dying before the Year 758, Beorna reign'd alone. 749. But we know nothing more of him, but that he was succeeded by Ethelred.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred dying about the Year 790, left the Crown to Ethelbert.

ETHELBERT.

This is the Prince that Offa King of Mercia put to death in order to seize his Kingdom in 792 (3). From that time East-Anglia and Mercia made but one Kingdom.

History of the Kingdom of ESSEX.

Kingdom of Essex.

THE Kingdom of Essex, or the East-Saxons, was bounded on the North, by East-Anglia, on the East by the German Ocean, on the South, by the Thames, and on the West, by Mercia. Its greatest length was seventy five Miles, and its breadth thirty eight. It contain'd the Counties of Essex and Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire. The principal Cities were London and Colchester; the first of which became afterwards the Metropolis of all England. It had formerly been very considerable, by reason of its Situation, in the time of the Romans, who made it a Colony. But in all probability it was reduc'd very low after the Arrival of the Saxons.

This Country having been extorted from Vortigern by Hengist, after the Massacre of the British Lords, was erected into a Kingdom by Erchenwin the first King. Historians have neglected to inform us of the occasion and manner of founding this Kingdom, by which the Successors of Hengist were depriv'd of almost as large a Tract of Land as the Kingdom of Kent. Had a Monastery been in the case, we should have had all the Particulars.

ERCHENWIN.

527. Erchenwin began his Reign in 527, and died in 587, after he had reigned sixty Years. He was succeeded by his Son Sludda. G. de. an. l. l. c. 6.

SLEDDA.

587. It is not known in what Year this Prince died, but only that his Son Sabert or Saba reign'd in 599.

SABERT.

604. Sabert was the first Christian King of Essex, being converted by the preaching of Milnutus, and Solicitation of Ethelbert King of Kent, his Uncle by his Mother's Side (4). He was noted for his Piety and Zeal for the true Religion. He died in 616, and was succeeded by his three Sons (5). B. de. an. c. 3.

SAXRED, SEWARD, and SIGEBERT.

616. These three Princes reigning together, forsook with one Consent the Christian Religion, which they had profess'd B. de. an. M. W. A.

during their Father's Life. After they had reign'd seven Years, they rashly came to an unequal Engagement with Cinigisl and Quicelm Kings of Wessex, and were all three cut off, with their whole Army. Their Successor was Sigbert the Little. Beale, l. 2. c. 15. M. W. A.

SIGEBERT the Little.

Sigbert the Little. Nothing particular is known concerning this Prince, not so much as the time of his Death, but only that he was succeeded by Sigbert the Good, Grandson of a Brother of pious King Sabert, and was on the Throne in the Year 655. 623.

SIGEBERT the Good.

Sigbert restor'd the Christian Religion in his Dominions, from whence it had been expell'd ever since the Death of Sabert. He was assisted therein by Cedd, a Northumbrian Priest, consecrated Bishop of the East-Saxons. This Prince was assassinated in 655, by two Counts his Relations, who, having been excommunicated by Cedd, complain'd that the King, instead of avenging their Quarrel, had cast himself at the Feet of the Bishop, begging pardon for conversing with them after their Excommunication. His Successor was Swithelm his Brother. 653. Off. W. G. in. G. M. A. c. 22.

SWITHELM.

There is nothing particular concerning this Prince except that Sebba and Siger succeeded him. 655. Fl. W. G. G. M. A.

SEBBA and SIGER.

Sebba was Son of Seward, and Siger, of Sigbert the Little, Son of the same Seward. Siger returned to Idolatry; but Sebba steadfastly adhered to the Christian Religion. They were Vassals to the King of Mercia, as was before observed in the Reign of Wulfer. Siger dying in 683, Sebba remain'd sole King of Essex.

SEBBA alone.

Sebba reign'd about eleven Years longer, and then, 683.

(1) The Sax. Ann. Hastings, p. 317, and Madox, say, that he was slain in a Battle with Penda.

(4) Ricard, Sister to Ethelbert, was Somer's Mother. Rapin.

being very old, turned Monk in 694. He left his Crown to Sigward and Senofrid his Sons.

SIGHARD and SENOFRID.

694. These two Brothers reigned, and very probably died, together about the Year 705. Offa, Son of Siger, mounted the Throne after them.

OFFA.

705. This Prince desiring to marry, and casting his Eyes on Cinifwintha, Daughter of Penda King of Mercia, goes to the Court of Genred to demand this Princess his Aunt in Marriage. But Cinifwintha, being very religious and not young, persuades her Lover to turn Monk, as she does likewise her Nephew King of Mercia. These two Princes went to Rome together, and received the Tonsure at the Pope's Hands. Offa is said by some to be succeeded by Seolred or Seired, Son of Sigbert the Good.

SEOLRED.

Seolred reigned thirty eight Years, and was killed at 707. laft, but by whom, or in what manner, is unknown. Swiðred his Son succeeded him, as some say.

SWITHRED.

This is the last King of Essex, whose Name occurs in History or the Saxon Annals. He began his Reign in 746, and in case he was alive at the time of the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, must have reigned seventy eight Years.

Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, there is none whose History is so imperfect as that of the Kingdom of Essex.

History of the Kingdom of KENT.

Kingdom of Kent. THE Kingdom of Kent, the first that was founded by the Saxons, being neither large nor very considerable, made no Figure in the Heptarchy, only during the Reigns of Hengist and Ethelbert. It was very advantageously situated, having the Sea on the South and East; the Thames, on the North; and the little Kingdom of Suffex, on the West. As long as this last subsisted, it served as a Bulwark to the Kings of Kent, against the Ambition of the Kings of Wessex. But after it was subdued by the West-Saxons, the Kingdom of Kent was in continual Danger of falling under the Dominion of these powerful Neighbours. The Truth is, the Jealousy between the Kings of Wessex and Mercia, and the Equality of their Forces, were the only things that long prevented this little Kingdom from becoming a Prey to one or other of them. It was not above sixty Miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The chief Towns were Doraborn or Canterbury the Capital, Dover, Rochester, and some others not so large indeed, but considerable however for their Situation and Harbours, as Sandwich, Deal, Folystone, Reculver, &c.

HENGIST, first King.

455. Hengist arrived in Great Britain in 449. He assumed the Title of King of Kent in 455, and died in 488. He was succeeded by his Son Escus.

ESCUS.

488. As the Saxons, after the Death of Hengist, conferred the Command of their Armies on Ella King of Suffex, Escus very likely was not in so great Esteem as his Father. I know of nothing remarkable concerning his Reign (1), which lasted to the Year 512. His Successor was Oda his Son.

OCTA.

512. This Prince suffered, or at least could not prevent the dismembring of Essex and Middlesex from the Kingdom of Kent, to form the Kingdom of the East-Saxons. This is the only Particular we meet with during his twenty two Years Reign. After Oda, his Father Hermeric ascended the Throne of Kent.

HERMENRIC.

534. There is nothing particular concerning this Prince, who reigned however thirty Years. Before his Death he associated Ethelbert his Son and Successor.

ETHELBERT.

568. Ethelbert was one of the most celebrated Kings, not only of Kent, but of the whole Heptarchy. He was famous upon many Accounts, particularly for his being the first Christian King of his Nation. But as I intend to speak elsewhere of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, I shall relate here only such of Ethelbert's Actions as respect not Religion.

This Prince, who had a great and an aspiring Genius, beheld with regret, that his Predecessors had lost the Dignity of Monarch and the Superiority Hengist had over all the Saxons, settled in his time in Great-Britain. At his coming to the Crown, he finds Caulin King of Wessex in possession of this Superiority as Monarch. He resolves to dispute it with him, but is twice worsted. For this cause he remains quiet till the Year 593, when he takes up Arms again, not singly as before, but in conjunction with all the other Kings, who are displeased with Caulin's seizing the Kingdom of Suffex. Ethelbert being declared General, defeated Caulin, who died soon after.

After Caulin's Death, Ethelbert being elected Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, and forgetting the Fall of Caulin, of which he himself was the cause, exercised an almost absolute Power over all the Kingdoms lying South of the Humber, the Northumbrians alone having found means to keep themselves independent. All the rest chose rather to submit than contend with him (2).

Besides his being formidable to his Neighbours for his great Accomplishments, he had moreover the Advantage of being allied to France by means of his Marriage with Bertha, Daughter of Cherebert King of Paris. This Alliance procured him great Respect, the Kings his Neighbours having reason to dread the introducing the French into England, as he might easily have done. But though the Haughtiness wherewith Ethelbert treated them, they had still a much greater Occasion to be alarmed.

Upon the Death of Crida King of Mercia, Ethelbert seized that Kingdom, though the deceased King had left a Son of fit Age to succeed him. In this Ethelbert trod exactly in the Steps of Caulin, though he had himself stirred up the other Kings against that Monarch, on account of his Ambition. Thus Men, for the most part, condemn in others what they approve in themselves. Ethelbert it seems pretended that he had a Right as Monarch, or as Descendent of Hengist, to succeed to all the vacant Thrones in the Heptarchy. For when Fortune smiles on a Man, he easily finds Reasons, good or bad, to support the most exorbitant Pretensions. This open Usurpation, began to stir and take Measures to put a stop to this formidable Power, before it grew to a greater Height. The Monarch dreading they would all join in a League against him, and serve him as they did Caulin, thought it not Prudence to expose himself to the same Danger. Accordingly, to make them easy, he restored the Kingdom of Mercia to Wibba, Son of Crida, reserving however such an Authority over him, that he durst not undertake any thing without his Order or Leave. Satisfied with this kind of Moderation, the English Princes laid aside all thoughts of a War, which Necessity alone had driven them to.

Nothing very remarkable happened in the rest of Ethelbert's Reign, except what relates to Religion, which I shall speak in the History of the Church. This Prince had two Wives, the first was Bertha of France,

(1) H. Huntingd. says, that he enlarged his Dominions, by conquering the Kingdom of the Britons, p. 519.

(2) Malmstun observes, that King Ethelbert, in the beginning of his Reign, was so Scorned to the neighbouring Princes; for being beaten in one or two Battles, he could scarce defend his own Territories: but when in his ripe Years he had learn'd more Experience in War, he soon brought under his Subjection all the Nations of the Anglo-Saxons, except the Northumbrians. Rapin.

by whom he had Edbald his Successor, and Ethelburga, married to Edwin King of Northumberland. The Name of his second Wife is unknown. He died in 616 (1), after he had reigned fifty two Years.

EDBALD.

616. Edbald was very unlike his Father. As soon as he became his own Master; he forsook the Christian Religion and turned Heathen. He is even said to have married the Queen his Mother-in-law. His Vices rendering him slothful and unactive, all the English Sovereigns cast off the Yoke they had worn during the Life of Ethelbert. The King of Mercia in particular having freed himself from the Servitude Ethelbert had kept him in, Edbald had neither the Power nor Courage to maintain what the King his Father thought he had so firmly established. I don't know whether Historians are not agreed in giving this Prince an exceeding bad Character, in order to set off his Conversion the more. However this be, they assure us, that by the Pains of Laurentius, Archbishop of Canterbury, he was brought to a sense of his Errors, and returning to the Profession of the Gospel, spent the remainder of his Days in the Practice of its Precepts. He left two Sons (2), Ermenfred and Ercombert, which last succeeded him, and a Daughter named Enjuith, Foundress of the Abbey of Folkestone.

Bolet. l. 2. c. 6.

ERCOMBERT.

640. Ercombert, though the youngest of Edbald's Sons, found means to ascend the Throne, in prejudice of his elder Brother (3). This Prince ordered the Temples of the false Gods to be razed to the Ground, and the Idols broken in Pieces, lest they should prove a Snare to the People. Ermenfred his Brother being seized with a Distemper that brought him to his Grave, he promis'd to leave the Crown, which of right belonged to him, to his Children. But he was not so good as his Word: Perhaps it was too late when he came to think of it just before his Death, in the Year 664 (4). He left two Sons, Egbert and Lothair, and two Daughters; Ermenilda the eldest was Wife of Wulpher King of Mercia: The other was a Nun.

M. W. l. G. M. l. i. c. 1. G. Thom.

EGBERT.

664. Egbert was no sooner on the Throne, but he put two Sons of his Uncle Ermenfred to Death, for fear they should disturb him in the Possession of the Crown. He pretended their Sister Donnena with some Lands in the Isle of Thanet, where she founded a Monastery. This Prince died in 673, leaving two Sons, Edric and Widred, who were not his immediate Successors, the Crown being seized by their Uncle Lothair.

LOTHAIR.

673. After Lothair had reigned ten Years unmolested (5), to secure the Succession in his Family, he made his Son Richard Partner with him in the Government. This proceeding obliges his Nephew Edric, Son of his Brother Egbert, to withdraw from Court, and apply to Adelwalch King of Sussex for Aid, who puts him at the Head of an Army; with which entering Kent, he vanquish'd Lothair, who died of the Wounds he received in Battle. After this Victory, Edric was crown'd without Opposition. Richard Son of Lothair fled into Germany, where Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, gave him his Sister in Marriage, and caused him to be elected King of Suabia, if we may believe some Historians. I don't know how he came to die at Lucca in Tuscany, where his Tomb is still to be seen. They stile him King of England, though at most he was but King of Kent.

Offici. Eccl. And. in fusto Ric.

EDRIC.

685. This Prince reigned but two Years (6), and as he had no Children, left the Crown to his Brother Widred, who was forced to make Swabert his Partner, whose Extraction is unknown.

G. Malm.

WIDRED and SWABERT.

(4) Malm. p. 101. gives this Character of him, "That he was famous both for his Piety towards God, and his Love to his Country."

(5) This could not be, if Malm.'s Account be true, viz. That he was molested for eleven Years by Edric the Son of Egbert, and that they had several Engagements, with various Success, p. 111.

(6) For he was depriv'd both of his Kingdom and Life, says Malm. p. 11. but how, he does not mention.

(7) According to this Computation, he must have reign'd forty Years, whereas Malm. says he reign'd but thirty three, p. 11.

(8) In his Reign Canterbury was burnt. Malm. p. 11.

the Kingdom of Kent, occasioned by the Ambition of some Nobles who fortified themselves, and refused to acknowledge Widred for King. In all probability Swabert was one of the principal of the Rebels, since he was associated into the Government. It is not known whether he was any way related to the Royal Family.

In the Reign of these two Kings, Cadwalla King of the West-Saxons imagining the intestine Divisions of Kent would render the Kingdom an easy Conquest, sent an Army thither under the Command of his Brother Mellon, who overran great part of the Country. But at length, the two Kings joining Forces, vanquish'd him in Battle. Mellon perceiving he was closely pursued, took shelter with twelve others in a House which they valiantly defended: But the Kentish Soldiers setting fire to it, they all miserably perish'd in the Flames. Cadwalla soon reveng'd the Death of his Brother, whom he tenderly loved. He entered Kent with a formidable Army, and never left till he had destroyed the whole Country with Fire and Sword. After this Invasion, Kent was reduc'd so low, that it never more made any Figure in the Heptarchy.

The two Kings enjoyed no Repose till the Year 691. This perhaps is the reason of Bede's placing the beginning of Widred's Reign in this Year, tho' he was crown'd five Years before. Swabert died in 695, and Widred remained sole King of Kent.

History of the Kingdom of SUSSEX.

The Kingdom of Sussex.

THE Kingdom of Sussex was one of the most inconsiderable of the Heptarchy. It contain'd only the two Counties of Sussex and Surry, the greatest part of which consisted of the large Forest of Andredswald, so call'd by the Saxons from Anderida, the Name it had in the time of the Romans. As this Forest stood untouched when Ella conquer'd Sussex, we may suppose it was clear'd by degrees. This Kingdom was not above fifty Miles long, and forty broad. It was bounded on the North, by the Thames, on the South, by the Sea, on the East, by the Kingdom of Kent, and on the West by Wessex. The capital City was Chichester, built by Cissa the second King of this Kingdom. He built also Cisbury, whose Ruins are still to be seen.

Huntingd.

Ella arriv'd in Britain in 476, and was crown'd King of Sussex in 491. He was a Prince of fo great Reputation among the Saxons, that they judg'd him worthy to succeed Hengist in the Command of their Armies. He met with some ill Success, having to deal with fo experienc'd a General as Arthur. But however it did not hinder him from settling in the Country where he first landed, and founding there the Kingdom of Sussex or of the South-Saxons. I have largely spoken of Baldulph and Celgerin his Sons, slain in the Battle of Badon. This Prince dying in 514, left the Crown to his only surviving Son Cissa.

C I S S A.

M. West.

Cissa was memorable only for his long Reign of seventy fix Years, and, I may add, his great Age. For supposing him but a Year or two old when his Father brought him over in 476, he must have been at least one hundred and fifteen, or one hundred and sixteen Years of Age when he died in 590. But it is not very likely Ella should bring with him a Child of a Year old.

H. Hunt.

Cissa leaving no Issue, Ceaulin King of Wessex and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons seized the Kingdom of Sussex. This occasion'd the League against him. But notwithstanding his being vanquish'd, Ceaulin his Nephew and Successor remain'd in Possession of Sussex.

From that time the South-Saxons made several Attempts to shake off the Yoke of the Kings of Wessex. And herein properly consists the History of Sussex, till the Kingdom was entirely subdu'd.

In 607 they revolted against Ceaulin King of Wessex, but were reduc'd to Obedience.

In 648 they made another Struggle, with better Success. Cenwalch King of Wessex, continuing still in East-Anglia, and Penda King of Mercia being Master of Wessex, the South-Saxons took that Opportunity to place on their Throne a King named Adelwalch.

A D E L W A L C H.

The Kingdom of Wessex having suffer'd much by Penda's

Invasion, who seiz'd and kept it three Years, Cenwalch was little able, after his Restoration, to dethrone the new King of Sussex. But Adelwalch however was not left in quiet. Wulpher King of Mercia, having attack'd Cenwalch and worsted him in several Encounters, penetrated as far as Sussex, where vanquishing Adelwalch in Battle, he took him Prisoner, and after that, became Master of his Kingdom, and the Isle of Wight. Adelwalch having embraced the Christian Religion in Mercia, where he was Prisoner, Wulpher set him at Liberty, and made him a Prefect of the Isle of Wight (1).

It is very probable Adelwalch, after the Death of Wulpher, recovered the Kingdom of Sussex, since we find in the Saxon Annals, that he was on the Throne in 686.

The same Year Cedwalla, a West-Saxon fugitive Prince, enter'd Sussex with an Army, and Adelwalch endeavouring to drive him thence, was slain in Battle.

After the Death of Adelwalch, Cedwalla would fain have made himself Master of Sussex, but was oppos'd by Authun and Berthun, who were return'd with an Army from an Expedition in the Kingdom of Kent. At the same time, Cedwalla, hearing of the Death of the King of Wessex, who had expelled him his Dominions, return'd thither, where he was plac'd on the Throne. Mean while Authun and Berthun were crown'd Kings of Sussex. They are said by some to be Sons of Adelwalch, and by others, his Generals only.

A U T H U N and B E R T H U N.

These two Kings did not live long undisturbed. Cedwalla, now become King of Wessex, made war upon them, and gained a Battle, wherein Berthun was slain.

A U T H U N alone.

Authun very probably preserv'd the Crown of Sussex, by an entire Dependence on the King of Wessex, who, after the Death of Authun, would not even suffer the vacant Throne to be fill'd.

The South-Saxons made several Attempts to recover their Liberty. They took up Arms in 722: But having taken wrong Measures, Ina King of Wessex reduc'd them to Obedience.

Three Years after, taking Advantage of some Troubles that broke out in Wessex, they placed on the Throne a King nam'd Albert. But Ina having defeated and slain the new King, united their Kingdom to his own.

However, this prevented them not in 754, in the Reign of Sigbert King of Wessex, afterwards depos'd, from revolting once more, and chusing one Osmond for their King. In all likelihood Cenulph, Successor of Sigbert, found means to reduce them again to a state of Dependence. From that time the South-Saxons, as far as appears, never attempted to recover their Liberty, their Country being considered ever after as a Province of Wessex.

History of the Kingdom of WESSEX.

The Kingdom of Wessex or West-Saxons.

THERE were in the Heptarchy three Kingdoms, two of Angles, and one of Saxons, that greatly surpass'd the rest in Grandeur and Power. The two Kingdoms of Angles were Northumberland situated beyond the Humber, and Mercia containing all that lay between the Humber, the Thames and the Severn with the two Kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia. Wessex the third great Kingdom, inhabited by Saxons and Jutes, was situated South of the Thames, in breadth about Seventy Miles from the Thames to the Brit- tish Channel; and in length one Hundred and Fifty, from the Frontiers of Sussex, to the River Tamar, which parted it from Cornwall. The principal Cities were Winchester, the Capital, Southampton, Portsmouth, Salisbury, Dorchester, Shorborn, Exeter, where a great many Britons were mixt with the Saxons. The Isle of Wight, inhabited by Jutes, was also dependent on this Kingdom.

As each Kingdom of the Heptarchy deriv'd its Name from the Inhabitants and Situation, the Kingdom of Wessex or of the West-Saxons was so call'd, because it lay

(1) And of the Country of the Meamuri in Wessex. Bede, l. 4. c. 13. which is suppos'd to be that part of Hampshire, that is now divided into the Hundreds of Meamures, East meam, and West meam. Camden in Hanpshire.

West of Suffex, Kent and Essex. Besides the Extent, the Situation of this Kingdom made it also very considerable, since it was guarded on the North by the Thames, and on the South by the Sea; on the East it was bounded by the little Kingdom of Suffex, not at all formidable to its Neighbours, and on the West by the Britons of Cornwall, divided so from the rest of their Countrymen the Welsh, by the Mouth of the Severn, that it was almost impossible for them to assist one another.

CERDIC.

519. This Prince, of whom I have largely spoken in the second Book, arrived in Britain in the Year 495, and was crowned the first time King of the West-Saxons in 519, after Arthur had surrendered to him the two Counties of Hamshire and Somersetshire, the whole then of his Kingdom. He was crowned a second time at Winchester in 532 or 533, by the same Title, upon the Delivery of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire by Mordred. He died in 534 leaving his Crown to his Son Cenric.

CENRIC.

534. Cenric, who during his Father's Life was renowned for his Valour and Conduct, after he was King, preferred a quiet Life to the Noise and Hurry of Arms. We don't find he acted any thing memorable during his Reign, except defeating the Britons, who ventured to attack him in 552. He died in 560, and was succeeded by Ceaulin his eldest Son.

CEAULIN.

560. Ceaulin, being elected Monarch after his Father's Death, carried the Prerogatives of that Dignity to a very great Height. Having brought the neighbouring Princes into subjection, he made them apprehensive, by seizing the Kingdom of Suffex after Cissa's Death, that he intended to reduce all England into one Kingdom. The better to secure Suffex, he went and kept his Court at Chichester, leaving the Government of Wessex to Ceolric his Nephew, whom he designed for his Successor. His Ambition caused all the other Kings, Ceolric himself not excepted, to enter into a League against him. He was vanquished by the King of Kent, who commanded the confederate Army (1), and forced to fly to some unknown Corner, where he ended his Days soon after. His Wars with the Britons and Aiden King of Scotland, were related in the second Book.

CEOLRIC.

594. Nothing particular occurs concerning this Prince after his Accession to the Throne upon the Death of his Uncle Ceaulin. He died in 598 and was succeeded by his Brother Ceolulph.

CEOLULPH.

598. All we know of this Prince is, that in 607 he reduced to Obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted (2). He died in 611, and had for his Successor Cinigisil his Nephew, Son of Ceolric.

CINIGISIL.

611. A Year after his Coronation Cinigisil associated Quicelm his Brother, or rather divided with him the Kingdom of Wessex.

CINIGISIL and QUICELM.

612. These two Brothers obtained in 614 a signal Victory over the Britons (3).
614. I have already given an Account of Quicelm's Wars with Edwin King of Northumberland, and shall have further Occasion to mention him in the History of the Church; and therefore shall say no more of him here.

Quicelm turned Christian a little before his Death, which happened in 635.

CINIGISIL alone.

This Prince who had embraced the Christian Religion sometime before his Brother, in 636, reigned alone till his Death. He left his Crown to his Son Cennowalch.

CENNOWALCH.

The Reign of Cennowalch was much troubled with his Wars with the Kings of Mercia. Penda, whose Sister he had married and divorced, attacked him when he least expected it, and compelled him to abandon his Kingdom, and fly for Refuge to Anna King of the East-Angles, where he remained the three Years Penda kept Possession of Wessex. Cennowalch was converted in East-Anglia, and at length restored to his Kingdom by the Assistance of Anna.

In 652 he obtained a signal Victory over the Britons (4), which was followed by another in 658 (5).
Some Years after, he was engag'd in war with Wulf-pher, Successor of Penda: but which was the Aggressor, or what the Success of the War is unknown. Wulf-pher was defeated and taken Prisoner. Others affirm he had entirely the Advantage, which to me seems most likely (6). It is certain Wulpher conquered Suffex and the Ile of Wight, which he could not have done, if Cennowalch had been in condition to oppose him. However this be, Cennowalch died in 672, and left his Crown to his Queen Seaburga.

SEXBURGA.

She was a Princess of great Courage, of a very sublime and extensive Genius, and possessed of all the Qualifications necessary for well-governing a Kingdom. She reigned but one Year, and then died, as some say; but according to others, was deposed by the West-Saxons, who thought it a Dishonour to obey a Woman (7).

After the Death or Expulsion of Seaburga, the Kingdom was divided among several of the Great Men (8), of whom Cenfus, a Prince of the Royal Blood, defended from Cenric, was the chief. Nothing more particular is known concerning this dismembering of the Kingdom, which however was united again into one Body, after these petty Tyrants were either Dead or expelled.

CENFUS, ESCWIN, and CENTWIN.

In 674, Cenfus associated his Son Escwin, and probably was forced to let Centwin Brother to the late King Cennowalch reign also over some part of the Kingdom.

The next Year Wulpher attacked the Kings of Wessex, whose Army was commanded by Escwin. A bloody Battle was fought, in which Wulpher had the Advantage; though the Loss on both sides was very great (9).

Cenfus died two Years after, and Escwin his Son did not long survive him. Thus Centwin remained sole King of Wessex.

CENTWIN alone.

History informs us, that in 682 Centwin obtained a signal Victory over the Welsh (10), upon which Cadwalader their King was forced to go and sue for Assistance from the King of Armerica: The Welsh Prince afterwards took a Journey to Rome, where he died.

About the end of Centwin's Reign, Cadwalader a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Wessex had to gain the People's Affection, that the King being jealous of him, ordered him to depart the Kingdom. As Cadwalader could not dispute the King's Command, he retired into Suffex, and being well beloved, a great many young People chose to accompany him, and follow his Fortune, inasmuch that he entered Suffex with a sort of Army (11). Adewalch, then King of Suffex, angry at Cadwalader's presuming to enter his Dominions in a warlike Manner, and without his Permission, would have driven him thence, but was slain in the fight. After this Victory, Cedwalla would have seized the Kingdom, but was prevented by Authun and Berthun, as before related in the history of Suffex. Mean while, Centwin happening to die, Cedwalla returned to Wessex, and was plac'd on the Throne.

CEDWALLA.

686. Cedwalla was not only King of Wessex but likewise Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. His first war was with Aethun and Berthun Kings of Sussex, spoken of before.

Having, end of this war to his advantage, he turn'd his Arms against Kent (1), from whence he carried off a great Booty. Then he attack'd the Isle of Wight, which belonged to the King of Staffex ever since Walther's Grant to Adalwath. Arwald, Brother of Aulwin, being then Governor of the Isle, undertook its defence ; but as Cedwalla's Forces were much superior to his, he was forc'd at last to abandon the Isle to the Mercy of the Conqueror. The Inhabitants being yet Idolaters, Cedwalla thro' a false Zeal for Religion, resolv'd to root them out, and people the Island with Christians. He would have executed this barbarous resolution, had not Wulfild, formerly Bishop of York, and then Bishop of Selsey in Staffex, represent'd to him that it would be much better to endeavour to convert them. Upon the Bishop's Remonstrances, Cedwalla relented, but on condition the Inhabitants would be instantly baptiz'd. The poor Wretches, who had no time to deliberate, embraced the Christian Religion at the first preaching of Birwin a Priest, Nephew of Wulfild, who was entrusted with their Conversion, if the bare Declaration of People threatned with death in case of refusal, may be called by that Name.

Some time after Cedwalla sent his Brother Mollin with an Army into Kent. The miserable death of Mollin there, and the terrible manner Cedwalla reveng'd it, have already been related in the history of that Kingdom.

At length, Cedwalla resolved to take a Journey to Rome to receive Baptism at the hands of the Pope: for altho' he was a Christian and a great zealot, he had never been baptized. He performed this Journey in 688. As he travelled thro' France and Lombardy, he was every where very honorably received. Cunibert King of the Lombards, was particularly remarkable for the noble Entertainment he gave Ans's Wars with the Britons in Cornwall, the Kings of Kent, the South-Saxons, and King of Mercia, rendered his valour, merit, and abilities, more and more conspicuous. But as Historians have only told us the Success, without mentioning the motives and circumstances of these Wars, it is impossible to give a particular account of them. They only inform us that he carried his Arms into Kent, from whence nothing could drive him but the bribing him with a large Sum of Money (3); that in 710, he conquered part of Cornwall: That in 715, Ina and Ceolred fought a bloody Battle at Wodensburg in Wiltshire, with equal loss on both sides. That lastly, he reduced to obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted, and plac'd one Albert on their Throne (4).

These are the military Exploits that gained Ina his Reputation for War. But the Panegyrics bestowed on him by Historians, were not owing to these so much as to four other particulars, which to them seemed of greater importance, and which they have chiefly dwelt on. First, he rebuilt Glasbury Monastery, and augmented the Revenues and Privileges in such a manner, that it became one of the most considerable in all England (5). In the second place, he published a Body of Laws, entitled, The Saxon Laws (6), that is, Laws of the West-Saxons, which served for foundation to that published in the next Century by Alfred the Great his Successor. Thirdly, Ina signalized his Piety by quitting his Crown and turning Monk, which was then looked upon as an undoubted mark of Religion. This resolution was taken by the persuasions of his Queen Ethelburga, who had prepared him for it, by frequently representing to him the Examples of so many Kings his Predecessors, that had run the same Race before, and were honoured as Saints. But lastly, what contributed most to Ina's Fame, was this: before he shut himself up in a Monastery, he went to Rome, where after conferring with Pope Gregory II, he built a large College, for the Instruction and Reception of the English Ecclesiastics that should come to study at Rome, and for the Entertainment and Lodging of the Kings and Princes of the same Nation, that should visit the Tombs of the Apostles. Adjoining to the College, he built also a stately Church, and appointed a certain number of Priests to officiate. Besides the charge of the buildings, of the ornaments of the Church, and of the necessities of the College, there was an absolute necessity of settling a standing Fund for their maintenance, according to the intent of the Founder. Now Ina had taken care of this, by laying a Tax of a Penny on every Family in the Kingdom of Wessex and Suffex, which was to be sent yearly to Rome, under the name of Rome's Tax. Some time after Offa King of Mercia imposed the same Tax on the Kingdom of Mercia and East-Anglia, and term'd it Peter-pence. Some say, Ina returned into England to have this Tax settled by the General Assembly, or Parliament of Wessex, and to get the Charter signed by all the Nobility of the Kingdom (7). After which he returned to Rome, where he took upon him the Monkish Habit (8). Ethelburga, who advised him to it only because she had a mind to become a Nun herself, put on the Veil in the Monastery of Barking.

Malmſbury is miſtaken in ſaying Ina was ſixty two years on the Throne of Weſſex, ſince it is certain he had reigned but thirty ſeven, or at moſt but thirty nine years, when he reſigned his Crown to his Couſin Adelard.

ADELARD.

Though Adelard was placed on the Throne with the content of the Assembly-General, Oswald, one of the Royal Family (9), disputed the position of it with him. Their quarrel was decided by a Battle, wherein the King was victorious over his Rival, whose Death, which happened shortly after, restored peace and tranquillity to the Kingdom. Adelard died in 740, and was succeeded by Cuadred his Brother or Cousin.

C U D R E D.

We have only the following particulars of the Reign of Cudred: for we must not expect to find any connexion between the Facts related by the Historians or Annalists.

In 743, this Prince obtained a signal Victory over the Cornish Men. Two years after, Ethelun a Weg-Saxon Lord, dissatisfied with the King, raised a fedition among the Soldiers, in which Canric, Son of Cudred was slain. This action was followed by a Civil War, which lasted some time. Ethelun being at the Head of the Rebels, dared to give his sovereign Battle, wherein the King, though not without great danger of being vanquished, gained the victory. During the Fight, Ethelun gave such notabl proofs of an undaunted Courage, and extraordinary Conduct, that the King chose rather to receive him into favour, than destroy a Subject that might be serviceable to him. And indeed, it was the same Ethelun, that in 752 vanquished Ethelbald King of Mercia, in a Battle mentioned in the History of that Kingdom (10).

Sigebert, very unlike his Predecessor, by his Vices and Cruelties (2), drew on himself the hatred and contempt of his Subjects. A certain Count (3) having expostulated with him concerning his Conduct, he ordered him to be put to Death in his Presence. This Action made the West-Saxons lose all Patience; they publicly depose him, and place on the Throne Cenulph, Son of Aelard. Sigebert finding he could have no Redress, was forced to submit to the sentence of the States, and betake himself to a Forest (4), where he was killed by a Swineherd (5).

Cenulph became very famous for his frequent victories over the Britons (6).

After he had reigned thirty Years, he grew jealous of Cunehard, Brother of Sigebert, and perhaps not without Reason. Cunehard having notice of the King's suspicions and knowing he intended to dispatch him out of the way, resolved to prevent him. To this End, discovering him one Day, as he went alone (7) to visit a certain Lady whom he admired, he followed him, with some of his Friends (8), into the House and attacked him. Cenulph defended himself furiously, and even wounded his Enemy, but at last, overpowered with Numbers, sunk down with his Wounds. The King's officers and domesticks running in at the Noise, and finding him dead, fell upon Cunehard and slew him, not regarding the large offers he made them, to spare his Life, and place him on the Throne (9). Brithric, Son of Cenulph, succeeded his Father.

BRITHRIC.

Brithric, three years after he was on the Throne, married Edburga, Daughter of Offa King of Mercia, and about the same time banished Egbert the Kingdom. Egbert, a Prince of the Royal Family (10), by his noble qualities had gained the affection of the West-Saxons to such a degree, that the King could not help being jealous. This was a sufficient inducement to Brithric to free himself from the Uneasiness, occasioned by that Prince, by removing him from his Presence (11). Egbert retired at first to the Court of Offa King of Mercia: but did not meet there with the Reception he expected, Offa being unwilling to disoblige his Son-in-law Brithric by harbouring a Prince that was hateful to him. Whereupon Egbert resolved to retire into France, where he was very civilly received by Charles the Great, who showed him, on several Occasions, marks of his Esteem. During Egbert's twelve years abode at this Prince's Court, he very much improved his natural Abilities (12), and rendered himself capable of executing the grand design of uniting the seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons into one Monarchy, as will be seen presently.

During the Reign of Brithric, the Danes made their first descent in the Kingdom of Wessex (13). They began then to be formidable, not only at Sea, but on the Coasts of several European Kingdoms. As in process of time, they did the English incredible Damage, it is not without reason that Historians have been very exact in marking the time of their first Descent.

Brithric in 799 was poisoned by Edburga his Wife (14). The West-Saxons were so provoked at this Action, that before they proceeded to the Election of a new King, they made a Law prohibiting the Wives of their future Kings from taking the Title of Queen, and sitting on the Throne with their Husbands. And lest the complaisance of the Kings to their Wives might occasion the breaking of this Law, it was further enacted, that hereafter, if any King of Wessex should dispense with the Observance of it, he should, ipso facto, be deprived of his Royal Rights, and his Subjects absolved from their Oath of Allegiance.

This affair being ended, an honourable Ambassy was sent by the West-Saxons to Egbert, to offer him the Crown. Egbert was then at Rome with Charles the Great, who received there, soon after, the imperial Crown. Here he took his leave of that great Prince, who had been a Father to him, and at his departure gave him fresh marks of his Affection.

Queen Edburga having left Wessex upon poisoning her Husband, fled also to Charles the Great, who, in consideration of the Friendship between him and her Father Offa, gave her a rich Abbey, where the might have spent the remainder of her Days in Peace (15). But that way of Life not being agreeable to her Constitution, she behaved so ill in it, that being surprised in an intrigue with a young English Gentleman, the Emperor was forced to send her away. She wandered about from place to place for some time, and at last went and ended her days at Pavia in great want.

EGBERT.

Egbert, besides the Valour natural to all the Saxon Princes, had one qualification that gave him a superiority above the other Kings his Contemporaries, which was, his great Knowledge in Politics, acquired during his abode at the Court of Charles the Great, whose Example and Instructions, no doubt, had greatly contributed towards it. He was no sooner on the Throne of Wessex, but he perceived himself superior to the other Kings, and resolved to make the best Use of it (16). But like an able Politician, he judged it necessary to proceed by degrees in the execution of his Projects. Accordingly, he spent the first seven years of his Reign in settling the affairs of his Kingdom, and in gaining the love and esteem of his own Subjects, in which he succeeded to his Wish.

The Kingdom of Wessex being bounded on the South by the Sea, and on the North by the Thames, Egbert must of course begin the extending his borders either Eastwards or Westwards. To the East lay the Kingdom of Kent, which would have been very convenient for him; but as this Kingdom was then in subjection to Cenulph King of Mercia, a Prince of distinguished worth, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, to begin with Kent would have been the ready way to ruin his Designs. And therefore, in expectation of a more favourable juncture, Egbert thought it proper to carry his Arms first towards the West, against the Britons of Cornwall. His success was so great in a war undertaken in 809, that in one Campaign he reduced all Cornwall to his Obedience (17).

The Wessex intending to assist their Brethren in Cornwall, gave Egbert a pretence to attack them the next Year. He defeated them several times, and at last subdued the Kingdom of Venedotia (18), one of the three, Wales was then divided into (19). The struggles of the Welsh afterwards to shake off their Yoke, served only to make it the heavier. Egbert re-entering their Country, destroyed all with Fire and Sword, which made them take care how they provoked him a third time to come among them.

At length the death of Cenulph in the year 819, gave Egbert room seriously to consider of executing his designs. He was immediately invested with the dignity of Monarch, to which none had a better claim than himself. His Kingdom was in a flourishing condition, whilst the rest, weakened by intestine divisions, daily lost somewhat of their lustre and power. The Heptarchy was reduced to five Kingdoms, of which he possessed one of the most considerable. In the other four, the race of their ancient Kings being extinct, nothing ensued but quarrels and dissensions among the principal Lords, who all thought they had a right to aspire to the Crown. And therefore so far were they from consulting in common the public good, that they regarded only their own Interests, and the forming of Parties to support them in their ambitious Pretensions. On the contrary, the Kingdom of Wessex became every day more powerful by the weakness of the rest, and the prudent administration of the Person that governed it, whose valour was equal to his Judgment and Ability, to set in motion the Springs of the most refined Politicks. Wherefore Egbert resolved to hasten the execution of his Project of reducing England into one Kingdom. Almost all the preceding Monarchs had form'd the same design, and their not succeeding was entirely owing to unseasonable junctures. But soon after Egbert's being declared Monarch, every thing conspired to favor him. Northumberland had been long rent by two Factions, who, little attentive to what passed abroad, were only watching opportunities to supplant one another. Merica was in no better condition. Bernulph, who had depos'd Ceolwulf, reigned only by the support of a powerful Party, who indeed had Interest enough to raise him to the Throne, but found it difficult to uphold him, by reason of the envy of the nobles at his advancement. For which cause, tho' that Kingdom was considerably enlarged by the Acquisition of East-Anglia, and tho' the King of Kent was become its tributary, it was far from being so powerful as Wessex. The East-Angles, not yet thoroughly settled in the state of subjection Offa had reduced them to, were waiting for a favorable opportunity to throw off the Merican Yoke, which to them was intolerable. The wars of the Kings of Kent with the West-Saxons and Mericians, had brought them so low, that they could not avoid being tributary to the King of Merica, and consequently were not in condition to stand against Egbert. As for the Kingdom of Essex, besides the probability of its being in Subjection to Merica, it had long made but a very inconsiderable figure, and if it was still governed by Switbred, which is uncertain, that Prince must have been of an extreme old Age.

These considerations inflaming Egbert's Ambition, he began his Preparations, which raising suspicions in the King of Merica, he thought betimes of providing for his safety. Tho' he was ignorant that Egbert intended the Conquest of all England, he could hardly doubt but he design'd to enlarge his dominions at the expence of his Neighbours. And therefore, dreading the Storm might suddenly fall on him, he believed that by attacking him before he was ready, he should break his measures and compel him to be quiet. To this end, he advanc'd with his Army as far as Ellendunum near Salisbury (1), where contrary to his expectation he met his Enemy, whom he thought to have surpris'd unawares. The two Armies coming to an Engagement, the Mericians were routed with fo great Loss, that it was not possible for Bernulph ever to retrieve it.

This Victory procur'd Egbert two great Advantages. First, As it very much weakened the King of Merica, who alone was able to withstand him. Secondly, As it opened the way to the Conquest of Kent, for which Bernulph himself had given a pretence, by attacking him first. This Conquest was absolutely necessary to his becoming master of all the Country between the Thames and the Sea. Besides, by beginning the execution of his Designs with the Kingdom of Kent, he was the less apprehensive of alarming the Northumbrians, who were too remote to concern themselves with what was transacting beyond the Thames.

Pursuant to this Resolution, Egbert sent his Son Ethelwulf with a powerful army into Kent. Baldred, unprepared against an Invasion, press'd in vain the King of Merica to come and assist him. Bernulph was disabled, by his late defeat, from bringing an army to soon into the field. Besides, Egbert had fo posted himself, that it was not possible to relieve Kent without overcoming his Army, which as Bernulph could not pretend to attempt, the burden of the war, notwithstanding his weakness, was to be sustained by Baldred alone. However he hazarded a Battle; but being vanquished, retired into Merica, leaving his Kingdom to the young West-Saxon Prince, who became master of it without any difficulty. Thus the Kingdom of Kent was united to those of Wessex and Sussex, and by that means Egbert saw himself in possession of the whole Country lying South of the Thames.

This first step being taken, Egbert rendered himself also master of the Kingdom of Essex, which is all Historians say of it, without mentioning any one Circumstance: So imperfect is the History of that Kingdom.

Tho' the Conquest of these two Kingdoms was a great step towards subduing the rest, yet the most difficult Task was still behind; namely, the Conquest of Northumberland, Merica, and East-Anglia. Had these three Kingdoms been in their former splendor, each of them in particular would have kept Egbert fully employed. Nay, had they but entered into a strict Alliance for their common defence, when they were going to be attacked, they would perhaps have caused that ambitious Prince to despair of subduing them. But their divisions prevented them from making so necessary an Alliance. The East-Angles were waiting for an opportunity to revolt against the King of Merica. The Northumbrians for some time had lived in a sort of Anarchy, which disabled them from taking any measures with regard to foreign Affairs. So far were they from any thoughts of assisting their neighbours, that they were wholly intent upon destroying one another, in which they were but too successful. Merica indeed seem'd still very powerful, but the Mericians were in no greater Union among themselves than the Northumbrians, and besides, the battle of Ellendunum had considerably weakened them; whereas Wessex was grown stronger by the Conquest of two Kingdoms.

Egbert beholding with pleasure how all things conspired to favour his designs, resolv'd to invade Merica in the first place, plainly foreseeing, could he conquer that Kingdom, the rest would make no long resistance. Merica and East-Anglia made but one body ever since their union by Offa. But as this union was not cemented by the mutual Affection of the two Nations, it was rather destructive than advantageous to the State. The East-Angles looked upon the Mericians as their hateful masters; whilst the Mericians on their part, treated the East-Angles with haughtiness, as a conquered Nation. This being the Case, it was much more easy for Egbert to foment their mutual Enmity, than for them to reap the benefit of their Union. For this reason Egbert, to accomplish his ends with the more ease, increased their animosity to the utmost of his power, not doubting but, could he once bring them to an open rupture, they would fo weaken one another as never more to be able to resist him. It is strange, since this maxim is universally known, We must divide those whom we would destroy, it should so frequently happen that they against whom it is practis'd, should attend fo little to it. The East-Angles, blinded by their extreme desire of freeing themselves from the Merican Yoke, without a moment's consideration followed the advice secretly given them by Egbert, of taking up Arms for the recovery of their Liberty. Their attention to their present Interest, prevented them from reflecting, that after they had been subservient to Egbert's design, they would be still less able to withstand him than the Mericians. It is true, Egbert, pretending to have no other view but their Interest, caus'd whatever was most capable to excite them to a revolt, to be laid before them. His Emiliars told them, there never was fo favourable an opportunity of recovering their Liberty: That the Mericians were so extremely weakened since the battle of Ellendunum, that they were hardly able to maintain their tyranny over the East-Angles: That besides, Egbert was so incens'd against Bernulph that he would readily assist them, having publicly declar'd as much. This was sufficient to induce the East-Angles to revolt. The pleasure of thinking they should be freed from their dependance on the Mericians, banish'd from their thoughts the fear of becoming subject to the West-Saxons. Thus resolv'd, they took up Arms, and chose a General, whose name Historians have neglected to relate. Bernulph inform'd of their motions, thought he could not be too speedy in putting a stop to an evil, that seem'd fo dangerous a consequence. With the first Troops he could draw together, he march'd against the East-Angles, but instead of chastizing them, as he vainly hop'd, was defeated and slain.

The East-Angles were mightily encouraged by this Success, without disheartning however the Mericians, who made fresh attempts to reduce the Rebels. They forthwith elect a King, named Ludican, who endeavours to continue the War, whilst the East-Angles are preparing to receive him, in expectation the King of Wessex would not fail them upon occasion according to his Promise. Ludican actually enter'd East-Anglia with a numerous Army; but Death prevented him from making any Progress, and rendered his preparations for that Campaign of no Effect. Some say, he was slain in a Battle: Others affirm, the East-Angles found means to free themselves from the dread of this Prince, by causing him to be assassinated.

Whether the Mericians discover'd that Egbert privately assist'd the East-Angles, or the Conquests already made by that Prince, opened their Eyes, they were sensible at length, the maintaining their dominion over East-Anglia, was not fo much the business of the present War, as the preservation of their own Liberties. In this belief, they resolv'd to exert their utmost, and chuse a King of known valour, without regarding the Interests of the several Factions, which till then had kept them divided. Their choice fell upon Witiglah, a Lord of great merit, whose Son had married a Daughter of King Cenulph. If the new King had been to deal with the East-Angles, probably he would have ended the war to his advantage. But instead of aiming at the reduction of East-Anglia, he was very much embarrassed to defend his own dominions. Egbert fearing the state of affairs might be changed under a new Prince, whose valour he was no stranger to, no longer delayed to declare openly for the East-Angles. Hitherto he had only assisted them privately, at least he had not appeared as a party in the war, raised by him between them and the Mercians, with the sole aim that they might weaken one another. But as soon as the preparations of the Mercians gave him room to fear the balance would incline too much on their side, he thought himself obliged to take other measures, by publicly assisting the East-Angles, and declaring war with the Mercians. Witiglah used his utmost endeavours to withstand the united Forces of the East-Angles and West-Saxons. He even frequently tried the fortune of his Arms in skirmishes and conflicts, but always with ill success. At length, having lost a great battle, and finding his case desperate, he fled to the Abbey of Croyland, where he lay concealed three Months. In the mean time, Egbert pursuing his victory, became master of Mercia, without any opposition. He designed to unite it to the rest of his dominions, but by the mediation of Siward Abbot of Croyland, Witiglah was restored to his Kingdom, on condition of paying homage, and becoming tributary to the Conqueror.

After the East-Angles had been subservient to Egbert's Designs, they were glad to be received into his Protection, on almost the same Terms with the Mercians, so that all the advantage procured them by the War, was the change of one Master for another.

Northumberland alone remained as yet free from the dominion of Egbert. But that Kingdom was little able to preserve her Liberty, considering the ill situation of her Affairs. Andred, who then reigned, was a King in name only. His Faction had placed him on the Throne, not that he, but themselves might reign in his Name. Besides, the Kingdom was all along rent by Parties, and frequently invaded by the Scots, who had over run great part of its Territories. It was not possible therefore for the Northumbrians to withstand the victorious Arms of the King of Wessex, or rather, of all the rest of England, which was in that Prince's Power. Accordingly, when Egbert approached with an Army that had already conquered four Kingdoms, Andred and the Northumbrians, in great Consternation, and unable to make head against him, submitted, and accepted of the same Terms granted to the Mercians and East-Anglians.

Malmib.

Thus ended the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, by the reduction of the seven Kingdoms, under the Dominion of the King of Wessex. Indeed Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, still preserved a Shadow of Liberty; but very probably Egbert would not have suffered other Kings to be chosen; after the Death of those who were then on the Throne, if the Danes, who shortly after began their Invasions, had given him time to take other Measures.

The Government of the Heptarchy, reckoning from the founding of the Kingdom of Mercia, the last of the seven Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms, held two hundred and forty three Years. But if the time, spent by the Saxons in their Conquests, be added, from the Arrival of Hengist to that of Crida, the Heptarchy will be found to have lasted three hundred and seventy Eight, from its beginning to its Dissolution.

If we enquire into the causes of the dissolution of the Heptarchy, they will very readily occur. It is easy to perceive, one of the principal was, the great inequality amongst the seven Kingdoms, three whereof vastly surpassed the rest in Extent and Power. Hardly was the Heptarchy founded, when the Kings of Wessex looked upon Sussex and Kent as extremely convenient for them, and accordingly both the one and the other were subdued by them at different times. The Kings of Mercia had an along an Eye on the Kingdom of Essex. Nay, it appears they were Masters of it for some time, and in all likelihood it was not entirely free, when conquered and united to his other Dominions by Egbert. East-Anglia, was an object that continually inflamed the desires of the Mercians and Northumbrians, the first of whom carried it at length.

Another cause of the dissolution of the Heptarchy, was the default of Male-Heirs in the Royal Families of all the Kingdoms, Wessex excepted. Hence arose those Dissensions among the Great Men, which exceedingly weakened their respective States. We may assign moreover as another Cause, the concurrence of various Circumstances, which never met but in the time of Egbert. But chiefly this dissolution was owing to the Dissection of the Providence of God, whose good Pleasure it was to raise England by degrees, and after several Revolutions, to her present height of Grandeur and Power.

The Conquests of Great-Britain and the relinquishing of the same, by the Romans, is the Subject of the first Book of this History. In the second the largest and noblest Part of the Island is represented struggling with the Anglo-Saxons, and at last obliged to submit to their Yoke. In the third, I have related, though in a very general Manner, the affairs of the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, their Wars, the succession of their Kings in each of the seven Kingdoms, and have concluded with showing this same Heptarchy turned into a real Monarchy.

It remains now that I speak of the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons to the Christian Religion, and give a Representation of the Church of England in her Primitive State, wherein consists the principal part of the English History during the Heptarchy.

STATE of the Church of ENGLAND,
FROM THE
Conversion of the English, to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy.

WE have seen, in the second Book, the horrid desolation of the British Church whilst expos'd to the barbarity of the Saxons, who thought it their duty to persecute the Christians. We shall now behold these very Saxons, from Persecutors grown Christians, by the direction of divine Providence, which incessantly watches for the welfare of Mankind, forming a flourishing Church in the same places where they had exercis'd their Cruelties. 'Tis not our business to dive into the Reasons of God's assigning different Periods to the several nations of the World, for leading them into the way of Salvation. It is sufficient for us to know and admire, that when the happy time is come, not only no obstacle can obstruct the execution of his Designs, but on the contrary, every thing helps to accomplish them: Nay, the weakest instruments, in the hands of the Almighty acquire an irresistible Force.

In order to have a clear and distinct knowledge of the manner of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, and of the most remarkable Occurrences from the foundation of their Churches, to the dissolution of the Heptarchy, England must be consider'd not, as it is at present, one Realm, but as divided into seven distinct Kingdoms. These Kingdoms being converted at different times, it will be necessary to treat of each of them by itself. And therefore, I am now about to relate how the Gospel was receiv'd by every one of them in particular, with the most memorable transactions in respect to Religion, from their Conversion to their being reduc'd under the dominion of Egbert, the first real Monarch of England.

The State of the Church of Kent.

AS Kent was first converted, I shall begin with that Kingdom. But because several accidents conspir'd to this Event, it will be proper, in order to have a just notion of the Thing, to set them all in one view before the Reader.

I have spoken in the History of Kent, of Ethelbert's Power over the rest of the Kings of the Heptarchy, and intimated, that his Neighbourhood too, and Alliance with France, did not a little contribute towards it. For this reason he omitted nothing to cultivate a strict friendship with the French, well knowing how much it might turn to his Advantage. The means he judg'd most proper to this end, was the demanding a French Princess in Marriage; accordingly he cast his Eyes on Bertha, Daughter of Cheribert King of Paris. He at first met with some Obstacle, Chilperic, who, after his Brother Cheribert's Death, had been as a Father to this Princess, would not hear a word of the Match, on account of Ethelbert's being an Idolater; and this for some time put a stop to the Matter. But Ethelbert found means to remove this difficulty, by promising to let Bertha have the free exercise of her Religion, and bring over with her a certain Number of Ecclesiasticks. Upon these terms the Princess was given him in Marriage. Chilperic her Uncle, was in hopes that as she was thoroughly grounded in her Religion, she would be so far from turning Heathen herself, that she would contribute to the conversion of the English Monarch. And in this his Expectations were answered. As soon as they came together, she spared no pains to gain his love and esteem by her affable and condescending Behaviour. Ethelbert, charmed with the good qualities of his Spouse, had all the value and affection for her he could desire. In this agreeable situation Bertha justly hoped to bring the King at length to have favourable thoughts of the Christian Religion, and therefore took all occasions to display the Gospel Truths in the most affecting Manner. Besides, the conversations Ethelbert had from time to time with Luidhard Bishop of Seisfont, who came over with the Queen, contributed very much to her Design. In a short time, Ethelbert was so wrought upon, that if he had not yet respect enough for the Christian Religion to embrace it, at least he had no aversion to the Gospel of those that professed it.

In this favourable juncture it was that Pope Gregory I. sent Missionaries into England to instruct the English in the Knowledge of the Gospel. Gildas and Bede reproach the Britons bitterly for suffering their Neighbours to live so long in Paganism without offering them their Assistance to free them from their Errors. But they blame them without Cause. It is easy to see, that whilst the Saxons oppress'd the Natives with all imaginable Cruelties, these last were very unfit Instruments to instruct their Persecutors. Besides their continual Wars gave the Saxons no time to turn their thoughts to Religious Affairs. But when they came to be settled, assistance was not wanting, and though it came from far, it was no less effectual than if it had flow'd from their Neighbours. As this here is a very remarkable Epocha in the English History, it will be proper to shew the secret ways made use of by Providence in the execution of its designs in favour of this Nation. In order to this, it will be necessary to look back a little to what happened before.

About eighteen or twenty Years before the Arrival of Bede, the Roman Missionaries, in the Reign of Alla King of Deira, some young Children were sent from thence to Rome to be sold. That sort of Trade was then commonly drove by the English, who made no scruple of selling their Children, when over-stocked. These young Slaves, being expos'd to sale in the publick Market, drew the Eyes of vast numbers of People upon them, who could not admire them enough. Among the rest, Gregory, Archdeacon of Rome, beheld them very attentively. He inquired particularly after the place of their Birth, and the Religion there profess'd. As soon as he knew they were English (1), and born of idolatrous Parents, he resolv'd to go and preach the Gospel to that Nation; and having obtained the Pope's Licence, prepared for his Journey. But the Romans, who had a great Veneration for him, petitioned the Pope not to deprive them of so useful a Pastor; and the Pope complied with their Request. Thus Gregory's Design remained unexecuted. The time appointed by God for the conversion of the English was not yet come; and probably, such were then the circumstances of the Nation, Gregory's undertaking would have met with great Difficulties. All England was troubled with Wars and Commotions, which broke out afresh continually. Ethelbert had not yet espous'd Bertha; his mind as yet was unprepared for the reception of the Gospel, and being vassal to Caenlin, he had but little power to encourage Gregory's Design. But afterwards, all Circumstances were equally favorable, and helped to promote it. Gregory, now become Bishop of Rome, call'd to mind his former Project of converting the English; and though by reason of his Dignity, which oblig'd him to reside at Rome, he could not go in Person, he sent those whom he thought capable of inspiring the People with a relish for the Gospel. He chose for this Purpose forty Benedictin Monks, with Austin at their Head, in quality of Abbot (2). In all appearance, Bertha had acquainted the Pope how well affected the King her Husband stood

(1) Bede has either invented or else heval that Pope Gregory made divers Latin Allusions upon the Answer to his Question concern'g these Boys. Particularly he saith they were Angli, he saith, Briti, non angli cum Briti, &c. These have been imagined, particularly Vossius; that the Name of Angli comes from Ang, or Angon, it is plain, their King's Child Ang gave occasion to Gregory's Question.

with regard to Religion, since they were ordered to land in Kent. Austin and his Companions (1) having passed through Faversham, where they were supplied with Interpreters, arrived at the Isle of Thanet (2), in the year of our Lord 597. As soon as they were landed, he sent the King word, that he was come into his Dominions with a Company of very honest Men, to bring him a message of the greatest Importance, and instruct him in what would procure him everlasting Happiness. Upon this Information, Ethelbert ordered them to stay where they were, designing to go himself and hear from their own Mouths the occasion of their Journey. Some few Days after, he went to the Isle of Thanet, in company with the Queen, who, in all likelihood, was not ignorant of the Reason of Austin's coming. As soon as the King arriv'd, he seated himself in the open Air, being apprehensive, as Bede says, of Charns or Spells, which in the open Field, he thought, could have no Power over him. Then ordering the Strangers to be called before him, he asked them what they had to propose. Austin, who was the Spokesman, make a long Harangue, preaching the Gospel in a forcible and zealous Manner, says the same Historian, though he relates not one word of his Sermon. Ethelbert, inform'd by the Interpreters what Austin had said, returned him this Answer: "Your Proposals are noble, and your Promises inviting. But I cannot resolve upon quitting the Religion of my Ancestors, for one that appears to me supported only by the testimony of Persons that are entire Strangers to me. However, since, as I perceive, you have undertaken so long a Journey on purpose to impart to us what you deem most important and valuable, you shall not be sent away without some Satisfaction. I will take care you are treated civilly in my Dominions, and supplied with all things necessary and convenient. And if any of my Subjects, convinced by what you shall say to them, desire to embrace your Religion, I shall not be against it."

This first step being taken, the Queen got leave for the Missionaries to settle at Canterbury, the capital of Kent, where she took care to provide them with convenient Lodgings, and procure them the liberty of preaching to as many as had the curiosity to hear them. They made so good use of this favourable juncture, that in a short time several of the principal Saxons embraced the Christian Faith. The swift progress of the Gospel at Canterbury raised the King's curiosity to be more particularly instructed in the nature of the Religion those strangers preached. At length by the persuasions of the Heathen, and frequent conferences with Austin, he received Baptism, about a year after the arrival of the Missionaries. The Conversion of the King being followed by that of multitudes of his Subjects, the Queen's Chapel, which stood without the City (3), soon became too little to hold them. And therefore they were obliged to turn one of the Heathen Temples into a Church, which was dedicated to St. Pancras. Shortly after several other Temples were served in the same manner by Ethelbert's order, and the foundations of Canterbury Cathedral were laid; which was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and was afterwards called St. Thomas. Austin began also a Monastery which he had not the satisfaction to see finished. Peter one of his companions, was the first Abbot. It was called the Monastery of St. Augustin, from its founder. Ethelbert at length leaving Canterbury to the Italian Monks, went and kept his Court at Reculver.

Thus began the Conversion of the Saxons in England. Austin and his Fellow-labourers were the Instruments made use of by divine Providence to turn them from their idolatrous superstitions to the light of the Gospel; a blessing their brethren in Germany enjoyed not till two hundred years after, in the reign of Charles the Great. Ethelbert promoted to his utmost the Conversion of his Subjects, but without using the least violence or compulsion, having learnt of his Instructors, as Bede expressly observes, that God requires none to serve him, but those who do it with a willing mind. It were to be wish'd, all Christian Princes would follow his Example! The Saxons were so eager to embrace the Gospel, that, if Historians may be credited, Austin in one day baptized ten thousand in the River Swale, which runs into the Thames.

This swift progress of the Gospel in Kent making Austin believe he should meet with the same success every where, he looked upon all England as already converted. Possess'd with this notion, he hasten'd to Arles, to get himself consecrated Archbishop of the Saxons, by Etherius [or Vigilius] then Archbishop of that place. Had he been contented with the bare Title of Bishop, one should not have wondered at it (4). But it is really surprizing, that he should aspire to the Archbishopial Dignity, at a time when he had no Bishop under his Jurisdiction. It is true the Pope had promised to make him an Archbishop, in case his Mission met with Success. But in all appearance, Gregory, by Success, meant the conversion of the English Nation in general, and not of a Part only of one of the least Kingdoms in the Heptarchy. How great progress Austin had made for the time he had been in England, yet was it made for the time that what remained to be done. His haste therefore to be made Archbishop and Primate of England, when there was but one single Church there, does not redound much to his Credit. All that can be said in his Justification, is, that the progress of Christianity at Canterbury, made him imagine the conversion of all England was at hand. And indeed, not long after his return from Arles, he erected an Episcopal See at Recheber, of which Justus, one of his Companions, was the first Bishop. Hence it is plain, the Gospel had also been preached in that City, and made some progress there.

Austin must needs have entertained great hopes of his Bede, l. 1. Mission, since fearing he should want Labourers in the apostolic 27. preaching Harvest, he sends Peter and Lawrence, with two others of his Companions, before-hand to Rome, to acquaint the Pope with his wants, and inform him how Matters stood. He took this opportunity also to desire the Pope's resolution of certain Questions, which appeared to him difficult, and might, he foresaw, puzzle him in the Government of the new Church.

The Letters of Austin, and the Accounts of those he had sent, inspired Gregory with so high a conceit of this Mission, that looking upon the conversion of the English as accomplished, though it was but just begun, he sent the Pall (5) to Austin, as a mark of distinction and honor to this new Apople. He ordered him also to erect Bishops Seats in several Places particularly at York, where was to be a Metropolitan with twelve Suffragans, and that after the Death of one of the two Archbishops, the Survivor should consecrate another in his Place, and have the Precedence of him (6). The reason of this preference with regard to York, was, because it had formerly, under the Romans, been an Archbishoprick as well as London and Canterbury. As for this last, it being then in the hands of the Britons, and already an Archbishop's See, though not under the Pope's Jurisdiction, there was no occasion to mention it. Gregory's intent therefore in making London an Archbishoprick, was to restore things to their former State. But however, he afterwards alter'd his measures at the instance of Austin, who was desirous of procuring that honor for Canterbury, the Metropolis of Kent, where he had begun to exercise his Ministerial Functions. The Pope's view then, was only to put things upon an antient Foot, when in his Answer to Austin, he told him he meant, that the two Archbishopricks of London and York should be independent of one another, however, that Austin during L. 1. should have Jurisdiction, as well over them, as all the rest of the Bishops of Great-Britain.

But all the pains Gregory was at, came to nothing for the present, since the Christian Religion was far enough from extending to Northumberland. However, the great hopes he had conceived from the Letters and Messengers of Austin, induced him to give directions concerning the English Churches, just as if they had been really formed. Besides these general orders, he exhorted Austin, in the same Letter (7), not to be elated at his having received from Heaven the gift of Miracles, which makes it probable, word had been sent him, that several Miracles had been wrought by Austin. He charged him also not to pull down such Idol Temples as were fit to be converted into Churches, but to consecrate them by sprinkling Holy-Water, and placing Relicks under the Altars. And since the Saxons had been accustomed to offer Sacrifices to their Gods on their festival Days, he advised that [upon the Anniversary of the Saints, whose Relicks were lodged there, or upon the return of the Day of the Church's Consecration] they should kill some Cattle, and provide an Entertainment, to which they were to invite the Poor. At the same time he writ to Ethelbert and Bertha, exhorting them to persevere in the true Religion, and promote the great Work undertaken by Austin. Peter and Lawrence, accompanied with Mellitus, Paulinus, Ruffinians, and some other new Missionaries, brought back these Letters, together with Sacred Vessels, and Ornaments for the Altars, Vestments for the Priests, Relicks, Books, and other things necessary for celebrating Divine Service. Austin received also the resolution of the questions he had sent to the Pope, which, with their Answers, were to this Effect.

63.

601. I. Question. How are Bishops to behave with respect to their Clergy? Into how many portions are the Offerings at the Altar to be divided? And how ought a Bishop to act in the Church?

Bed.

For Satisfaction in the first Point, the Pope refers him to St. Paul's Epistle to Timothy. To the second, he answers, That it was the custom of the Church to divide the Offerings into four Parts; one for the Bishop; another for the Clergy; a third for the Poor; and the fourth, for the repairs of the Churches. As to the last Article, which would have been very obscure, had not the Pope cleared it in his Answer, he replies, That Austin being a Monk, ought not to live apart from the rest of the Clergy, but according to the Practice of the Primitive Christians, should have all things in common (1). He adds, if there were any Clerks not admitted into Holy Orders, who could not live continentally, they were to marry, and receive the Stipends at their own Houses, according to the words of Scripture, Distribution was made to each of them according to every one's Wants. As for other Christians, he says, there was no need to prescribe any Rules in relation to their Alms-giving, since our Saviour himself says, Give Alms of such things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

Ad. iv. 22.

II. Question. Since there is but one Faith, how comes it that there are different Customs in Churches, one manner of saying Mass in the Roman, and another in the Gallican Church?

The Pope advises him to select from each Church, what he thought most convenient for the Church of England.

III. Question. What punishment ought to be inflicted on him that has stole any thing from the Church?

Gregory replies, The motives of the Theft must be consider'd, whether it was done out of necessity or covetousness, and the punishment to be proportion'd accordingly, with Charity and Temper. As for restitution, God forbid the Church should receive more than the loss.

IV. Question. Whether two Brothers may marry two Sisters, that are no way related to them?

Gregory answers, This may be done very lawfully.

V. Question. To what degree of Consanguinity are Marriages forbid?

The Pope answers, To the second degree inclusively and no farther. He would not however have those separated, who have married within the prohibited degrees before their Conversion, because they did it out of Ignorance. But he would have all the new Converts charged not to presume to do any such things, and in case they did, to be debarr'd the Communion.

VI. Question. Whether a single Bishop may ordain another, without the assistance of other Bishops, when the length of the Journey makes it inconvenient for them to meet?

Gregory replies, That since Austin was now the only Bishop in England, he might consecrate others without any assistance. But in order to avoid the like Inconvenience for the future, he would have him place Bishops so, as that they might not be at too great a distance from one another.

VII. Question. How ought I to manage with the Bishops of Gaul?

The Pope tells him, That he allows him no manner of Jurisdiction over them, because he had no design to deprive the Archbishop of Arles of the Authority he was in possession of.

VIII. Question. Whether a Woman with Child ought to be baptized?

The Pope answers, He saw no Inconvenience attending it.

IX. Question. How long after her lying-in, ought a Woman to come into the Church?

Answer. If she comes into the Church the minute after her delivery, she sins not.

X. Question. How long after the Birth, ought the baptizing of an Infant to be deferred?

Answer. A Child may be baptiz'd the moment he is born.

XI. Question. How long, after a lying-in, must it be before a Man and his Wife come together again?

Gregory is very large in his Answer, and takes occasion to blame Mothers for not suckling their own Children, attributing the rise of so ill a Custom to their Incontinency. And therefore he decides, that the Husband ought not to have to do with his Wife till the Child is wean'd (2).

XII. Question. May a Woman, during some certain times, come into the Church?

The Pope says a great deal on this head, and concludes, Womens Infirmities ought to be no obstacle to their going to Church and praying to God.

XIII. Question. May a Man that has lain with his Wife, come into the Church or receive the Sacrament, before he has wash'd himself?

The Pope here, as usual, makes a great many distinctions, and concludes, such a Man had better abstain from both for some time.

XIV. Question. May a Man after an Impure Dream, receive the Communion, or if he be a Priest, administer it?

The Pope's Answer is full of distinctions about what is, and what is not Sin: And concludes at last, a Man in the case mention'd ought not to communicate. He gives leave however, for a Priest in the same case, to administer the Sacrament, if there is no other in the way to officiate for him.

These are the Difficulties Austin wanted the Pope to resolve, which don't serve to give us any great Idea of the abilities of this famous Apostle. However, Gregory thought fit to answer them fully and distinctly, as if they had been of the utmost Importance. He had the conversion of the English so much at heart, that instead of giving Austin the least Discouragement, he extoll'd him mightily.

Austin's Care was not confin'd to the conversion of the Bede, l. 2.

Saxons only. He undertook also, what seem'd to him no less worthy of his Zeal, the bringing the British Bishops to a conformity with the Roman Church (3), and the making them acknowledge the Pope's Jurisdiction. As this is a remarkable circumstance of Austin's Life, it will be necessary to enlarge upon it a little. This design of his was not easy to be executed. The Britons thought they could justify their adhering to the same Rites and Customs they had practis'd ever since the conversion of Britain. Besides, they could not conceive upon what grounds they were oblig'd to conform to a Church so remote, or what advantage the owning the Pope's Authority would be to them. These difficulties did not discourage Austin. He had, besides his zeal for the See of Rome, another, and perhaps no less powerful motive, to induce him to this Undertaking, which was his claim to the Primacy of all Britain, by virtue of the Pope's Grant. Now, this he could never hope to attain, whilst the British Churches were independent of the Pope. He applied therefore all his endeavours to accomplish this Enterprize, which cost him more pains and trouble than the conversion of the Saxons, without having after all the satisfaction of reaping the fruits of his Labour.

The Gospel, as I before observ'd, was preach'd in Britain, either by the Apostles themselves, or by some of their Disciples. From those early days, the Britons had constantly adher'd to the Customs and Rules prescrib'd to them by their first Teachers. But the Church of Rome had made several Innovations in the Divine Services, to which they pretended all other Churches ought to conform. The opposition the Bishops of Rome every where met with, was not capable to make them drop their Pretensions. Altho' this difference was of no great consequence, it caus'd however, towards the end of the second Century, a most scandalous quarrel between Pope Victor I, and the Churches of Asia; which rose to that height, that the Pope for no other reason excommunicated them All. This affair had never been judiciously decided: yet for all that the Bishops of Rome stuck to their Claims, and did all that lay in their power to compass their Ends. The Western Churches, as nearest Rome, were least difficult to be prevailed with. Almost All, except the Churches of Gaul and Milan, conform'd at length to the Roman Ritual.

(1) Here in some Books is the second Question inserted, which runs thus: I desire to know, whether Clergy-men that cannot contain, may marry; and if they marry, whether they may return to a single life? See Selman Conc. Vol. I. p. 96.

(2) However, he allows those that do not suckle their Children, to come together after the usual Time of Purgation.

(3) Viz. about the Celebration of Easter, Bede, l. 2. c. 2. Isidorus, p. 32. The Britons used, for finding Easter, the Cycle of eighty four years, which was called the Roman Account. But about eighty years after the rearing of the Roman Empire, the Romans left off the use of that Cycle, and took up another of nineteen years; and when they had us'd it a about eighteen years, coming then to have to do with their northern Nations, they would needs have impos'd the use of it upon them, as a Condition of their Communion; and this was what Austin attempted to do. See Sp. Lloyd's History, &c. p. 67, &c.

ance abandoned the Faith. These three Prelates, having consulted together, resolved upon going into France, and leaving the repulse Saxons to themselves. This shows either that the People of Kent and Essex went all back to Paganism, or that there were not so many converts as Gregory was made to believe. Mellitus and Julus went off accordingly to their Resolution; but Laurentius staid behind, though with intent to follow them in a short Time. When he was ready to depart, it is affirm'd, that lying one Night in his Church, St. Peter appeared to him, and scourged him severely, as a Punishment for offering to abandon his Mission. The day after he went to Edwald, and having shewn him the marks of the Scourge, he converted him, and persuaded him to disengage himself from his unlawful Marriage, he having taken his Father's Widow to Wife. So far is certain, Edwald was converted: All Historians are unanimous in That: but I cannot warrant the Truth of St. Peter's Apparition. Edwald being thus returned to the Faith, recalled Justus and Mellitus, and restored them to their respective Dioceses of Rochester and London. But the East-Saxons at London refusing to admit Mellitus, he returned to Kent, where he soon after succeeded Laurentius in the Archbishoprick of Canterbury (1). He is said by his Prayers to have put a stop to a great Fire, that in all probability would have reduced the City to Ashes, and to have wrought several other Miracles, with which I intend not to swell this Abridgement.

Mellitus was succeeded by Justus Bishop of Rochester (2), to whom the Pope sent the Pall. After him came Honorius, whose successor was Dunstond. After his Death, there was a vacancy for four Years (3). Egbert and Offa, Kings of Kent and Northumberland, having held a conference together about the Affairs of the Church, resolved to send Wighard a Kentish Priest to be consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Rome. Wighard dying there, Vitalian the Pope cast his Eyes upon Adrian and Andrew, two Monks, who both refused the Archbishoprick as too great a burden for them. Theodorus a Greek, Native of Tarsus in Cilicia, to whom it was also offered, not having the same Scruples, was consecrated at Rome, and departed for England. The Pope ordered Adrian to go with him, lest, says a Historian, Theodorus, being a Greek, might introduce Customs in Britain contrary to those of the Church of Rome. As this Prelate was the most famous that in those early times filled the See of Canterbury, it will not be amiss to take a fuller view of him.

Theodorus was a Prelate of distinguished Worth, as well for Learning, as greatness of Mind, and solidity of Judgment. But he was of a warm and imperious Temper, a lover of Power, and could ill brook any opposition to his Will. Whilst he was Archbishop of Canterbury, he had frequent opportunities of extending his Jurisdiction over all England, which he never neglected, as we shall see hereafter in the account of the Ecclesiastical affairs of the other Kingdoms, particularly of Northumberland. I shall only observe here, that during his Life, he alone exercised the Archbishopial Functions, which gave him an opportunity of encroaching upon the Rights of the See of York; though Gregory I. had ordered that after the Death of Austin, the two Archbishopricks should be independent of each other. As soon as he came into England, he made a Visitation of all the Churches in his Jurisdiction, and brought the People to a thorough Conformity in the divine Service, to the usages of the Church of Rome.

As the English were yet very ignorant, Theodorus endeavoured to the utmost of his Power to instruct them, by erecting a School or Seminary at Creechlede (4), where he and Adrian, besides Divinity, taught Arithmetick, Musick, Astronomy, Greek and Latin. Bede assures us, he knew several of their Scholars that could express themselves as readily in Greek and Latin as in their own Language. Theodorus was not satisfied with promoting the love of learning among the English, by Exhortations and Instructions only, but also by the Books he brought, and sent for, into England; some of which are still extant in Manuscript, as David's Psalms, St. Chrysostom's Homilies, and Isaiah, all written in a beautiful Hand. He composed a large Work himself called Penitential, which remained not long since entire at Cambridge (5), but is not to be found there now. In 1677, extracts of it, with some other of his Treatises, were published at Paris, with Notes by Jacobus Petitus (6).

Theodorus died in 690: but the See was not filled till two Years after, by Berthwald Abbot of Reculver (7), who, having been Archbishop thirty eight Years (8), gave place by his Death to Tatwine a Person of great Learning and Probity. He exercised his Archbishopial Functions near two Years before he received the Pall: which is a clear evidence it was not yet thought an absolutely necessary qualification for an Archbishop. Tatwine dying in 735, Nothelm, a Priest of the Diocese of London, succeeded him, and went and received the Pall at Rome, where he was consecrated by Gregory III. He died in 741, and the Year following, Cuthbert Bishop of Hareford, was chosen in his Room. To him succeeded Breguin of a noble Family in Germany. This Prelate was exemplary for his religious and holy Life, during the two Years he held the See. Jambert [or Lambert] Abbot of St. Aulstun's, was his Successor. He had the Mortification to see the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia wrested from his Jurisdiction, by the erecting Lichfield into an Archbishop's See, in the Reign of Offa. Notwithstanding all his endeavours he could neither prevent it, nor recover his Rights. Athelard his Successor was more fortunate, for he obtained what his Predecessor had sued for in vain. So the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia were again subject to the Jurisdiction of the See of Canterbury. Wulfred who succeeded him in 804, was living at the time the Heptarchy was reduced to a Monarchy.

Before we leave the Church of Kent, it will be proper to observe, that Gregory's Scheme, who had ordered, Canterbury and York should be both Archbishopricks Seis, and independent of one another, remained unexecuted, upon several Accounts. In the first Place, the Northumbrians did not receive the Gospel so soon as that Pope expected. Again, They all deserted the Faith, after the retreat of Paulinus, who had received the Pall. Lastly, the troubles Northumberland was continually disturbed with, prevented the first Bishops of York, from taking advantage of the Pope's Regulation, which besides they did not much regard. This was the reason Theodorus became possessed of all the Authority, as well over the Northern, as Southern Churches, and that his successors making him their Precedent, laid claim to the Primacy of all England, exclusive of the Archbishop of York. This Stobbs proved in process of time the ground of great disputes between the two Archbishopricks.

THE CHURCH OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

HAVING already given an account of Edwin's Marriage with Ethelburga of Kent, I shall only add that Paulinus, who accompanied her into Northumberland, as Bishop of the Northumbrians, spent a whole Year at Edwin's Court, without making any great Progress among People not yet disposed to receive his Instructions. But length several accidents concurred to encourage his Zeal and promote his Designs, of which I shall give a particular Relation.

Quitelm, one of the Kings of Wessex, bore the Yoke of Edwin with that Impatience, that he resolved to free himself from it, by means of an Assassin, whom he sent to him on some Pretence, privately armed with a poisoned Dagger. The Russian being introduced into the Presence-Chamber, took his Opportunity, and made in furious a Pass at the King, that he was wounded through the Body of Lilla his Favourite, who interposed himself, and received the Blow. Paulinus being informed of this Accident, hastily ran into the Room, and finding Edwin in a great rage with the King of Wessex, told him, God to whom such wretches were an Abomination, would not fail to punish so horrid a Villainy. It is said that Edwin, whom the Queen had hitherto solicited in vain, promised at the same time to renounce Idolatry, if the God of the Christians would revenge him of his Enemy. At the same Instant, news was brought him, that the Queen after a hard labour was brought to bed of a Princefs, for which he returned thanks to his Gods. Paulinus for his Part, having been in great fears for the Queen, fell upon his Knees, and thanked God for her Deliverance. The Prelate's zeal was so pleasing to the King, that immediately conceiving a favourable opinion of the Christian Religion, he consented Paulinus should baptize the newborn Infant. The young Princefs, who was named Anfleda, was the first that received Baptism in Northumberland (1).

Edwin however, not forgetting the perfidiousness of the King of Wessex, march'd with an Army into his Dominions, and, after defeating him several times, compell'd him humbly to sue for peace, and make him ample satisfaction. But tho' he return'd with victory according to his Wish, he deserv'd the performance of his Promises (2). When the Queen and Paulinus press'd him upon that head, he told them, the quitting his Religion seem'd to him to be of that importance, that he could not resolve upon it without a thorough examination of Matters. And indeed he heartily set about it, and frequently conferr'd with Cosif the Pagan High-priest, upon the reasons alleg'd by Paulinus in favour of Christianity. Cosif, perceiving the King was very near turning Christian, resolv'd with himself to make his court to him betimes, by conforming to his Will. It would not perhaps be impossible in the like case, to find some of this character among the Christian Clergy.

Mean time, the Queen and Paulinus continued to solicit the King to perform his promise; and to give the greater weight to what they said to him, they got the Pope to write him a Letter. But all would not do, Edwin still demurr'd, and could not come to a resolution. At last, the circumstances of the Vision he had formerly seen in the Garden of Redowald, being, as it is pretended, revealed to Paulinus, the work was accomplish'd in an extraordinary way. Bede relates, how that one day as the King was surrounded with a croud of Courtiers (3), Paulinus came in suddenly, and laying his hand on Edwin's head, ask'd him whether he understood the meaning of that Taken? At these words, Edwin recollecting what had pass'd between him and the Stranger in Redowald's Garden, threw himself at Paulinus's Feet, who, with an air of Authority, said to him thus: My Lord, you have escap'd the hands of your Enemies, and are become a great King. All that was foretold you is come to pass; it is your Duty now to make good your Promise. Upon hearing this, Edwin is said to reply, He was fully satisfied, and ready to receive the Christian Faith. From that moment he strove not only to be better inform'd himself, but also to prevail with his Subjects to follow his Example, and embrace the Gospel. To that end, he believ'd the best way would be, before he publicly declar'd his intent, to gain some of his principal Courtiers, whose example he did not question, would have a great influence on the rest of the Nation.

The greatest opposition was most likely to come from Cosif, because it was his interest to keep the People attach'd to the worship of Idols. But the King was agreeably surpris'd to find that instead of opposing, he was ready to comply with his desire. One day as the King was discoursing with him (4) upon this Subject, the High-Priest, like a good Courtier, said to him: "I have for a good while been seriously reflecting on our Religion, and on the nature of our Gods, and must own I am not at all satisfied in these points, neither can I forbear calling in question their Goodness, Justice or Power. Never perhaps did any person serve them with greater Zeal, Respect and Affinity than my self. You, Sir, are a witness with what devotion and care I have all along perform'd the functions of my Office; and yet I never got any thing by it: Neither is there a Man in your court but what is better prefer'd than I am. Now, can I help concluding, that since our Gods take so little care of their most sincere Worshipers, they must be either unjust, or weak, or rather no Gods at all?"

Edwin, extremely well pleas'd with this answer of the High-Priest, had a mind likewise to know the Sentiments of another Priest (5) that was next in dignity to Cosif; who, encourag'd by the example of his Superior, told the King: "Sir, the more we reflect on the nature of our Soul, the less we know of it; it is with our Soul, as with the little Bird that came in the other day at one of the windows of the Room where you sat at dinner, and flew out immediately at the other. Whilst it was "in the room, we knew something about it; but as soon as it was gone, we could not say whence it came, or whither it was flown. Thus our Soul whilst it animates our Body, we may know some of its Properties, but when once separated, we know not whither it goes, or from whence it came. Since then Paulinus pretends to give us clearer notions of these Matters, it is my opinion that we give him the hearing, and laying aside all passion and prejudice, follow that which shall appear most conformable to right Reason."

This Advice, that agreed so well with the King's Intentions, being approv'd of, it was resolv'd Paulinus should explain himself upon the subject of Religion, in the presence of the Penitiff and other Priests, which was accordingly done. As soon as Cosif had heard the Bishop out, he declar'd aloud, He could see no manner of reason to doubt the Truth of the Christian Religion. Edwin being thus of the concurrence of the High-Priest and some of his principal Courtiers, call'd a Wittenagemot or Parliament, to debate, whether the Christian Religion should be receiv'd or not. But the majority being determin'd already for the Affirmative, it pass'd without any opposition. Cosif was one of the most forward to attack the Pagan worship; and being desirous to show some Marks of the sincerity of his Conversion, put himself at the head of his Priests, and marching toward the heathen Temple, darted his Javelin against the Idol: After which it was broke in pieces by the King's Order, and the Temple burnt to the ground (6). The same Day Edwin was baptized (7), with his Niece Hilda (8) afterwards Abbess of Whitby.

The Northumbrians following the example of their King, Paulinus, who till then had lain idle, on a sudden found himself fully employed, by the prodigious Crows that daily came to be taught and baptiz'd (9). But if it be true, as some affirm, that he baptized in one Day ten Thousand, his instructions must needs have been very concise (10). A Church of Timber was hastily run up at York for the new Converts, who were very numerous. Shortly after, Edwin laid the foundations of a Church of Free-stone, round the former, which stood till the other of Stone was built. He had not the Satisfaction to finish it, which was done by Oswald his Successor. Paulinus is said to have preached also at Lincoln, where he converted Blaca the Saxon Governour.

Thus was Northumberland converted to the Faith of Christ. But some time after, Edwin being slain in Battle, such desolation ensu'd, that Paulinus being compell'd to leave the Kingdom, the Northumbrians fell back again to Idolatry. Anfrid and Ofrikt, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the Example of their Subjects, though they had been instructed in the Christian Religion in Scotland, where they had lived in Exile. The apostatizing of these two Princes, and the barbarity of Cadwalla after their Death, almost quite rooted out Christianity in Northumberland. During these Calamities, neither Priest nor Monk had the courage to attempt the restoring the Northumbrians to the Faith. James the Deacon, whom Paulinus left at York, was not able alone to put a stop to the general Revolt (11). Things remained in this sad State, till Oswald ascended the Throne, who, as soon as he had restored Peace and Tranquility, laboured with all his Power to make Religion flourish again. To that end, he desired the King of Scotland to send some Persons of learning to instruct his subjects. Accordingly Corman, a Monk of Jona, of whom I have elsewhere spoken, was sent with some others; but he being a Man of a rugged Temper, and disliked by the English, returned to his Monastery; and making his report of his Mission in a full Chapter, Aidan, one of the Brotherhood, found by what he said, that he had not used that condescension to the English their Circumstances required, and therefore told him, "It is my Opinion, Brother, that you have dealt a little too roughly with those you designed to convert; not remembering that the Christian Religion ought to be infused in the Mind, not by violent, but mild and gentle Methods." Upon these words, the Monks unanimously declared Aidan was the fittest Person to be sent to the Northumbrians. He undertook the Affair, and being consecrated Bishop, set out for Northumberland. Bede gives Aidan the Character of a pious and religious Person, but adds, his zeal was without Knowledge, because he kept Easter after the manner of the Eastern Christians, and not according to the Custom of the Church of Rome. However, as much a Schismatick as he was in Bede's opinion, nothing can be added to his commendation of him for holiness of Life. He not only, says he, instructed Christians in their Duty, but also gave them an example of a good Life, and fervent Charity, which charmed the very Heathens, and allured them to the Faith. His Success was so great among the Northumbrians, that they returned in crowds to the Profession of Christ. Oswald, who was extremely desirous of the conversion of his Subjects, did all he could to promote the Work, even to the becoming Aidan's Interpreter, in explaining his Discourses to the People. It may perhaps seem strange, that Oswald should not recall Paulinus, who was then Bishop of Rechester, or make use of the ministry of James, who was left by Paulinus in Northumberland. But it must be remembered, that Oswald, having been instructed in the Christian Religion in Scotland, had an aversion for the Roman Missionaries, on account of the difference between the Romanists and Scots about Easter, and the Ecclesiastical Tenure. Aidan dying after he had governed the Church of Northumberland seventeen Years; Finan, another Monk of Iona was sent to supply his Place. He fixt the Episcopal See in the little Island of Lindisfarne (1), contrary to Gregory's regulation, who ordered that the principal See for the northern Parts should be settled at York.

This was not the only thing wherein Finan and the other Scottish Ecclesiastics showed their Independance on the Church of Rome. Their obstinate refusal to conform to the Roman Custom of keeping Easter, was an Article of much more Importance, at least in the opinion of the Italian Priests, by whom it was considered as a principal Point. England was then divided into two Parties or Sects, who firmly adhered to their respective Opinions. All the Scottish Priests and Monks, who were very numerous in Northumberland, and all their Converts, followed the Eastern Churches; but the French and Italian Ecclesiastics, in that and all other Points, stuck to the Church of Rome, branding with the name of Schismaticks those who refused to do the like. And therefore they used their utmost endeavours to bring the English Churches to a conformity with them, which they thought might easily be done, could they but once gain over Finan to their Side. To this end they sent to him a Scottish Priest, that had been educated in France, to lay before him the Reasons alleged by the Church of Rome upon that Head. But so far was Finan from being prevailed upon, that he became a more professed and open opposer of the Roman Customs.

This dispute was then carried on with great Vehemence, not only among the Clergy, but even among the most ignorant of the Laitie, as it usually happens in Religious Differences. As long as Aidan and Finan lived, the Romanists, says Bede, on account of the veneration all Men had for these two holy Bishops, bore with patience this diversity of Opinion. But when Colman, another Scottish Monk, succeeded Finan in the Reign of Osby, the dispute was renewed with more warmth than ever. The Romanists, desirous of bringing over their adversaries to their opinion at any rate, never left till they had got Osby to call a Synod [in the Nunnery of Hild] at Streanes-hall or Whitby, in order to decide this Affair. The Synod being met, each party endeavoured to procure as many Votes as they could; but, as it appears from the accounts of Historians, the Romanists were much more active and zealous than the others; and managed so that Agilbert Bishop of Paris, formerly Bishop of the West-Saxons, came to the Synod on some Pretence, with Agathon one of his Priests. At the head of the Scottish Party were King Osby, Colman Bishop of the Northumbrians, and the rest of the Scottish Priests and Monks (2), with all that had received their Ordination from them. On the other side appeared Anfleda, Osby's Queen, Alfred King of Deira, Osby's natural Son, Wilfrid a Priest his Preceptor, who had studied at Rome, Agilbert Bishop of Paris, and Agathon a Priest of the same Church, Roman a Scottish Priest, James the Deacon, and all who had been Disciples of the Italian Priests and Monks.

To see with what eagerness this dispute was manag'd, one would have thought the very Essence of Religion had been at stake. And indeed the Romanists were of that opinion, as appears from the Words of Bede, it was not without Reason, says he, that this question disturbed the minds of a great number of Christians, who were apprehensive, lest after they had begun the Race of Salvation, they should be found to have run in vain. However this Historian, tho' he thought all did run in vain who conformed not to the Church of Rome, gives Aidan and Finan who were of that number, the highest Praises for Holiness of Life. He attributes to them the gift of Miracles, which leaves no room to doubt, but that he looked upon them as Saints, notwithstanding they were, according to his Notion, actually involved in Schism. Baronius treads in the steps of Bede. When he mentions the Scots and Britons of those days, he calls them Schismaticks for refusing to obey the Pope; But when he speaks of Aidan and Finan, he makes no scruple of Sainting them, though they strenuously asserted the Independency of their Churches. Hence it follows, either these two Bishops were not really Schismaticks, or if they were so, their Schism hindered them not from being great Saints, from being assisted by God in working Miracles, and converting Nations. But to return to the Synod of Whitby; since the dispute about Easter was the occasion of their Meeting, and the cause of great Commotions in England, it will not be amiss briefly to relate the first rise of it.

Towards the end of the second Century, a Controversy arose in the Church, concerning the day on which the Easter-Festival was to be celebrated. The Churches of Asia were of opinion it was to be kept on the fourteenth day of the Moon, according to the Custom of the Jews, on what day of the week soever it should chance to fall. The Western Churches on the contrary, put it off till the Sunday after the fourteenth day, because our Saviour's Resurrection was on that day. Several Councils were held about this matter, as well in the East as in the West; but neither party would recede from their opinion, each pleading apostolical Tradition in their behalf, the Eastern Bishops from St. John, and the Western from St. Peter and St. Paul. Supposing the truth of both these Traditions, the Inference was plain, that either of them might indifferently be followed, and that it was no material point, since the Apostles had not settled it among themselves. And in Fact, this diversity of Custom, prevented not the two Parties from holding Communion with each other, till Victor I. Bishop of Rome made a Rupture, by excommunicating the Quartodecimans, or those that keep Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon. This proceeding of Victor gave so great Offence, that Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, tho' of the same opinion with Victor, severely reprimanded him for breach of Charity on account of a thing of so little moment. He alleged the Example of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, Telphoborus, Xistus, Predecessors of Victor, who notwithstanding this difference, brake not Communion with the Churches of Asia. Adding, he would have acted much better in imitating Anicetus, who gave the Eucharist with his own hand to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna, though of a different opinion from him in this very point.

Victor's haughty treatment of the Churches of Asia, instead of bringing them to his opinion, only made them adhere still more firmly to their own. They believed they were so much the less obliged to conform to the practice of Rome, as the Pope, after all could produce no authentick proof of his Tradition from St. Peter and St. Paul, as the Assinicks, on their part, would have been as hard put to it to make out Theirs from St. John. What Socrates the Historian says upon this subject is very remarkable: Neither Christ nor his Apostles have ordered any thing concerning the paschal Feast, as Moles did to the Jews, their design being not to determine Circumstances about Holy-Days, but to instruct Christians in the Precepts of Piety and a good Life. It is my opinion therefore, that as certain Customs have been introduced in each Country, this of the paschal Solemnity was one of them, and not built upon the Authority of the Apostles. The Quartodecimans tell us, the keeping the fourteenth day was instituted by St. John. The Romanists maintain, they had their practice from St. Peter and St. Paul. But neither of them have proved by any authentick Record their Assertion: Whence it is clear, the Easter Festival may be kept in every place according to the Custom first introduced there.

From this passage it is evident, that they who were no lovers of wrangling, looked upon this Controversy as of little Importance to Religion. However, to avoid a diversity even in the smallest matters, the Council of Arles in 314, ordered that Easter should every where be kept on the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the Moon which happened next after the Vernal Equinox or 21st of March. This Canon was confirmed by the Council of Nice in 325, and the Emperor sent orders throughout all the Roman Empire to have it put in practice. His Letter upon this occasion to the Governors and other Magistrates, shewed that the reasons the Council went upon were, that the Quar-tesdeciman were few in number, and stood too near the Jewish Custom. Upon the same account it was that the Council ordered that Easter should be the Sunday after the full Moon in March. But it is uncertain whether it was meant people should reckon from the beginning of the fourteenth of the Moon, or from the evening and beginning of the fifteenth (1). Pursuant to this determination all the Churches kept Easter-Day on a Sunday. One thing however, namely, what was to be done when the full Moon fell out on a Sunday, not being settled, caused some diversity. In this case, some Churches, among which was that of Scotland, began their Easter that very day, and consequently at the same time with the Jews. But the Church of Rome deferred it till the Sunday following. Since that time, there have been some alterations which produce different Customs in the Churches. Whereas for a long while a Cycle of eighty four years was every where made use of to find the precise time of Easter, the Church of Rome invented a Cycle of nineteen years, much more proper for that purpose, and obliged all the Churches under her Jurisdiction to conform to the same. Altho' without doubt this was the best method, and calculated nearest the Truth; yet as it was unknown to the Britons and Scots, who held but a little Correspondence with Rome, they stuck to their old way.

By these various manners of finding Easter-Day, it sometimes happened in Offa's Court, that whilst the King was celebrating the pascual Feasts, the Queen, who followed the Custom of the Church of Rome, was still keeping Lent.
This confusion made Offa desirous of fixing Easter-Day so, as all should keep it at the same time. At the opening of the Council, having made a short Speech upon that head, he ordered Colman to alledge what he had to say in defence of the Custom of the Scotch Church. Colman said, it had been all along the practice of his Predecessors, and of those by whom he was ordained in Scotland: That Columba, Aidan, and Finan had always kept to the old way; but if their Authority was not sufficient, he could alledge that of St. John the beloved Apostle. After he had enlarged upon this Argument, Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, was desired to set forth what was to be said against Colman's Assertion.
But the Bishop having excused himself on account of his un-skilfulness in the English Tongue, requested that Wilfrid, might be allowed to speak the Sense of the Church of Rome.
Wilfrid, having the King's Permission, answered Colman with great Warmth. He explained the manner of fixing Easter practised by the Church of Rome, and affirmed that all the Churches in the World conformed to it, except only the Scots, Picts, and Britons, who still persisted in their foolish Obstinacy. Colman replied, talking in that manner, very much reflected on the memory of St. John, who never had established a Custom that was chargeable with folly. Wilfrid, being sensible he had spoke a little too freely, endeavoured to justify St. John, by saying he was obliged to retain something of Judaism, for fear of giving offence to the Apostle's Jews, as St. Paul upon the like account had circumscribed Timothy. He concluded with asserting, that the Church of Rome exactly followed what was prescribed by St. Peter and St. Paul in this matter.

It appears from the fore-cited passage of Socrates, that it was as difficult for Wilfrid to prove that the Custom of the Church of Rome had its rise from St. Peter, as for Colman to make out, that the Practice of the Church of Scotland came from St. John. Besides, the Cycle of nineteen Years then made use of by the Romanists, was most assuredly invented after the time of St. Peter.
But as Colman and the rest of the Scotch party knew little of what passed Abrams, and as their aim was not so much to bring the Romanists to their Customs, as to persuade them to let them go on peaceably in their own way, they persisted in appealing to the Authority of St. John and Columba. But Wilfrid, after justifying St. John in the manner above-mentioned, demanded of Colman, with an air of Triumph, whether he pretended to compare Columba with St. Peter the Prince of the Apostles, to whom our Saviour said, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church? History informs us, not what Answer Colman made; for it must be remembered, we know nothing of this Council, but what we have from the Partisans of Rome. However this be, Offa seemed to be convinced St. Peter had some prerogative above the other Apostles, since he declared at last for the Custom established by St. Peter at Rome, before that of St. John. Bede says, he was brought to it by being told, that as St. Peter had the Keys of Heaven, he would refuse him entrance if he obstinately held out against the Apostle's own Institution. Offa's declaration immediately gained a majority of Votes for the Romanists. Thus Colman and his party lost their cause in this Point.

ly gained a majority of Votes for the Romanists. Thus Colman and his party lost their cause in this Point.

In the same Synod was debated also the Controversy about the Ecclesiastical Jurisprudence. The Romanists maintained that the head ought to be shaved young with in the place where our Saviour wore the Crown of Thorns, of which it was the Emblem. But the Scotch Priests shaved the Fore-part of the head from Ear to Ear. Bede does not tell us how this matter was decided; but very probably it was determined in favour of the Romanists.

The dispute about Easter being thus ended to the disadvantage of the Scots, Colman and all his adherents retired into Scotland, not being able to prevail with themselves to submit to a decision that appeared to them so unjust. Thus it is in Matters of Religion, things that seem at first perfectly indifferent, become at last of the greatest consequence by the pride and uncharitableness of the Clergy. Cedd Bishop of the East-Saxons, who had been interpreter to both Parties in the Synod, was the only one of the Scotch Party, that thought it his Duty not to leave his Flock for a thing of so little Moment, though he was of a contrary opinion to the Romanists. Tuda succeeded to Colman's See, and Eatta was made Abbot of Lindisfarne in the room of him that went off with Colman.

Thus was the storm raised by this Controversy, appeased at last, to the great satisfaction of the Pope and his Party, who were very sensible that their success in this Affair would greatly contribute to the establishing the Papal Authority over the northern Churches, as it really did. The Church of Northumberland had been governed for thirty years by Aidan, Finan, and Colman, whom their Adversaries could charge with nothing, but their firm Adherence to the Customs of their Ancestors in relation to Easter. After Colman's retiring into Scotland, the Government of the Church of Northumberland was always put into the hands either of Saxons or Foreigners bred up in the principles of the Church of Rome, the Scots being entirely excluded.

Tuda dying soon after, Alfred King of Deira was desirous of having Wilfrid his Preceptor made Bishop of York, the See whereof was then at Lindisfarne. To that end he ordered him to go into France to be consecrated by Agilbert Bishop of Paris. But Wilfrid making a long stay in France, Chad then Abbot of Leshingham was made Bishop of the Northumbrians (2). Chad being gone into Kent to be consecrated by Deusdedit Archbishop of Canterbury, and finding he was lately dead, applied to Wino, Bishop of Winchester for Consecration, and then returned into Northumberland. Bede tells us, he was a very Religious Person, without Pride or Ambition, and one that accepted of the Episcopal dignity purely in obedience to the King's order.

In the mean while, Wilfrid being returned into England, remained some time at Canterbury, to take care of that Diocese till the Arrival of Theodorus, whom the Pope had made Archbishop. After a few Months stay at Canterbury, he went on to Northumberland; where finding Chad was made Bishop of Lindisfarne, and not daring to complain of the inconsistency of the King of Deira, he retired to his Monastery at Rippon (3). Some time after Theodorus, in his Visitation of all the Churches in England, coming to York severely reprimanded Chad for being consecrated by the Bishop of Winchester. Chad humbly submitted to his Censure, and without endeavoring to justify himself, did all the Archbishop required of him. Theodorus, charmed with his modest Behaviour, consecrated him anew: but ordered him to return to his Monastery (4), and make room for Wilfrid whom the two Kings of Northumberland had designed for the Bishoprick of York or Lindisfarne. Though Bede does not say for what reason Chad was sent back to his Monastery after his second Consecration, yet it is plain Theodorus was gained by the two Kings, who were for Wilfrid.
And indeed there seems to be no reason for deposing of Chad, since all the defects of his former ordination supposing there were any, were removed by the latter.

Wilfrid was a Man of a very proud and haughty Temper, one of those that are for domineering wherever they come, and cannot bring themselves to use towards others that condescension they expect from all the World.
His Pride for some time was supported by his Interest with the two Kings of Northumberland. But at length Offa being dead, Alfred his Son deposed, and Egfrid who had no opinion of this Prelate, in possession of the Throne, Wilfrid found he had not that respect shown him, as in the Reign of Offa. This gave him great uneasiness, and not being able to forbear showing it, perhaps in too insolent a manner, he incurred the King's displeasure. Some time after, Theodorus coming again into Northumberland, Egfrid complained to him of Wilfrid (1), and let him know, that instead of edifying the People, he brought a great scandal on Religion by his Pride and Avarice. The King did not accuse him without ground. Historians are all agreed, that Wilfrid was excessive proud; that he affected to live in a royal manner; that he never went abroad without a numerous retinue; and that he was serv'd in Gold. Theodorus, finding this a fit opportunity to improve the Rights of his See, and lessen those of York, which had been dignified with the title of an Archbishoprick in the time of Paulinus, was resolved not to let it slip. Accordingly, without hearing what Wilfrid had to say for himself, he deposed him, and obtained the King's leave to divide Northumberland into two Dioceses. Bofa, who resided at York, was Bishop of the first, containing the Churches of Deira. Over the other See, which continued fixed at Lindisfarne, and consisted of the Kingdom of Bernicia, was placed Eatta. As Egfrid had for some time conquered Lincolnshire from the King of Mercia, he made a third Bishoprick of it, of which Ethebeus was the first Bishop.

Wilfrid enraged at his disgrace, let out immediately for Rome, to lay his case before the Pope. Theodorus not liking his going thither, sent a Monk to inform the Pope of the reasons of his deposing him. However, fearing Wilfrid might gain the Pope to his side, on account of the service he had done the Church of Rome at the Council of Whitby, he wrote to Ebroine, Mayor of the Palace, to the King of France, to stop him in his Journey. Wilfrid, informed of this, resolved to go by the way of Friesland (2), where Adalgisus the King hospitably received him, and discovered to him that Ebroine had desired him to detain or murder him. He is said, whilst he staid in Friesland, to make a great many Converts. At length, taking his leave, he went on to Strasbourg, from whence he was safely conducted to Rome by the King of Aufraja.

Agatho, who was then Pope, having heard Wilfrid's complaints, held a Synod upon them, who unanimously declared that Wilfrid should be restored to his Bishoprick. Wilfrid having thus succeeded in his Suit, returned home, and presented to the King the decree of the Synod at Rome, with a Letter from the Pope. But Egfrid had no little regard to this Decree, that after he had upbraided the Bishop for procuring it by bribery, he put him in Prison, where he kept him a whole year, and would not then have released him, had it not been for the pressing instances of his Aunt Ebba, and upon condition he would never more set foot in Northumberland.

Wilfrid, meeting with all these discouraging circumstances, withdrew to the Monastery of Glasenbury, where Berthwald the Abbot gave him a safe retreat; but it lasted not long, for Ethelred King of Mercia, and Uncle to Berthwald, desired him to dismiss him, on account of the King of Northumberland. In this perplexity Wilfrid fled for refuge to Adelwald King of Sussex, who was converted during his Imprisonment in Mercia, but his Subjects were still Idolaters. This Prince having granted him his protection, desired him to endeavour the conversion of the People, in which he happily succeeded. In a little time the South-Saxons, as well as the Inhabitants of the Isle of Wight, embraced the Christian Faith, by the pains and instructions of Wilfrid. At least this is what the Writer of his Life relates, though to speak the truth, it is very difficult to clear up the Chronology of these facts. Wilfrid remained some years in Sussex, where he was made Bishop of Selsey, as will be seen hereafter.

During his absence, Theodorus having taken a third Journey to Northumberland, erected a new Bishoprick at Hagulfad [or Hexam], of which Thumber was the first Bishop. This he did to make amends for Lincoln now in the hands of the Mercians. Some time after Theodorus went thither once more, and called a Council, wherein he got Thumber to be deposed for daring to take it ill that the Archbishop of Canterbury should exercise his Jurisdiction over the Churches of the North. It was indeed contrary to the regulations of Gregory I. and the Pall sent to Paulinus first Bishop of the Northumbrians, plainly shewed it was not the intent of the Court of Rome that the Churches of the North should have any dependence on Canterbury. But Aidan, Finan and Colman not having vouchsafed to demand the Pall of the Pope, York or Lindisfarne had only the bare title of a Bishoprick, which these three Scott Prelates never minded, the lordship it over the Church being what was far from their thoughts. And therefore Theodorus finding he was the sole Archbishop in England, laid hold of the opportunity to extend his Jurisdiction over the North. In order to This, in all appearance, it was that he deposed Wilfrid, from whose temper and charafter he expected opposition, that he divided York into three Bishopricks, on pretence it would be more convenient for the People; and lastly, that he deposed Thumber, who had openly censured his Usurpations.

The same Council that deposed Thumber, chose in his room Cuthbert a Monk of Lindisfarne, who was the only Person that opposed his own Election, out of an excess of Modesty and Humility. The Bishops, who all judged him worthy of the Episcopal Character, found it a very difficult matter to bring him to a compliance; and at last were forced to consent he should remain at Lindisfarne, where he had liv'd a long time; for which reason Eatta was translated to Hagulfad.

Some time after, Theodorus being grown very old, and finding he had not long to live, was touched with remorse for what he had done to Wilfrid, and wanted to be reconciled to him. To this purpose he interceded for him so earnestly with Alfred, Successor to Egfrid, that he was recalled. The Bishoprick of Lindisfarne being then vacant by the voluntary Relinquish of Cuthbert, Bofa was translated thither, and Wilfrid returned to York.

Cuthbert being return'd to his Monastery at Lindisfarne, died soon after. In process of time, his body being removed to Durham, became so famous for Miracles, that among all the English Saints he had the greatest veneration paid him.

Wilfrid was no sooner settled in his See, but he undertook the annulling all that had been done during his disgrace. He attempted the uniting again to York the Bishoprick of Hagulfad, and claimed the Revenues that had been taken from his Church, and appropriated to that Bishoprick. In fine, he pretended that all the Regulations of Theodorus were null and void; and perhaps he was in the right; but his haughty way of proceeding made him meet with opposition from all quarters. Even Alfred his Pupil and Sovereign, not being able to bear any longer his imperious Temper, drove him once more from his Church. Thus this restless Prelate was reduced to seek for shelter from Ethelred King of Mercia, formerly his Enemy, but now his Friend. Mercia being then divided into four Bishopricks, and Leister, one of them, happening to be vacant, Ethelred promoted Wilfrid to that See, which however he enjoyed but a very little while. His haughty Temper was so displeasing to the King of Mercia, that he deposed him of it in a few months. Not content with incurring the displeasure of the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, he took occasion also to fall out with Berthwald, Archbishop of Canterbury, and by that means forfeited his Protection, which he then stood in great need of. The two Kings his Enemies laid hold of this opportunity to humble him. They requested Berthwald to call a Council, in order to examine into the Life and Actions of Wilfrid. The Archbishop, as matters stood between him and Wilfrid, readily complied with their desire. Accordingly a Council was held at Onfresfeld in Northumberland, where Wilfrid was obliged to appear, and was charged with Crimes that deserved degradation. However, the Bishops unwilling to carry matters to that extremity, endeavoured by Intreaties and Threats to induce him to resign his Bishoprick of his own accord. But nothing could bring him to that; he told them, it was a great piece of Ingratitude in the English to use him in that manner, after all the Services he had done the Church. The Services he boasted of were, his contributing the most of any towards fixing Easter-Day, according to the usage of Rome, his introducing the Roman Ritual into the Churches of the North, and his bringing the Scott Monks to conform to the Rules of the Order of St. Benedict. Upon these Accounts, said he, you ought to reward me, instead of threatening to depose me unjustly for imaginary Crimes. But if you will dare to go on, know I'll appeal to the Pope against your Proceedings. None other has power to condemn me, and he it is alone I acknowledge for my Judge. The Council not regarding his Appeal, unanimously deposed him. However, this did not in the least humble him. Tho' he was seventy years of Age, he resolved to go to Rome for redress. The Pope, always favourable to those that appealed to him, convened a Synod of the neighbouring Bishops, wherein Wilfrid, upon his single representation of matters, was fully acquitted. After which, the Pope gave him recommendatory Letters to Berthwald, and the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, requiring them to restore Wilfrid in pursuance to the Decree of the Synod.

As soon as Wilfrid was returned to England, he waited on the Archbishop, who finding he came with the Pope's Recommendation, began to relent, and promise his Friendship. On the other hand, Ethelred King of Mercia, who was now turned Monk, promised Wilfrid his Intercession: But Alfred at first seemed inflexible. He said he could see no manner of reason for restoring upon the Pope's Letter, and the Sentence of a foreign Council that knew but little of the matter, a man that had caused so many Disturbances, and after having been banished several times, had at length been lawfully deposed by a Synod. But he did not hold long in this mind. Soon after falling sick, it was put into his head, that his distemper was a punishment from God, for his disobedience to the Pope's orders; and this made him deep an impression upon him, that he vowed to restore Wilfrid, in case he recovered. Death prevented him from performing his Vow; however, he ordered Brithric, whom he left Guardian to his Son Osred, to see it put in execution out of hand.

Altho' Alfred had been positively promised, the Affair of Wilfrid should be soon ended, it was not possible to think of it immediately, by reason of a Civil War raised by Edulph, who had usurped the Crown. Wilfrid behaved upon this occasion in such a manner, as seemed to deprive him of all hopes of ever being restored. As he did not doubt but Edulph, who was then besieging the King and Brithric in Bamworough Castle, would succeed in his designs, he went in all haste to him, in order to make him his Friend betimes, and secure his protection. This proceeding had like to have proved his ruin. Edulph, knowing he was hated by the Northumbrians, to do them a pleasure, gave him a very ill reception, forbidding him ever to appear in his presence. On the other side, Brithric informed of Wilfrid's Conduct, lost all kindness for him. However, after the war was ended by the death of the Usurper, Brithric was prevailed upon, tho' with some difficulty, to consent Wilfrid should be restored. To this end a Council was held near the River Nidd, where it was agreed Wilfrid should be Bishop of Hagulfstad, with which he was obliged to be satisfied. John, then Bishop of that See, was removed to York, vacant by the death of Beda.

Thus Wilfrid's Affair, after many difficulties, was at length determined. John in 721 resigned his Bishoprick, and retired to the Monastery of Beverly, of which he was Abbot. He was canonized after his death, and became very famous, by the name of St. John of Beverly. He was succeeded in the See of York by Wilfrid the Younger, his Chaplain. To Wilfrid the Elder, succeeded in his See of Hagulfstad, Acca one of the Priests that had attended him in his Journey to Rome, where he became a great Proficient in Church-Musick, which, says Bede, 'twas impracticable for him to learn in his own Country. Wilfrid the Younger was succeeded in the See of York by Egbert, Brother to Edbert King of Northumberland.

It was necessary to be thus particular about the establishment of the northern Bishopricks, the succession of the first Bishops, and the alterations occasioned by Wilfrid; without all which, it would be difficult to give a distinct notion of the Churches of these Parts. Hence also may be seen, how the Archbishop of Canterbury had opportunity of exercising his Jurisdiction over all England, contrary to the regulation of Gregory I. To which, the enterprising Genius of Theodorus, and the deposing of Wilfrid likewise contributed. Had this last continued in the See of York, he would doubtless have obtained the Pall, and by that means put a stop to Theodorus's proceedings.

The dignity of Archbishop of York, and Metropolitan of the North, vanished with Paulinus. After that Prelate left Northumberland, and the Northumbrians deserted the Faith, the Monks, sent for from Scotland by Osward to instruct the people, were contented with the bare Title of Bishop, without applying to the Pope for the Pall, whose Jurisdiction they did not acknowledge. Afterwards Wilfrid, successor to Colman, having been deposed, the Bishoprick of the Northumbrians was divided into four, namely, York, Whithorn, Lindisfarn, and Hagulfstad. This division was a fresh obstacle to the Bishop of York's desiring the Pall, his See being too considerably lessened by it. Besides, Beda, John and Wilfrid the Younger, who were successively Bishops of York, were pious and good Men, who thought of nothing less than aspiring to more honourable Titles. But Egbert, who was Bishop of York whilst his Brother sat on the Throne of Northumberland, having more ambition than his Predecessors, improved the respect they had for him at Rome on account of his Birth, and procured the Pall with the Archbishopial Dignity: By which means he acquired a Jurisdiction over the three other northern Bishops, who became his Suffragans. From that time the Archbishops of York began to be upon a Level with those of Canterbury, and to insist on Gregory's Regulation, whereby it was ordered, there should be an entire equality and independency between the two Archbishops. On the other hand, the Archbishops of Canterbury pleaded the Jurisdiction exercised by Theodorus over the North, and all the rest of England. Hence arose a contest between the two Metropolitans, which was not decided 'till many Ages after. Aluinus gives Egbert, whom he call his Master, the character of an able and learned Prelate, and takes notice of his building a Library at York, and furnishing it with a noble Collection of Books. Eanbald, who succeeded Egbert, was living at the time of the dissolution of the Heparchy.

The CHURCH of WESSEX.

IT does not appear that Austin sent any of his companions to preach the Gospel in the Kingdom of Wessex. It was not till forty Years after his arrival in Britain that the West-Saxons were converted by the ministry of Birinus. This Priest, zealous for the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ, being informed there were still in England Nations to whom the Gospel was unpreached, desired Pope Honorius to send him thither (1). His request being granted, he received the Episcopal Character, and set out for England, not knowing for certain on what Nation Providence would throw him, or on whom in particular he designed to lay out his charitable Care. He accidentally arrived in the Kingdom of Wessex; and finding the Inhabitants Idolaters, resolved to stay among them and endeavour their Conversion. After some time he had the satisfaction to baptize Cinigiul the King, and Quelme his Brother (2). Soon after Birinus found his Audience very numerous, multitudes following the example of their Kings. He continued for fourteen Years to edify his converts by his Discourses and Example, and at length, after a considerable progress, died at Dorchester, where he had built a Church and fixed his Episcopal See.

After Birinus's Death, Wessex was involved in fresh Troubles. Cenowalch, who succeeded his Father Cinigiul, being as yet a Pagan, was no favourer of the Christians. But what was still worse, Penda King of Mercia became Master of the Kingdom and kept it three Years, Cenowalch being forced to fly into East-Anglia. It may be easily judged Christianity, during these three Years, made no great Progress. Besides Penda's being an Idolater, it is unlikely Religion should flourish in the midst of Wars and Commotions. Cenowalch had the good fortune to be converted during his retreat in East-Anglia, and afterwards to be restored to his Dominions. The peaceable times that ensued afforded him means to promote Religion again in Wessex, where, after Birinus's Death, none had been very forward to go and strengthen the new Christians. Whilst the King was looking out for some fit Person to preach to his Subjects, Agilbert a French Man, who was just come from his Studies in Ireland, passed through Winchester in his way home. Cenowalch having seen him, invited him to stay with him, and instructed the People. Agilbert complied with his request; and being consecrated Bishop, went and resided at Dorchester. But as he had not the gift of Languages, he made but little Progress. Cenowalch perceiving he could not learn the English Tongue, and that it was impossible his Subjects should edify by the Instructions of one who spoke to them in a foreign Dialect, began to grow weary of him. At length he divided his Kingdom into two Dioceses; and leaving Agilbert at Dorchester, made one Wina a Saxon that had been bred and consecrated in France, Bishop of Winchester (3). Agilbert could not bear the King should make this partition without consulting him, much less that he should give the preference to the new Bishop by placing him in his Capital. His complaints upon this occasion not being much regarded, he took his leave and retired into France, where he was made Bishop of Paris. He returned afterwards into England to assist at the Council of Whitby. In the mean time, Cenowalch not agreeing with Wina, dismissed him also.

Wessex remaining thus without a Bishop (4), and Ecclesiasticks fit for such an employment not being very common in England, Cenowalch would have recalled Agilbert, who did not think proper to quit Paris for Winchester. However, he made an offer to the King of his Nephew Elautherius, a Priest, whom he recommended as well qualified for the Episcopal Function. Elautherius being accepted of, and consecrated by Theodorus, became sole Bishop of the West-Saxons.

After the Death of Cenowalch, Wessex was troubled with Civil Wars for ten Years. Elautherius dying during the Troubles, was succeeded by Heda; after whose Death, the number of Christians being very much increased in Wessex, it was found necessary to divide the Kingdom

The CHURCH of ESSEX.

MELLITUS one of the Missionaries sent over to Aufin, was the first that preached the Gospel to the East-Saxons, particularly at London. As far as can be judged, he made no great progress among the People. In all appearance, what Success he met with was entirely owing to the Authority of Sebert King of Essex, and Ethelbert King of Kent (1); since upon their deaths, all the East-Saxon Christians fell back to Paganism, and expelled Mellitus (2), without ever admitting him any more. The Conversion therefore of the East-Saxons is not properly to be dated from this Time, but rather from the reign of Sigebert the Good. This Prince living in strict Friendship with Offa King of Northumberland, and paying him frequent Visits, had the good fortune to be instructed in the knowledge of the Gospel at his Court, where he was baptized. He brought home with him Cedd, a Northumbrian Priest, of whom I have spoken before, and who being consecrated Bishop, heartily set about instructing the East-Saxons, among whom in a short time he made a very great progress (3). He was the only Scottish Man that after the Council of Whitby was unwilling to leave his Flock, tho' the Controversy about Easter was decided contrary to his opinion. Nay, he went so far as to blame Colman and the rest of his Countrymen for deserting their Flocks for a matter of so little moment. His strict adherence to Ecclesiastical Discipline was the occasion of Sigebert's death, or at least was pretended to be so, as was said in the History of the Kingdom of Essex. As Cedd went often to Northumberland, where he had spent great part of his Life, Adelwald King of Deira, made him a present of certain Lands lying near Lejningham, where he founded a Monastery. Thither he used to retire and practise the greatest Austerity. Here also it was that he died of the Plague after he had governed the Church of Essex several years. Bede, who gives Cedd great Encomiums, and mentions his austere way of living, takes occasion from thence to say, that Fasting was religiously practised by all who pretended to any thing of a regular Life, and adds, that some fasted every Wednesday and Friday till three a Clock in the Afternoon. The Saxon Homilies also most earnestly recommend Fasting; but withal take care to warn Christians against over-acting their part in this respect, as some did, and talk very rationally upon this Article.

After the death of Sigebert the Good, and Switthelm his Brother, it happened that in the reign of Sebba and Siger the Plague raged terribly in the Kingdom of Essex, particularly at London. Siger being persuaded that the Plague was sent upon the East-Saxons as a Punishment from the Gods for abandoning the Religion of their Ancestors, returned to Idolatry, and drew after him those of his Subjects who had not been thoroughly converted. But Sebba steadfastly adhered to the Christian Religion. Wulpher King of Mercia, on whom these two Princes were then in dependence, having been informed of what passed in Essex, sent thither Jaruman his Bishop to endeavour to restore the East-Saxons to the way of Truth. Jaruman's pains were crowned with good success, that the People at length returned to the Faith. Shortly after Wulpher, who acted as he pleased in the Kingdom of Essex, gave the first Instance of Simony in England, by selling the Bishoprick of London to Wina, who had been driven from Winchester. He governed the Church of Essex till his death in 675. His Successor was Erkenwald, famous for his great affection to the City of London, as well as for the holiness of his Life, on account of which he was enrolled in the Catalogue of the Saints. After his death a great contest arose between the Canons of St. Paul's at London, and the Monks of Barking, who should bury him. The first carried their Point, and interred him in their Cathedral, where it is affirmed he wrought several Miracles (4). It will be needless to carry down the Succession of the Bishops of London to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, since nothing remarkable happened concerning them (5).

The CHURCH of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE first Conversion of the East-Angles is said to be in the reign of Redwald; but by whom is not known. There is reason to believe, that during this Prince's Life the Christian Religion made no great progress in East-Anglia. All that can be probably conjectured is, that Redwald, out of respect for Ethelbert King of Kent (at whose Court some say he was baptized) gave leave to some of Aufin's Companions to preach in his dominions, and persecuted not those who had a mind to embrace the Gospel. What is said of his suffering the true God and the pagan Deities to be worshipped in the same Temple, seems to infer that he was not himself a Christian (6), and that the number of Converts in East-Anglia was very inconsiderable. Thus much at least is certain, Christianity flourished not in that Kingdom, in his or his Son Erpwald's reign (7). And therefore we can't be greatly mistaken in placing the Conversion of the East-Angles in the reign of Sigebert, Successor to Erpwald.

Sigebert, who had spent great part of his time in France, where he had been baptized, was thoroughly instructed in the Christian Religion. When he returned to England to take possession of the Crown, he brought along with him a Burgundian Priest, named Felix, whom he got to be consecrated Bishop at Canterbury. Felix, upon his arrival in East-Anglia, used his utmost endeavours to bring back to the right way such as were gone astray, and instruct those that had not yet any knowledge of the Truth. His endeavours met with such success, that in a short time he had the pleasure to see the East-Angles come in crowds to be baptized. In the mean time, Sigebert knowing nothing would make more for the benefit of his Subjects, than permanent and continual Instructions to confirm them in the Faith, erected Schools, after the manner of those he had seen in France (8). Some will have it (9) that the University of Cambridge owes its original to these Schools: but this opinion seems not to be well grounded.

Whilst Sigebert was thus employed in works of Piety, he received farther assistance from one Fursey an Irish Monk, who preached to the East-Angles with good success. Bede gives him an extraordinary Commendation; he attributes several Miracles to him, and assures us he was, like St. Paul, wrapped up into Heaven. This same Fursey built a Monastery at Canterbury (10), which was largely endowed at several times by the Kings of East-Anglia. The troubles that arose after Sigebert's reigning the Crown, obliged Fursey to retire into France, where he founded the Monastery of Legny in the Jurisdiction of Meaux.

Felix was Bishop of the East-Angles seventeen years. His see was fixed at Dunmoe, a little Town by the Sea-side, now called Dunwich (11). Here it was he had the satisfaction to convert and baptize Canowald King of Wessex, who had fled for refuge into East-Anglia. Felix was succeeded by Thomas a Deacon of his Church; after him came Berehtgislus, surnamed Boniface, whom Bisus succeeded. Bisus being grown old and infirm, Becca and Badwin were made his Assistants, and East-Anglia divided into two Dioceses. Becca resided at Dunmoe, and Badwin at Elmhurst, a poor Village now in Norfolk. These two Bishops continued in being, till the Danes becoming Masters of East-Anglia, they both lay vacant for above one hundred years. After which the Diocese of Dunmoe was united to that of Elmhurst: From whence the Episcopal See was removed to Thetford (12), and afterwards to Norwich (13), where it remains to this Day.

The CHURCH of SUSSEX.

IT is no wonder the Kingdom of Sussex continued so long after the rest in an idolatrous State, since it was in subjection to Wessex, where the Gospel was not preached till forty years after the arrival of Austin. If we may credit the Author of the Life of Wilfrid Bishop of York the Conversion of the South-Saxons about the Year 686, was owing to the disgrace of that Prelate, who fled for refuge into their Country. Adelwalch King of Sussex, who received him into his Protection, had already attempted the Conversion of his Subjects, by founding a Monastery in his little Kingdom (1): but his endeavours answered not expectation. Perhaps Wilfrid himself would have found it a difficult matter to have made any impression upon them, had not a favourable juncture unexpectedly paved the way for him. Not long after his arrival, the country being miserably distressed for want of Provisions, he taught the Inhabitants the art of fishing in the Sea, their skill before going no farther than the catching of Eels. This improvement greatly relieving them, wrought so upon their minds, that they listened with the same attention to his instructions about their Spiritual, as they had before to those about their bodily Wants. But to compleat the matter, seasonable Showers, after a three years Drought, restoring to the Earth its former Fruitfulness, they were thoroughly convinced that Wilfrid was an extraordinary Person, and highly favoured by Heaven: At least this is what the writer of his Life would fain make us believe. Wilfrid perceiving the Christians daily to encrease, established his Episcopal See at Selsey (2), a small Peninsula given him by Adelwalch. He founded there a Monastery also, which he furnished with the Monks he had brought with him from Northumberland. Here he usually resided during the time of his Banishment. At length being recalled into his own Country, Selsey remained a long while without a Bishop, because the South-Saxons, after their becoming subject to the King of Wessex, were put under the Jurisdiction of the Bishop of the West-Saxons. Some time after Wessex being divided into two Dioeceses, Sussex was annexed to the See of Winchester; where it continued till a Synod held in Wessex, in the time of Daniel, decreed Sussex should be a distinct Diocese again, and the See fixed at Selsey as formerly. Edbert was the first Bishop. His successors resided at the same place, down to the year 1070, when the See was removed to Chichester (3), where it continues to this day.

As for the Isle of Wight, after it was converted by the furious Zeal of Cadwalla, it remained all along under the Jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester.

After this account of the most remarkable particulars relating to the Conversion of the Seven Kingdoms, it will be necessary to take a general view of the Councils held in England, during those early times of the Church.

COUNCILS.

I Have already spoken of the two Synods convened upon Austin's request, in order to endeavour to bring the Britanni to the obedience of the Pope. Though these were not properly English, but rather British Councils, I shall not however pass them over without making this one Observation. Bede, in his Ecclsiastical History tells us, that Austin required of the British Bishops these four things (4): That they would celebrate the Paschal Feast the same Day with the Romanists: That they would conform to the Ceremonies practised by the Church of Rome in administering Baptism: That they would assist the Roman Missionaries in converting the Saxons: That they would submit to the Papal Authority. Had Austin equally insisted on these four Articles, Bede would naturally have related the sentiments of the British, concerning the three First, and yet we find he speaks only of the Last. Hence we may conclude, that this was the main Point, and what Austin chiefly dwelt upon. For the same reason also the Abbot of Bangor answered only to this Point, being very sensible, that this was the principal thing in dispute.

There is no occasion to add any thing to what has already been said of the Council of Whitby or Streaneshalch, and the other Synods that were held upon Wilfrid's Account.

In 673, Theodorus, Archbishop of Canterbury, convened a national Synod at Herford, at which were present all the English Bishops, with a great number of other Ecclsiasticks. The Archbishop, who was President, put the question to the Bishops, whether they were willing the Church of England should be governed by the Canons of the Antient Councils. To which they all having agreed, he produced a list of the Canons, and pitching upon ten of them, ordered them to be read before the Council, and asked their consent to each of them.

I. That the Festival of Easter might be uniformly kept in all the English Churches on the first Sunday after the full Moon in March.

II. That no Bishop should encroach upon the Jurisdiction of another.

III. That Bishops should not meddle with the Temporal concerns of the Monasteries.

IV. That no Monk should have the liberty to quit his Monastery without leave from the Abbot.

V. That it should not be lawful for any of the Clergy to abandon their Diocese, without the Bishop's leave, and that they should not be received into another Diocese, without a Recommendation under the Bishop's own Hand.

VI. That Bishops and Clergy, who are out of their Diocese, ought not to execute any part of their Function, but should be contented with an hospitable Reception.

VII. That a Synod should be convened twice a Year. This Canon was altered to once a Year.

VIII. That the Bishops should take their places at Councils according to their Seniority.

IX. That new Sees should be erected, as the number of Christians increased. This was thrown out.

X. That no Marriage should be annulled but on account of Adultery. That if a Man put off his Wife, he ought not to marry another: but either be reconciled or live single.

Nine of these Canons being agreed to, the Council denounced Excommunication and Degradation upon all that should infringe them, and then broke up.

Baronius pretends, This Council was convened by the Pope's Order, and that Theodorus preided as Legate of the Holy See. But when we examine the grounds of his Assertion, we find he builds it only upon Theodorus's saying in his Harangue, at the opening of the Council, that he was consecrated by the Pope (5), as if that were equivalent to his being made Legate. Bede, Malmibury, Florence of Worcester, who speak of this Council, say not a word to support the Cardinal's Notion.

Theodorus summoned another Council or Synod at Hatfield (6) in 680, at the request of the Pope, who wanted to know the Sentiments of the Church of England with reference to the Hereticks of the Monothelites (7), which then madea great noise in the World. The Pope had all the satisfaction he desired, the English being entirely free from that Error. This Synod received the five first General Councils (8), together with the Synod held just before at Rome, against the Monothelites.

The next Council was convened at Becanceld in 694 (9). The Council being composed of the Clergy and Nobility. The Canons were all drawn up in the Form of a Charter, wherein the King granted several Privileges to the Church, particularly an exemption from the payment of Taxes and other services and incumbrances incident to a Lay-fee. He declares moreover that the Church has power to govern her own Body, the Prerogative Royal not reaching to religious matters. This Article has given occasion to some to call in question the Genuineness of this Council (10). They object, for Instance, that the five Abbesses, who subscribed this Charter, not only signed before all the Priests, but also before Botred a Bishop, contrary to all Precedent. On the other hand, others (11) are as zealous in the defence of it, as making for the Independency of the Church. It of Berghamsted.

697.
Spelman.
Vol. I.
p. 194.

The next year the Synod of Berghamsted (1) was held in the reign of the same King. It was composed, like the foregoing one, of Clergy and Laity. Its Canons related chiefly to the Sin of Adultery, and the Privileges of the Clergy. As for Adultery, it was enacted, that the offender should be put under Penance; and if he refused to submit to that Discipline, he should be excommunicated: If he was a Stranger, he was to forfeit one hundred Shillings.

As for the Clergy, it was decreed, that the Church should be free, and enjoy all her Privileges.

That the breach of the Church's Peace should be punished with a fine of fifty Shillings (2).

That the bare Affirmation of the King or a Bishop should be equivalent to their Oath.

That if a Bishop, Abbot, or Deacon, is charged with any Crime, and being brought to the Altar he declares solemnly, he speaks the Truth. This Declaration shall be the same as his Oath.

That if any Clergyman should be profecuted, the Cognition of the cause belongs to the Church.

Thus by degrees the Clergy obtained their Privileges, which they have but too often abused (3).

The two Councils that are pretended to be held at London and Aine (4) in 714, being looked upon by the best Authorities as forged, it would be lost time to say any thing of them.

The Synod of Cloveshoe.

747.
Maim. de
G. Postif.
l. i.
Spelm. Conc.
Vol. I.
p. 242.

In 747 was held at Cloveshoe or Cliff (5) in the Kingdom of Kent, a National Synod, at which Ethelred King of Mercia was present, with twelve Bishops, and a great number of Lords. Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, who was President, read Pope Zachary's Letter, wherein the Pope admonished the English to reform their Lives, and threatened those with excommunication that continued in their wicked courses. They drew up a body of twenty-eight Canons, most of them relating to Ecclesiastical Discipline, the Government of Monasteries, the Duties of Bishops, and other Clergymen, the Publick Service, Singing Psalms, Keeping the Sabbath, and other Holidays. I shall mention the three following ones, as containing something particular.

The Xth orders the Priests to be thoroughly acquainted with the Doctrines of Christianity, and to teach the people the Apostles Creed, and the Lord's Prayer in English. Agreeable to this was Bede's Advice to Egbert Archbishop of York; that it was absolutely necessary Christians should know what they said when they prayed to God; and that they should be instructed in their own native Tongue, and therefore that he himself had translated the Creed and the Lord's Prayer into English for the benefit of those that did not understand Latin.

The XXVth warns Christians from vainly imagining that by giving Amit they can compound for their Sins, or dispense with the Discipline of the Church.

The XXVIIth was made upon the account of a rich Layman, who having been excommunicated, requested to be admitted again into the Church, upon his having procured several Persons to fast in his stead; alleging that the Penance they had undergone in his name, was more than he could have done himself in three hundred years. The Canon declares with great indignation against this intolerable presumption, since at that rate, the Rich might much more easily get to Heaven than the Poor, contrary to the express Declaration of our Saviour.

Spelman.
p. 253.

In this Canon we have the Form of a Prayer for the Dead, which runs thus: O Lord, we beseech thee, grant that the Soul of such a Person may be raised in a State of Repose, and admitted, with the rest of thy Saints, into the Region of Light and Bliss.

The Council of Caeneth.

785.
Spelman.
Vol. I.
p. 291.

The Council of Calcuth or Calchite, held in 785, or according to others in 787, on account of erecting Lichfield into an Archbishoprick, ratified the Canons of a Synod that had been convened just before in Northumberland. Gregory and Trophylast, who presided as the Pope's Legates, acknowledged in their Letter to the Pope, that they were the first that had been sent into England with that Character.

ter. These are some of the Canons of the Synod of Northumberland, ratified by the Council of Calcuth.

I. That all in holy Orders strictly adhere to the Council of Nice.

II. That Baptism is only to be administered at Easter and Whitsunday, unless in case of necessity. That it is the Duty of Godfathers to teach their God-children the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, both which all Christians are obliged to have by heart.

VIII. The ancient Privileges of the Church are carefully to be preserved.

This was a never-failing Canon in all the Councils.

IX. The Priests are not to eat in private, unless indisposed. By this one would think the Clergy were not dispersed in Parishes, but lived all in the Capital of the Diocese in common.

The Xth forbids the Clergy to perform the Divine Service without Stewards, and to use a Chalice or Patten of Horn.

The XIth exhorts Princes to govern their Kingdoms by the directions of the Bishops, to whom the Power of Binding and Loosing is delivered.

The XIIth excludes Bastards from succeeding to the Crown.

The XVth condemns Marriages within the prohibited Degrees.

The XVIth makes Bastards, particularly the Children of Nuns, incapable of inheriting.

The XVIIth urges the payment of Tithes from the Authority of the Law of Moses.

The XVIIIth prescribes a strict performance of Vows.

Some Irregularities in the Subscription List in the several Copies of the Canons of this Council (6), have caused the Council itself to be called in question. But I doubt whether these Irregularities are sufficient to render the whole questionable (7).

In 798 a Synod was held at Finchale in Northumberland (8), by Edwald Archbishop of York. The design of this Meeting was to make some regulations with regard to Discipline: but here occasionally the Archbishop ordered the Canons of the first five General Councils to be read, which were unanimously received.

The Council held at Cloveshoe or Cliff in 800, under Adelard Archbishop of Canterbury, was convened for the recovery of certain Church-Lands usurped by the Kings of Mercia.

Three years after, another Council was held at the same place, wherein, according to Pope Leo's Constitution, and with the consent of Cenulph King of Mercia, the Archbishoprick of Lichfield was reduced to a Bishoprick, as formerly.

In 816, Wilfrid Archbishop of Canterbury, summoned a Council at Calcuth, at which Cenulph King of Mercia and Monarch, was present, with all the English Bishops except those of Northumberland. There are eleven Canons drawn up by this Synod, whereof the II^d and Vth seem to be the most remarkable.

The II^d orders all Churches to be consecrated by the Bishop of the Diocese, with the following Formalities. The Bishop shall bless the Holy-Water, and sprinkle the Church with it, according to the directions of the Ritual. Then having consecrated the Eucharist, he shall put it in a Bow with some Relicks to be laid up in the Church. In case there are no Relicks, the consecrated Elements, being the Body and Blood of our Lord, shall be sufficient. Every Bishop shall be obliged to have drawn upon the Altar or upon the Wall, the Figure of the Saint to whom the Church is dedicated.

The Vth declares against allowing any Scotemen to baptize, or read the Divine Service in England.

There is mention of two Councils more convened in Mercia in the reign of Bernulf, one in 822, and the Spelman, other in 824. In all appearance, the first is a Forgery; but they are both of so little consequence, as not to be worth taking notice of.

(1) This was not Berghamsted in Hertfordshire, as some have imagined, but Berghamsted, a Place in Kent. See Tyrer, Vol. I. p. 210. and Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 194.

(2) The same with King's. See Spelman.

(3) The Xth, XXVth, and XXVIIth Articles having something particular in them, it will not be amiss to lay them before the Reader. The Xth runs thus: It, on Saturday Evening, after Sun-set; or Sunday Evening after the same time, a Servant or Slave (See our) shall do any servile work, let his Master be freed, &c. l. i. c. 125.

XXVth. If a Layman kill a Thief, let him live without any Wergild, that is, without any Satisfaction being made to the Thief's Relations.

XXVIIth. If a Stranger's widow is alone, and does neither hallow, nor sound a Horn, he is to be accounted as a Thief, and to be either slain or banished. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 194.

(4) Synod of 30 Auchstet in Worcestershire. See Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 232.

(5) Cliff is a Town on a Rock near Rushford. But the Presence of the King of Mercia at this and some other Councils, held at Cloveshoe, makes it impossible that he was there with Adelard in B. Africa, about the middle of the Ninth, as some have written Stow by mistake for Cloveshoe or Clovesham.

(6) Dunelm Bishop Alfwold (or Hagulf) Ecclia, signs before Edwald his Metropolitan of York.

(7) About the year 750, the Monks of Lindisfarne, who, from the first time of their Institution were allowed to drink nothing but Milk or Water, obtained (through the means of Avig Colvass, who was become a Monk of that House) permission to drink Wine or Beer. See Dunelm, p. 139. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 289.

REFLECTIONS

Primitive State of the ENGLISH CHURCH.

I SHALL close my Account of the Primitive State of the English Church, with a few Remarks that may serve to give a just Notion of the thing. It is a great mistake to imagine the Primitive Church of the English corresponded in all points with the Church founded by the Apostles immediately after our Saviour's death. The Christian Church, in her Infancy, was perfect, without Spot or Wrinkle; but in process of time, she lost by degrees something of her primitive Purity. From the days of the Apostles to the VIIIth Century, Errors and Abuses crept in, which strangely disfigured her, and which daily increased during the VIIIth and IXth Centuries, so that true Religion by little and little degenerated into Superstition. Our Idea therefore of the primitive Church of England must be conformable to the State of the Christian Church at that time. I shall not here undertake to show wherein those Innovations in the Doctrines and Services of the Church consisted; but content myself with observing the Christian Church, at the time of the Conversion of the English, was far gone from its original Purity. It can't, for Instance, be denied, that the Monks, who were grown exceeding numerous all over Christendom, had introduced several Religious Practices that were not of Divine or Apostolical Institution, as if our Saviour and his Apostles had forgot or neglected to give Mankind full Instructions in these matters. These voluntary Acts of Devotion, tho' introduced with a good Intent, were now carried to so great a height, that the generality of Christians looked upon them as the Life and Soul of Religion. I shall not insist any farther on this Subject, since I have no power to enter into the Controversy, but only to make this Observation, That the English converted in the VIIIth Century, are to be considered as in the same State with the rest of the Christian World at that time, seeing it was not in their power to know more than their Masters taught them.

Austin and his Companions were the first that preached the Gospel to the Anglo-Saxons. However, the honour of their Conversion ought not to be ascribed to them alone. The Scotch Monks of St. Columba had at least as great a share in it as the Italians: For after these last had begun to make Converts, the New Christians being sunk again into Idolatry; the Scotch Monks were the Persons that set them right again, or rather that converted them anew. This was the case in the Kingdoms of Essex, Northumberland, and East-Anglia, as hath been related. As for the Conversion of the Mercians, the Italian Missionaries had no hand in it at all. And yet Austin has run away with the honour of converting the English, when in the main the progress he made was not very considerable. 'Tis true he preached to the Saxons of Kent, as Mellitus did to those of Essex, and that with good success. But then very probably this work was already begun, and even in great forwardness, when Austin arrived in England. It is hard to conceive how these Monks, who were fain to make use of Interpreters, could possibly have converted such Numbers of Pagans, in so little time, baptizing ten thousand in one Day, in a few Months after their Arrival, if the Saxons had not been prepared before-hand. This conjecture is further confirmed by the Letters of Gregory I. to Theodore King of Austrasia, to Theobert his Brother, and to Queen Brunichilda, to desire them to assist Austin in his Journey to England. The Pope tells them, he was informed for certain that the English earnestly desired to turn Christians. Now is it not evident, that, if they had a strong desire to embrace the Gospel, they were as good as half converted? There is great reason to presume King Ethelbert had already some liking to the Christian Religion infused into him by his Queen, and especially by Luidard, Bishop of Seisjons, who had attended her into England. This is what the Author of the History of St. Austin. Monastery positively affirms; and Malmesbury says little less, when he tells us, that Ethelbert was very desirous to hear what Austin had to propose. Besides, if the Person, Character and Conduct of Austin are considered, it will be hard to believe, he made the progress ascribed to him. Bede, who does not seem willing to lessen his reputation, says nothing that is very apt to raise in us an esteem for his Preaching. Instead of embellishing his History with the Heads of Austin's first discourse before Ethelbert, he is contented with relating only the King's Answer. This gives occasion to suspect, he was not over-satisfied with that Harangue. Moreover, the questions which Austin wanted the Pope to solve, do not much redound to his honour. This no doubt was the reason why Bede abridged them as much as possible, even to the rendering them sometimes to obscure, that the meaning of the question must be learnt by the answer.

To these considerations may be added, that Austin in the height of his Success, for which he is so greatly honoured, established but two Bishops only, Justus at Rochester, and Mellitus at London, tho' the Pope had expressly ordered him to settle Bishops where-ever there should be occasion. This is a clear Evidence, that the progress ascribed to him was not so considerable as Gregory imagined. But what can one think of this same Austin, who the very first year deserts his Mission, and goes to Aries to get himself consecrated Archbishop, when as yet there was but a handful of Christians in England, or rather in the alone Kingdom of Kent? To what end the title of Archbishop and Primate, at a time when there was not so much as one Bishop in being? What can one think moreover of the Pope's answer to him concerning the Bishops of Gaul, That he allows him no manner of Jurisdiction over them? May it not be presumed, that Austin, not content with the Primacy of Great-Britain wherewith the Pope had honoured him, wanted to extend his Jurisdiction over Gaul too? In fine, what can one think of Gregory's Letter to him, exhorting him not to be elated at the Gift of Miracles God had bestowed on him, unless Austin had sent him word he had wrought several? But what were these Miracles? Would Bede, who has carefully related those of Aidan, Finan, Furseus, and the other Scotch Monks, whom he looked upon as Schismatics, have omitted those of Austin? And yet he gives us only one, and that of a later date than Gregory's Letter, and the most suspicious that ever was, since by the confession of the same Historian, it was wrought in order to bring the Britons to the obedience of the Pope? What opinion can one have of Austin, when it is considered with what zeal he laboured to reduce the Britons under the Jurisdiction of the See of Rome, whilst five Saxon Kingdoms were suffered to grovel in Darkness and Idolatry? To what purpose did he complain to the Pope of the want of Labourers in so plentiful an Harvest, if he did not employ those he already had? And if he did employ them, where are the Fruits of their Labours? What were their Names? Where did they preach the Gospel? No Historian says a word of these things; and except Justus and Mellitus, who preached at Rochester and London, it is not known where he sent his Companions, who according to the general opinion, were forty in number.

Again, the Converts made by these Italian Monks were not, 'tis to be feared, well grounded in their Religion. This is a natural inference from the Apostacy of the People of Essex, East-Anglia, Northumberland, and Kent itself, at a time when, had they been true Christians, they would have given marks of the highest Zeal. This makes one think, their Conversion was without any previous Instruction, and rather the Effect of Fear, or Complaisance to their Kings, than of a Thorough persuasion persuasion and knowledge of the Truth. It is therefore surprisingly strange, that the Conversion of the English should be ascribed to Austin, rather than to Aidan, to Finnian, to Colman, to Cedd, to Diana and the other Scotch Monks, who undoubtedly laboured much more abundantly than he. But here lies the Case: These Last had not their Orders from Rome, and therefore must not be allowed any Share of the glory of this Work.

Let us now reflect a little on the Manner of the Conversion of the English. In the beginning of Christianity, and even for the first three hundred Years, the Converts generally consisted of People of the lowest rank, and we hear of nothing but Persecution and Death from the Princes and Magistrates. Whereas in England, the Kings were the first that embraced the Faith, and by their Authority and Example induced their Subjects to do the same. In the beginning of the Church of England, we meet with no Martyrs, except the two Sons of Wulpher King of Mercia, whose Story is of very doubtful Authority. Whence could proceed this difference between the Church founded by the Apostles themselves, in so many parts of the World, and That founded in England in the VIIIth Century? What is the reason the Devil lels vigorously obstructed the Conversion of the English, than That of so many other Nations, during the Life and after the Death of the Apostles? These things afford matter for many Reflections, which I shall not here enter into, but leave to the consideration of the Reader. I shall only remark, that the Ease wherewith the Conversion of the English was brought about, extremely weakens the force of the argument drawn in favour of the Christian Religion, from the Persecutions of the Roman Emperors.

Pach.

Let a Man consider, says a famous Writer, the Establishment of Christianity, that a Religion so contrary to Nature (1), should make its way in the World, by such mild and gentle Means, without any violence or constraint, and yet should be so firmly rooted withal, that it was not in the Power of the most barbarous Torments to compel the Martyrs to renounce their Faith; and that all this should be done not only without the assistance of any Prince, but in direct opposition to all the Kings of the Earth, &c. It is easy to see this argument loses much of its strength, when applied to the Conversion of the English.

What still affords further matter for our wonder is this: The Ecclesiastical History speaks of several Saints in different parts of the World; but withal tells us, that scarce one of them escaped being terribly persecuted, or even losing his Life in the cause of Truth. Whereas in England alone, we find in the space of two hundred years an incredible number of Men and Women Saints, who never knew what Persecution meant. Moreover, if Historians may be credited, these Saints, for the most part, were endued with the gift of Miracles, tho' the swift progress of the Gospel seemed to render them of little use. But what is more; a considerable number of these same Saints were Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, or Persons of the highest Birth and Stations. In the Period above-mentioned we have seven Kings and seven Queens, together with eight Princes, and sixteen Princesses, distinguished with the Title of Saints: Besides ten Kings and eleven Queens, who resigned their Crowns to turn Monks, and who, according to the notions of those Days, might well be ranked in the number of the Saints. If it be asked, whence is it that in the VIIIth and VIIIth Centuries it was so easy for the Great to procure a Saintsship, I can alledge no other Reason, but that Sanctity consisted then in enriching the Churches and Monasteries, which the Rich were much better able to do than the Poor.

The English were no sooner converted, but innumerable Miracles were wrought among them. They were so much in vogue during the two forementioned Centuries, that one or other happened (if I may so say) every Day. Bede's Ecclesiastical History is full of them; for he was exceeding credulous in such matters, as well as Gregory I. whose Poible in that respect is visible in his Works. It is no wonder therefore the Missionaries he sent into England should take after him, or that the English should be as easy of Belief as their Teachers. The Benedictine Monks were the Persons that set all these Miracles on foot: Some out of pure Simplicity, others with design to attract to the Monasteries the liberalities both of High and Low. Before the Benedictines were spread over the Island, the Monks of St. Columba, lels given to gain and worldly Views, attended wholly to the Service of God in the places where they lived in common. But the Benedictines never rested till they had procured great numbers of Monasteries with large Revenues, and caused the Papal Authority to be recognized throughout the seven Kingdoms.

It was not however without great difficulty that the Popes extended their Jurisdiction over the Northumbrians, Picts and Scots, tho' the Roman Priests and Monks laboured at it incessantly. The northern Nations could not conceive the necessity of owning the Bishop of Rome for Universal Bishop; and it is certain, before the Synod of Whitby, the Britons, Picts, Scots, Irish and Northumbrians unanimously declared against the Pope's Authority. Bede says as much, when he tells us, speaking of King Oswy; He was at length convinced, that the Church of Rome was the true Catholic and Apostolical Church, tho' he had been educated in Scotland. As soon as this Prince was prevailed with, he did all he could to establish the Papal Authority in his dominions; and Scotland at last was carried away with the Torrent, after Egbert an English Priest had gained the Monks of Jona.

Upon the English care was taken to keep them from falling off. One of the most effectual means made use of for that purpose, was, the not admitting into the Government of the Church any but Italian Priests or Monks, or English ones educated at Rome or in France. This is evident from the Vth Canon of the second Council of Calcutth, which forbids the allowing any Scotch-man to perform Divine Service in England. Bede plainly discovers the Policy of Rome, when he says, the Pope ordered Abbot Adrian to attend Theodorus into England, that he might have an eye over him, for fear that Prelate, being a native of Cilicia, should introduce in the Church of England any thing contrary to the Customs of Rome.

I have but one Remark more to make relating to the Doctrine of the Church of England in the VIIIth and VIIIth Centuries, and the beginning of the IXth. It is a great mistake to think the Articles of Faith in the English Church were the same with those in the Roman at this day. For Instance, it would be very wrong to imagine the English believed, at that time, the absolute necessity of Baptism as the Romans do at this present. If this Doctrine had been received among them, the Council of Calcutth would not have ordered that Sacrament to be administered only at Easter and Whitsontide. As far from the Truth it is to believe the English worshipped Images. The contrary is evident from a Letter the famous Alcuin an Englishman wrote to Charles the Great concerning the second Council of Nice, where Image-worship was carried to a monstrous height. The necessity of Priests living single is also a Doctrine unknown to the Church of England in those days, since it was not received there till at least five hundred years after their Conversion. To these I might add several other Instances; but as they are not peculiar to England, I shall only observe in general that all the Innovations in the Doctrines of the Church of England, from the Conversion of the English to the Reformation, owe their original to Rome.

I don't find the Church of England had any thing to do in the Controversies that were on foot in the Church during the VIIIth and VIIIth Centuries. Among all the Councils convened in England within that space, not one decreed any thing relating to the doctrines of Religion, except the Synod of Calcutth, where the condemning the Monothelites was ratified. Their way was to read the Canons of the General Councils, and agree to them. Thus during these two Centuries, it does not appear that the Church of England was troubled with Hergies or Disputes on the Fundamental Doctrines of Religion. In those Days, the Bishops, Priests and Monks were more intent upon the ways and means of augmenting their Revenues, than upon the study of Divinity. There were some also that were distinguished for holiness of Life, or for zeal in propagating the Gospel. I have already mentioned some few; but as I had not an opportunity of making them all known, I shall here subjoin a brief account of three or four that make a considerable figure in the Ecclesiastical History of England.

Egbert, an English Priest, retiring into Ireland to follow his Studies, passed some time after into Scotland, where he prevailed with the Monks of Jona to receive the Rules of the Order of St. Benedict, and acknowledge the Papal Authority. Perhaps to this Service done the See of Rome, a good part of the Encomiums bestowed upon him are owing. However this be, it is said, that having a design to go and preach the Gospel to the German Saxons, he was diverted from his purpose by an express order from Heaven. But, as he had the Conversion of that Nation very much at heart, he pitched upon Wilfred to go in his place.

Wilfred being arrived in Germany, Pipin, Mayor of the Palace of France, sent him into Friesland, which he had lately subdued, to preach the Gospel. After Wilfred had

(3) As the Translator designs to take Notice of all the Historians omitted by Rapin, he begins with NENNIVS, Abbot of Banger, suppos'd to be one of the fifty Monks that escap'd, when twelve hundred of their Brethren were slain by Adelfrid King of Northumberland. He flourish'd about the Year 620; though it is said in the best Copies of his Book, that he wrote in 850, in 24 Morini Regis. There is nothing publish'd of his but his Historia Britonum.

Next after him comes BEDD, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History of England, from Julus Caesar's Invasion, to the Year of our Lord 732, at the Request of Cuthluff King of Northumberland, to whom it was dedicated. He was born in 673, in the Precincts of the Monastery of Jarrow, near the Mouth of the Tine in Northumberland. He was bred up from his Childhood in the said Monastery, where he liv'd all his Life. He was ordain'd at nineteen a Deacon, and at thirty a Priest; from which time till the fifty-ninth of his Age he never cess'd Writing. His Works are printed in eight Tomes, besides his Opuscula. He died in 735, aged sixty two. His Body was remov'd from Jarrow to Derham, and plac'd in the same Coffin with St Cuthbert's.

Contemporary with Bede liv'd Stephen EDDI, Haddi, or Eddius, in the Reign of Offa King of Northumberland, he died in 720. Bede says, he was the best Singer in the North; on which Account he was invited to Tork by Wilfrid the Bishop, whose Life he wrote in Latin, in somewhat a better Style than could be expected from that Age. This Treatise, which contains several material Passages relating to the Ecclesiastical as well as Civil State, having continued in Manuscript in the Library of Sir John Cotton, and also in that of Salisbury, was publish'd by Dr. Gale in his last Volume of English Writers.

In the VIIIth Century liv'd ALGUIN or Albin, a famous Northumbrian. He was bred a Benedictine, and was made Abbot of St. Augustine's Convent. He was Disciple to Egbert Archbishop of York. Being sent Ambassador by Offa to Charles the Great, that Prince got Leave for him to stay at his Court, Malmesbury, and was taught by him Logic, Astronomy, and Mathematics. By his Persuasion the Emperor founded the University of Paris, and likewise of Pavia. He wrote a great many Books, as Bois P^{er}. He died in 804.

ENGLAND now grown more powerful by the Union of the seven Kingdoms, seemed to be better secured than ever from foreign Invasions. And yet, presently after this Union it was, that the Danes began their Descents with a Fury, equal to that wherewith the English themselves had formerly attacked the Britons. For above two hundred Years these new Enemies were so obstinately bent upon the Ruin of the Island, that it can't be conceived either how their Country could supply them with Troops sufficient for so long and bloody a War, or the English hold out against so many reiterated Attacks. This War is to be the chief Subject of our fourth Book, and of great part of the fifth. But before I enter upon Particulars, it will be necessary to premise some Account of these Danes, who in the IXth Century became so formidable to all Europe, and especially to England.

Scandia or Scandinavia (1), situated in the North of Europe, contains a Tract of Land in length from North to South about four hundred Leagues, and in breadth from East to West about one hundred and fifty. If the northern Historians are to be credited in what they say of the Origin of their Ancestors, this Country was peopled soon after the Flood, by two Nations, or rather two Branches of the same Nation, I mean, the Goths and Swedes, who founded two large Kingdoms in this part of the World. From these two Nations, who were sometimes united and sometimes divided, sprung, as they say, all those Colonies which after the Decline of the Roman Empire, over-ran the rest of Europe. But without staying to examine whether all they advance concerning the Conquests of these Adventurers is built on good Authority, I shall take them for Guides in what they say of those that remained in the northern Countries.

In the Reign of Eric the sixth King of the Goths (2), Gothland was become so exceeding populous, that the Country was unable to maintain its Inhabitants. To remedy this Inconvenience, which daily increased, Eric was compelled to send away part of his Subjects to seek their Fortune in the neighbouring Isles (3). These Colonies at length not only peopled the Islands, but also Futland on the Continent, formerly known by the Name of Cimbria Chersonesus. The People thus spread over the Isles and Janus the Chersonesus, acknowledged above seven hundred Years the Kings of Gothland for their Sovereigns. Hamel the sixteenth King of the Goths, first made them independent, by letting them have for their King, Dan his Son, from whom Denmark receiv'd its Name (4). Norway also very probably was peopled by Gothic Colonies, since it remained a long while under the Dominion of the Kings of Gothland. In process of time, and after many Revolutions, Norway was governed by Judges independent of Gothland, till about the end of the IXth Century, when it became subject to a King.

The Danes and Norwegians, being thus separated from their Ancestors the Goths and Swedes, became so powerful as to be in condition to make head against them both in several Wars. The Situation of their Country, and the great Plenty of all things necessary for building and equipping a Fleet, soon made them superior at Sea to all their Neighbours. In time, they employed all their naval Forces in plundering of Ships, and ravaging the Coasts of Europe. France, England, and the Low-Countries, were most exposed to their Robberies. For above one hundred and fifty Years the Sea was covered with Danish Pyrates. They were grown so powerful, that Charles the Great could never subdue the Saxons, whilst assisted by the Danes. His story observes, that this Emperor having sent his Son Pepin to make War upon the Saxons, this Prince was prevented in his Designs by Guthric King of Denmark, sending a Reinforcement of Danes on board three hundred Vessels. A northern Historian affirms, that Charles the Great was never better pleased than at the News of Guthric's Death, having despaired of accomplishing his Ends, as long as that Prince was alive.

As People encrease and multiply exceedingly in cold Countries, it often happened that Denmark and Norway were over-stocked with Inhabitants, and therefore forced, in order to make room for the rest, to send away large Colonies. Their natural Inclination to a Sea-faring Life made these Colonies readily abandon their Country, as it procured them greater Liberty of roving and playing the Pyrate, on pretence of looking out new Habitations. This was chiefly the Rife of those Pyracies committed by the Danes and Norwegians, in the IXth Century, in France, England, the Low-Countries and Germany. The great Booty the first Adventurers brought off, tempted the richest and most powerful of their Countrymen to try their Fortune in the same manner. They entered into Associations, and fitted out large Fleets to go and ravage foreign Countries. These Associations were much of the same Nature with those entered into now a-days in time of War, by the Inhabitants of the Sea-port Towns in France and Flanders, and always by the Corsairs of Barbary. In short, they were so used to this gainful way of trading, that very considerable Fleets were put to Sea. They had the Authority of their Kings for what they did, who, having always a Share in the Spoils, provided them with Admirals and Generals, and when a considerable Booty was in View, made no Scruple even to command them in Person. These are the Fleets that made such Devastations in several parts of Europe, and caused the Inhabitants of France, England, and the Low-Countries, to make sad Lamentation for the Miseries brought upon them by the northern Nations (1). They were called in France, Normans, that is to say, Men of the North; but in England, they were generally stiled Danes or Goths. There is no doubt but the Suendes and Goths very often joined with the Danes, in order to go Shares in the Booty. Nay, it appears that the Frislanders were concerned with the Danes in ravaging the Coasts of France and England. This doubtless is the Reason the English Historians call them indifferently, Geths, Goths, Jutes, Norwegians, Dacians, Danes, Suendes, Pandals, Frislanders, their Armies being composed of these several Nations.

Rep. etc.
Hor.

It is easy to see, from what has been said of the Danes, that their Intent, when first they invaded the Coasts of England, was only to plunder. And therefore they made War, not like regular Troops, with some fixed and settled Design; but like Pyrates, sacking and destroying what they could not carry away. As they were divided into several independent Bands, it frequently happened that no sooner was One gone, but Another came; by which means the Inhabitants had scarce any Respite from their Incurfions. This way of making War was very inconvenient for the English, it obliging them to be upon their guard at all Times and in all Places, since the Island was liable to be attacked on every Side. On the other hand, their Enemies, whose Numbers were continually encreasing, being headed by Leaders who had no Authority over each other, there was no entering into Treaty with them, one Band not looking upon it self bound by what another did. Thus the English having nothing to gain, but much to lose, were at a loss what Measures to take against these Enemies, who carried Desolation wherever they came. I am very sensible the Danish Historians set these Matters in quite another Light. They express the Advantages the Danes had over the English in their first Incursions, by the Name of Conquests, and stile the Struggles of the English to free themselves from Oppression, so many Revolts. But notwithstanding their giving things these specious Names, their Advantages are to be considered as before represented, at least for the first hundred Years after they began their Ravages.

Before I leave this Subject it will be proper to observe that the English and Danish Historians give very contradictory Accounts of these Wars. Each endeavours to the utmost of his Power, to magnify the Advantages of his own Nation, and lessen those of the opposite Party. However it is but too visible that the Danes could not have got such Footing in England, had not Victory generally inclined to their Side. But this is not all wherein Historians disagree. They differ chiefly in Chronological Matters, and in the Names of the Persons of whom they are speaking, which must of necessity breed the greatest Confusion in History.

Through all these Difficulties am I obliged to steer my Course, with all imaginable Circumspection and Wariness, lest I should be put to a stand by the Obstacles that every Moment occur. If the Readers do not find that Connection, and those other Embellishments they could wish for, it must be remembered, that the Narration of a War, carried on for the sake of Plunder only, is hardly capable of Connection or Embellishment.

After these Remarks, which seemed to me necessary for the better understanding of the Sequel, it is time to return to the Reign of Egbert, which was left unfinished in the foregoing Book, where he appear'd only as King of Wessex. He is now to make his Appearance as King of all England, and as real Monarch of the seven Kingdoms of the Hep-tarchy.

EGBERT, first King of ENGLAND.

EGBERT,
A. D. 828.
p. 254.

EGBERT, who began his Reign over the West-Saxons in 800, finished not his Conquests till 827, or 828, from which time his Title of King of England is to be dated. But to avoid Mistakes, it must be remembered, that the Kingdom this Prince was in actual Possession of, consisted of the ancient Kingdoms of Wessex, Suffex, Kent and Essex, that were peopled by Saxons and Jutes. As for the other three Kingdoms, whose Inhabitants were Angles, he was contented with reserving the Sovereignty over them, permitting them to be governed by Kings who were his Vassals and Tributaries (2).

It has been seen how this Prince, before he turned his Arms against his Countrymen, attacked and subdued the Britons of Cornwall and Wales. Though his Power after that was exceedingly encreased, yet the Welsh by their Proceedings plainly shewed they designed to shake off his Yoke. Egbert, informed of their Intent, gave them no Time to put it in Execution. He marched into their Country with so numerous an Army, that they were forced to submit, without offering to come to a Battle.

Whilst Egbert was enjoying the Fruits of his Victories, the Danes, who had before made two Descents on England (3), arrived at Charmouth (4) with thirty five Vessels.

As they met with no Opposition, they landed and fell to ravaging the Country. Egbert, upon the first News of this Descent, marched against them with what Troops he could hastily draw together, verily believing at this Approach they would repair to their Ships, which though he found they did not do, but on the contrary firmly stood their Ground, he resolved to attack them. But he soon experienced he had to deal with much more formidable Enemies than he imagined. After a long and bloody Battle (5), he had the Vexation to see them victorious, and his own Army entirely routed. Nay, he found himself so very hard pressed that he was forced at length to follow his flying Troops, being indebted to the Darkness of the Night for his very Life. This Mortification, very grievous to a Prince hitherto ever victorious, caused him to take other Measures for his Defence against these new Invaders. In the mean time the Danes, having no Design to make Conquests, were satisfied with plundering the Country, and returned to their Ships.

Two Years after, another Band of Danish Pyrates, having been informed by their Spies that the Cornish Britons (6) were extremely desirous of throwing off the Yoke of the Danes, went and landed in their Territories, where they were received with Joy. Being reinforced with some British Troops, they began their March in order to give the English Monarch Battle. They were in hopes to surprise him, but were themselves astonished to hear he was marching directly towards them with the same Intent. His former Misfortune having made him more cautious, he had kept his Army in readiness to march upon the first Notice of their Arrival. Accordingly being informed they were landed in the Wessex, he hastened thither with all his Forces. He engaged them near Hengist-dun (1) in Cornwall, and obtained a signal Victory, which quite effaced the Dishonour of his former Defeat.

Egbert comes

After this fortunate Blow, which delivered the English for a short space from the Danish Invasions, we find but one remarkable Particular in Egbert's Reign. It is said that this Prince, by a publick Edict, approved by the general Assembly of the Nation, ordered, That for the future the Name of England should be given to that Part of Great Britain, conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, and erected into seven Kingdoms (2). But it is much more likely, he only confirmed or revived this Name, which certainly is older than the Reign of Egbert. We find in Bede's Ecclesiastical History, that before that time the three Nations settled in Great Britain, are indifferently called Angli or Engli. And indeed Bede himself, who wrote long before Egbert, gives his History the Title of the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, though it much more relates to the Churches of Kent, Wessex, Sussex and Essex, than to those of Mercia, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. I have already said, that the Change of the Name of Britain into that of England, ought to be carried back to the Year 585, or 586.

Egbert con-
change of the name of Britain into that of England.

Proofs of his not being the first Author of that Change.

In Confirmation of which, and to shew the Improbability of Egbert's being the Author of this Change, I shall allege the following Proofs, which to me seem very strong. In the first Place, Egbert had no reason to call the seven Kingdoms England, since he himself was a Saxon, and the Provinces, his own Kingdom consisted of, were peopled with Saxons and Jutes. Besides the Angles or Engli, inhabiting Mercia, East-Anglia and Northumberland, were his Vassals and Tributaries. Now is it at all likely, that the Conqueror should impose on his victorious Subjects the Name of those they had subdued? This might indeed be done insensibly, but it is not probable a Conqueror should enjoin it by an Edict: But as this amounts to no more than Conjecture, I shall proceed to more substantial Proofs. An Historian positively affirms, that a little after the Founding of the seven Kingdoms, the Name of England was given to Britain by the unanimous Consent of the seven Kings. But this can by no means be applied to the time of Egbert (above two hundred and fifty Years after) since that Prince could not have published his Edict till after the Dissolution of the

Jo. Sarrish.

Heptarchy. Besides, how came Bede, who lived one hundred and fifty Years before Egbert, to call the three Nations settled in Britain, Engli, if that Monarch was the Author of that Name? But what is still more convincing, though the Subjects of Ina, King of Wessex, were Saxons or Jutes, that Prince however, in his Laws enacted for the Wessex-Saxons, only calls them Engli. If an *Engli*man, says he, commits Theft.---Again, If a Welsh Slave shall kill an *Engli*man.---Is it not plain, that unless this Name had been common to the three Nations, Ina would not have called his Subjects *Engli*men, but Saxons? In short, it is not at all strange that immediately after Founding the seven Kingdoms, the Anglo-Saxons should term their Conquest, Engli, since the Angles were in Possession of a larger and more considerable Tract of Land than both the Saxons and Jutes. But it was not natural this Name should be introduced in the Reign of Egbert, when the three Kingdoms of the Angles were gone to decay, and the Kingdom of the Wessex-Saxons in a flourishing Condition.

Egbert died in 838 (3), after he had reigned thirty seven Years, twenty Years as King of Wessex only, seven Years with the Dignity of Monarch, and ten Years as real Sovereign of all England. Redburg his Spouse had never assumed the Title and Port of a Queen, because of the Law made in Wessex, on account of the Death of Brithric. She is said to have persuaded the King to forbid the Welsh, on pain of Death, to come beyond Offa's Dike, the Boundary of Mercia and Wales.

Egbert left but one Son, named Ethelwulph, who succeeded him both as King of Wessex, Essex, Kent, and Sussex, and as Sovereign of the other three Kingdoms. Egbert had doubtless another Son, since this was designed for the Church. A modern Author gives the Name of Ethelbert to Egbert's eldest Son; but I know not whence he had his Information. Some say he had also a Daughter called J. T. Ann.

Edith, who founded the Abbey of Pallisbury (4), but this is uncertain. By all that has been said of Egbert, it is easy to see this Prince had all the Qualifications of a great Warrior. He accomplished his Ends, not by such Methods as Hengist and Offa had taken, but by way of Arms, which tho' no less Criminal, tarnishes not the Reputation of those that make use of it, especially when crowned with Success. It is a lamentable thing that Ambition, by which Princes are led to invade the Property of others, should pass in the World for a Virtue, and that an Historian, by reason of Men's depraved Notions, should not dare to represent it in its true Colours, since, generally speaking, they are your ambitious Princes that are honoured with the Surname of Great.

ETHELWULPH, Egbert's only Son, came to the Crown after his Father's Death. Some say he was forced to have a Dispensation from the Pope, because he was in Holy Orders. But it is not very likely, that after the Death of his elder Brother, Egbert would suffer him to be bred a Churchman, since he had no other Son to succeed him (5).

Ethelwulph was hardly warm in his Throne, when a Fleet of Danes (6) appeared near Southampton. After they had roved up and down for some time, they landed and ravaged the flat Country. Ethelwulph, a lover of Peace and his Estate, sent Wulfherd his General against them, who beat them back to their Ships. But the King had not reason long to rejoice at this Victory. Before his Army returned, News was brought him that more Danish Forces, having landed at Portland, were plundering and destroying the Country. Tho' he had no reason to be displeased with Wulfherd (7), he sent Earl Ethelhelm to command the Army, who was shamefully beaten and put to flight (8). Herbert the succeeding General was still more unfortunate, for he was not only vanquished, but lost his Life in the Battle. These two Victories gave the Dani Opportunity to overrun several Counties, particularly Kent and Middlesex (9). Canterbury, Rocheſter, and London were great Sufferers on this Occasion, the Enemy committing unheard-of Cruelties before they returned to their Ships.

Some make Witlaph King of Mercia die this Year 839. 839. Others place his Death two Years sooner in 837. But this Difference is of little moment, this Prince making but a very mean Figure after he became Vassal to the King of Wessex (10). Berthulph his Brother succeeded him.

The next Year Ethelwulph, not at all satisfied with his two last Generals, was resolved to go in Person against a Body of Danes that were arrived in thirty five Ships, and landed on the Coast of Wessex. The two Armies engaging at Charmanth, the English were worsted, and thought themselves happy that the Enemies after their Victory, were contented with carrying off their Booty, the only end of these Danish Expeditions.

This year (or as some say the year before) was very remarkable for the entire destruction of the Picts. After a long War with the Scots their neighbours, they lost two successive Battles, which disabled them from making any further Resistance. Keneth II. King of Scotland, exasperated against them for having slain his Father, and inhumanly mangled his Corps, told the Scots they ought not to lose the present opportunity of rooting out a Nation that had been their perpetual Enemies. His advice was approved of, and executed with such a barbarous Fury, that from that time nothing remains but the bare memory of that miserable Nation, which had so long flourished in Great-Britain. It is chiefly owing to his extirpating the Picts, that Keneth II. was looked upon by the Scots as an illustrious Prince, and one of the Founders of their Monarchy.

The Danes continuing their Incurfions, Ethelwulph, who was naturally slothful, thought himself unable to govern alone all his dominions, exposed as they were to the perpetual Infults of Foreigners. This consideration, and perhaps his tender Affection for Athelstan his natural Son, made him resolve to resign to him the Kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and Suffex (2), with the Title of King of Kent, reserving to himself the Sovereignty of all England, with the Kingdom of Wessex.

ETHELWULPH in Wessex. ATHELSTAN in Kent.

ANDRED King of Northumberland died in 841, and was succeeded by Ethelred his Son.

Roderic, surnamed Maur, (i. e.) the Great, was then King of Wales. This Prince, to whom the British Historians give the highest Commendations, attacked Berthulph King of Mercia with great Success. As little inclined to war as Ethelwulph was, he was obliged to march in Person into Mercia, to stop the progress of the Welsh Prince. He easily saw the dangerous consequence of suffering the Welsh to recover any part of the Country taken from them by the English. And therefore, without staying to be solicited, he went and joined Forces with the King of Mercia. Whilst Roderic had to deal with Berthulph alone, he imagin'd he was powerful enough to dispossess him, if not of the whole, yet at least of good part of his Kingdom. But when he found Ethelwulph engaged in the quarrel, he desisted from his Enterprize and sued for Peace, which he obtained without any difficulty, both the Sovereign and his Vassal desiring only to live in peace and quiet. This same Roderic left three Sons, among whom he shared his dominions, which by that means were divided into the three Kingdoms of Venedotia, Demetia, and Powis.

Ethelred, who ascended the Throne of Northumberland in 841, was driven out of the Country three years after, by one of the Factions that for a long time prevailed by turns in that Kingdom, and Redwald put in his place. The new King being slain shortly after by the Danes, in a descent made on Northumberland, Ethelred was recalled by his Party, who were now become powerful enough to support him in the Throne.

The Danes never failed to visit England once a year, purely for the sake of plunder. In 845 the Earls Enuiph and Ostfric, with Bishop Astian, gave them battle near the River Parret (3), and obtained a signal Victory, which probably was the reason the English remained unmolested for some years.

The King of Northumberland reigned but three years after his Restoration. The opposite Party having put him to death, a Lord, named Osbert, was placed on the Throne. The troubles and divisions in that Kingdom gave the Danes opportunity of making frequent Incurfions. Whenever they came, they were sure of being welcome to the weakest Party. Neither of the Factions scrupling to join with the Danes in order to get uppermost.

Whilst the Danes were thus employ'd in the North, the Southern Provinces enjoyed some Tranquillity. But at length, in 851, they landed on the Coast of Wessex, where they committed unpeepable Cruelties. After ravaging the Country, they were met as they were returning to their Ships with their Booty, by Earl Ceorle, Ethelwulph's General (4), who waited for them at Wenbury (5). Being incumbered with their Spoils, they fought in such disorder, that they were entirely routed. Some time after, King Athelstan going on board his Fleet, fought the Danes near Sandwich, and took nine of their Ships. He could not however prevent another Band from wintering in the Island of Sheppey.

The ill Success the Danes met with, did not in the least discourage them. The next Spring they came up the Thames with three hundred Sail (6), and nothing being able to oppose them, landed near London, where they began their usual Ravages. The two Kings, not expecting this sudden Invasion, did not dare to take the Field, till they had an Army capable of withstanding them, which they endeavoured to have with all possible expedition.

Whilst the two Princes were making preparations, the Danes made use of their time to plunder: They were not content with ravaging the Country, but attacked the Towns, which, for the most part, not being in condition to stand a Siege, were forced to open their Gates to their merciless Enemies. London and Canterbury were great sufferers on this occasion. Having pillaged these two Cities, they marched into Mercia, and overthrew an Army led against them by Berthulph, in defence of his Country (7).

Nothing more opposing their progress, they would have overrun all England, if the news that Ethelwulph and Athelstan designed to intercept them in their return, had not made them halt. They re-passed the Thames, with design to give the two Kings battle, now encamped at Okely in Surrey. They committed in their march such barbarities, as the very mention of them would strike one with horror. In short, they engaged the two Kings in the very place where they had encamped in expectation of the Enemy. Here a bloody Battle was fought, wherein the English at length were victorious, and made so terrible a slaughter of the Danes, that very few escaped.

Berthulph King of Mercia died this year, and was succeeded by Buthred, with the consent of Ethelwulph, whose Daughter he had married.

After the Battle of Okely we hear no more of Athelstan, and therefore presume he did not long survive that great Victory, to which his Valour greatly contributed. Although Ethelwulph had several Sons born in wedlock that were old enough to assist him in the administration of Affairs, yet he would not give Ethelbald his eldest, Athelstan's Kingdom. Besides his having no great Affection for him, he dreaded his restless and turbulent Spirit. The young Prince, who thought himself no less worthy of a Crown than Athelstan his Bastard-brother, was very much disgusted at this pretended Injustice.

ETHELWULPH was extremely addicted to Religion, both by Temper, and Education. He would willingly, it permitted, have spent whole Days together in conversation with the Monks, whilst the Danes were ransacking his Kingdom in a merciless Manner. The Victory of Okely procuring him some respite from these formidable Enemies, he was at Liberty to follow his natural Inclination. He had two Favourites who equally shared his Affection and Confidence. They were both Bishops, but of very different Characters. The first, named Swithin, Bishop of Winchester, was continually entertaining the King upon the Vanity of all worldly Glory, and the Joys of Heaven. The second, called Aelfan, Bishop of Sharborn, was not at all pleased with the King's giving himself up wholly to his Devotions. He could have wished he would have exerted himself more vigorously in repelling the Danes, and employed his time in making preparations against their next return. To that end he never ceased animating him, by laying before him the glorious Deeds of his Ancestors, particularly those of his Father Egbert, in which he was most nearly concerned. He was not satisfied with turning him up by lively Exhortations, but furnished him also with Money to hasten his warlike Preparations.

These two Prelates bore an absolute sway over the King, who was naturally of a florid and indolent Temper. The one had the ascendant in Peace, the other in War. Aelfan kept his ground a long while, by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes, which robbed the King of great part of the time he would have employed in his Devotions. But as soon as he found he was like to enjoy some Quiet, he was entirely guided by the Bishop of Winchester. This Prelate, taking advantage of the King's religious Disposition, engaged him to himself, that Aelfan, whose credit was not so conformable to the King's Inclination, should lose credit by degrees to diminish. Swithin, all in all with the King, continued him more and more in his usual Pursuit of a Religious Life. Above all, he infused into him an extreme affect in for the Church and Clergy, when the main of Religion was then made to consist. By his advice it was, that this Prince, as it is pretended, granted to the Church the Tithes of all his Dominions (1). In respect to the revenues of the Church were not very considerable; but by this new grant they were enlarged to that Degree, that Ethelwulph's Successors had frequent occasion to wish he had left the Clergy in their former State. To this zeal for Religion it was owing also that he sent to Rome his youngest Son Affid, then about five years of Age. As he was very fond of this Child, he imagined no doubt the Pope's Blessing would be ratified in Heaven, and procure him great Happiness. If we may believe certain Historians, Leo IV. did not only bless the young Prince, but gave him also the ceremony of the Royal Unction (2). But this appears to have no Foundation, unless it is pretended the Pope knew by Revelation, that Affid should one Day come to the Crown, though the youngest of four Brothers. Besides, Affid had not the Title of King till long after, when the Crown was devolved to him by the Death of his three elder Brothers. There are some who, on supposition of this same Unction, maintain that the Pope only anointed him with Chrism, at the ceremony of his Confirmation, which gave occasion for some to imagine that Affid received the Royal Unction before-hand, because he was one Day to ascend the Throne of England (3).

Ethelwulph's great zeal for Religion would not let him be easy, without the satisfaction of paying a visit to the Pope in Person, and receiving his Benediction. As England was then in profound Peace, he resolved upon going to Rome, and accordingly did so in 855 (4). At his arrival, Leo gave him an honourable Reception, and in return met with all the respect and submission that could be expected from so devout a Prince. During his stay at Rome, he diligently visited the Churches, Chapels, Holy Relicks, and every thing capable of feeding his Devotion. The English College, founded by Ina and enlarged by Offa, having been burnt down [the Year before] he caused it to be rebuilt in a more magnificent manner than before, and desiring to endow the College with greater revenues than his Predecessors had done, extended the Tax or Peto-Peto all over his Dominions, which did then had been levied only in Wessex and Mercia. He obliged himself moreover to send to Rome yearly the Sum of three hundred Marks (5) for the Charges of the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the remaining one hundred for the Pope's private use. There are the Liberaries, that gave occasion to certain Historians to assert that Ethelwulph made his Kingdom tributary to the Holy See. But what wrong was never might be made of them in Time, it is certain they were no more originally than canonized Donations to the Church and English College.

Ethelwulph having satisfied his Devotion and Curiosity, by a twelve Months stay at Rome, returned home through France, where he married Judith, the Daughter of Charles the Bald (6), a young Prince of twelve years of Age (7). This marriage as well as unseasonable Match, he having already several Children, was made another pretence for the Danes to begin their Invasions against him in England.

Whilst Ethelwulph was so fixed at Rome in Acts of Devotion, Aelfan Bishop of Sharborn, formerly his Favourite, but since the loss of his Credit, his Enemy, took advantage of his absence to seduce Ethelwulph's eldest Son, by way of Revenge (8). This young Prince, being of an evil Disposition, was already very angry with his Father, for not investing him with the Kingdom of Kent after Ethelwulph's Death; and therefore very readily closed with Aelfan's pernicious Counsel. The Prelate represented to him, that Ethelwulph lived more like a Monk than a King, and by his negligence would, it was to be feared, expose his Kingdom to Danes and Ruin; that since he delighted so much in converting with the Monks, it was fit he should pass the residue of his Days in a Monastery, and leave his Kingdom to a Son, more capable than himself of governing it. The young Prince, burning with desire and impatience, to enjoy the Crown, was shaken with this Discourse. As his Heart was not sound, there was no need of repeating it often in order to gain him. The news of Ethelwulph's Marriage coming just at that very time, put the finishing stroke to the Matter. He thought he had reason to fear that, if there should be any Children by this second Marriage, they would be able to dispute with him the succession to the Crown, by help of the King of France. The considerations moved him to consult with the Nobles how to prevent the King's return, and all that lay in his Power to gain the Nobles and People to the Prince. He therefore, and it was not long before he formed a powerful Party in his Favour. Ethelwulph, informed of these Proceedings, immediately left France, and arrived in England before his Son had taken all necessary measures to hinder his landing. However, Ethelwulph pursued his Design, and openly declared his Intent to extirpate his Father. Aelfan, who had signified his new Wife with the Title of Queen, in consideration of her illustrious Birth, Ethelwulph made use of that pretence to give some colour to his Revolt. He obliged, that by the express terms of the Law made upon the account of Britannia's Murder, the West-Saxons were obliged from their Oath of Allegiance to the King. All things now tended to a Civil War, which could not but prove fatal to England, since besides other Mischief, it would undoubtedly bring on fresh Invasions from the Danes. But some of the wisest of the Nobility of both Parties, foreseeing the Calamities that might ensue, by their mediation endeavoured to bring matters to an Accommodation. Though right and justice were entire, on the King's side, yet he consented to peaceable Measures. But as he was old and easy-natured, and his Son highly threatened! ⁽¹⁾ opposers, the Balance very much inclined to Ethelwald's side. By the Treaty, which was ratified by the Angles, Ethelwald was obliged to resign to his Son the ancient Kingdom of Wessex, and to sit down contented with that of Kent for himself, under which were comprised also Essex and Suffex. Some of his Courtiers advised him not to sign so partial and unequal a Treaty; but he would not hearken to them. He told them, he did not set so high a value on the Dominions allotted to his Son, as to purchase them at the Price of a Civil War; and though it might be in his Power to recover them, yet his death would soon put his Son in Possession again.

ETHELWULPH in Kent. ETHELBALD in Wessex.

ONE would think Ethelwulph foresaw his death was not far off, since he out-lived this Partis en but two years, which he spent in a manner worthy of a Christian Prince, in doing acts of Charity, admitting Justice to his Subjects, and endeavouring, by the force of his Example, to induce them to lead Lives conformable to the Precepts of the Gospel. Ethelwald, on the contrary, depending upon many years to come, thought only of spending his days in licentiousness and debauchery.

The Saxon Annals tell us, that about this time, Edmund, a Youth of fifteen years of Age, was crowned King of East-Angles. He was Son to Almund, a Prince of the Royal Blood, who fled into Germany when Offa seized upon East-Angles. It is not said whether this was done with the consent of Ethelwulph and Ethelwald, or whether taking Advantage of the division between the Father and Son, the East-Angles resolved to have a King of their own. Almund was guided, during his Youth, by the advice of Bishop Humbert, who took care to form him to a virtuous Life, and inculcated into him Sentiments of Justice and Equity, of which his Subjects reaped the benefit. I pass over in silence all the Murders that attended his Birth, and shall speak elsewhere of his tragical end, honoured with the name of Martyrdom.

Ethelwulph, finding death approaching, made his Will ⁽¹⁾, wherein he disposed of his Dominions to Ethelbert his second Son, and after his decease to Ethelred his third Son, and at last to Alfred his youngest. I am not sure whether it was customary then for the Kings to dispose of their Dominions by Will, or whether Ethelwulph was the first that did so. However this be, it is certain Ethelwulph's Sons succeeded one another by virtue of this Will. When he also ordered his Heirs to maintain one poor Person for every Tithing in his Hereditary Lands. He died soon after in 857, having reigned twenty years ⁽²⁾, leaving behind him four Sons and one Daughter, who was married to Buthred King of Mercia, and died at Pavia in 888. Ethelwald, eldest Son of Ethelwulph, being already in possession of the Kingdom of Wessex, Ethelbert his Brother had only for his shares, Kent, Essex, Surrey, and Suffex, comprised under the name of The Kingdom of Kent. As for Ethelred and Alfred, his other Sons, they were at first but in prospect for; but in the end they mounted the Throne also. Besides Ethelwald, spoken of before, some gave Ethelwulph another natural Son called Neat, who was afterwards Professor at Oxford. But I very much doubt whether Neat was his Son. It is more likely he was only his Relation, of the Blood-Royal of Wessex ⁽³⁾.

3. ETHELBALD in Wessex. ETHELBERT in Kent.

ETHELBALD's Reign was remarkable neither for any Event of moment, nor for any Action of his own, worth recording. All Historians agree that he was a Prince of little Merit, and of an evil Disposition. He is said by the English Historians to make no scruple of marrying Judith of France his Father's Widow. But the French Writers mention not this Marriage. They tell us her Marriage with Ethelwulph not being consummated by reason of her Youth, she returned to France, from whence she was carried away by Baldwin Iron-hand Earl of Flanders. Perhaps they knew nothing of her second Marriage, or, it may be, did not think proper to mention it, as reflecting on the Family of Charles the Great. Be this as it will, the English Historians speak of it as certain. And one of them adds ⁽⁴⁾, Ethelwald was brought to a Sense of his Fault, by Stathin Bishop of Winchester, and underwent a severe Penance for it. This Penance, which in all appearance consisted in some Grants or Donations to the Monasteries, made an Historian ⁽⁵⁾ say, his death, which happened in 860, was exceedingly lamented. He had reigned two years in Wessex during his Father's life, and about two years and a half after his decease. Ethelbert his Brother, already in possession of the Kingdom of Kent, succeeding to Wessex, by virtue of their Father's Will re-united the two Kingdoms.

THE Danes, having left England for some years unmolested, immediately after Ethelbert's Coronation renew'd their Invasions (1). As they had not been heard of for some time, they were almost forgot-ten, and consequently no preparations were made to repulse their Attacks. This neglect gave them great Advantages, and helped them to penetrate as far as Winchester, the Metropolis of Wessex, which they reduced to Ashes. They would have proceeded to much greater Mischief, had not Ofric and Ethelwulf, two West-Saxon Earls, with some Troops drawn together in haste, beat them back to their Ships.

Another time they came in Autumn, and landed in the Isle of Thanet, where they winter'd in order to begin their Incurfions in the Spring. Ethelbert, very uneasy at their being so near him, but not knowing how to help it, offer'd them a Sum of Money to go off quietly (2). They accepted of his offer; but when they had finger'd the Money, they rush'd into Kent and destroy'd all (3) with Fire and Sword, Ethelbert not being in condition to be reveng'd of them. However, having learnt by this Treachery, that nothing but Force could free him from his Enemies, he set about levying an Army, to intercept them in their retreat, and prevent them from carrying off their Booty. The dread of these preparations made them embark with their plunder so hastily, that it was not possible to hinder them.

Ethelbert's Reign, which lasted but six years, affords little matter for History. He died in 866 (4), leaving two Sons, Adelm and Ethelward, who did not succeed him, his younger Brother Ethelred ascending the Throne by virtue of Ethelwulf's Will.

5. ETHELRED I.

THE Reign of Ethelred was short and troublesome. From his Coronation to his Death, he had one continued Conflict with the Danes. They began with attacking Northumberland, which at length they became masters of. They proceeded next to East-Anglia, which they also subdued. And after extorting Money from the Mercians, they entered Wessex. Notwithstanding the valour of Ethelred, and the many battles he fought, he had the vexation at his death to leave them in the heart of his Kingdom, and in condition of soon completing the Conquest of the whole. These are the principal Events during this Reign, the most remarkable Circumstances whereof I am going to relate.

The Authority reterv'd by Egbert over the Kingdoms of Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumberland, and enjoy'd also by his Son Ethelwulf, was now much weakened, by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes. Whilst the Kings of Wessex were employed in the defence of their own dominions, it was hardly possible for them to think of improving their Sovereignty over the three Kingdoms of the Angles, to whom Egbert was willing to leave a shadow of Liberty. And therefore, by degrees, the Northumbrians, as most remote from Wessex, had freed themselves from Servitude. The Factions that had long reign'd among them, were grown cooler, and so far agreed at last, as with unanimous consent to place Osbert on the Throne. This happy Union would have restored Northumberland to its ancient splendor, if an unexpected Accident had not revived their Divisions, and plunged the Country into a gulph of remediless Misery. The occasion of these new Troubles, which proved not only destructive of Northumberland, but fatal to all England, was this (5).

Osbert, who kept his Court at York, returning one day from hunting, had a mind to refresh himself at the House of a certain Earl named Bruen-Becard, Guardian of the Coasts against the Irruptions of the Danes. The Earl happening to be from home, his Lady, to whose charming Beauty was joined the most engaging Behaviour, entertain'd her Sovereign with the respect due to his Quality. Osbert, ravish'd at the Sight of so much Beauty, became in an instant desperately in Love with her, and resolv'd, let the Consequence be what it would, to gratify his Passion without delay. Accordingly, on pretence of having some matters of Importance to communicate to her, in the Absence of the Earl, he led her infensibly into a private Room, where after several attempts to bring her to comply by fair means, he fell at length to downright Force. Entreaties, Tears, Cries, Reproaches, were ineffectual to put a stop to his raging Passion. After the commission of this infamous Deed, he left the Countess in that excess of Grief and Vexation, that it was not possible for her to hide the cause from her Husband. So outrageous an Affront is hardly ever forgiven. Though Osbert was King, and Earl Bruen his Subject, he resent'd so highly this Injury, that he resolv'd not to stick at any means to be revenged. He had a great Interest with the Northumbrians, and the late Action of Osbert was naturally apt to alienate the minds of his Subjects from him. Accordingly, by the management of the Earl, the Bernicians in a little time revolted, and looking upon Osbert as unworthy to govern them, elected another King named Ella, whom they plac'd on the Throne, with a Resolution to support him in it. Thus the old Divisions, which seem'd to be quite extinguish'd, were kindled afresh; and Northumberland once more divided between two Kings and two Factions, who continually aiming at each others Destruction, were but too successful in their Endeavours.

A Civil War was the fatal consequence of this discord. The two Kings frequently strove to decide their Quarrel by Arms; but the equality of their Forces preventing the scale from inclining to either side, they both maintained themselves in the Throne. The injur'd Earl, one would think, should have been satisfy'd with Osbert's losing half his Dominions. But his revenge seem'd to him incomplete, whilst he saw him on the Throne of Deira. Mean while, deeming it very difficult to carry it any farther, without a foreign Aid, he fatally resolv'd to go and procure the Assistance of the Danes. This was not the first time the like Injury had produced the like Effect. Spain, under the Dominion of the Moors, felt at that very time the mischiefs an affair of this nature had occasioned. As soon as the Earl arriv'd in Denmark, he immediately applied to King Ivar [or Hingwar] (6), and giving him a particular Account of the distracted State of Northumberland, intimating to him, that if he would improve the present Juncture, he might with ease become Master of the Kingdom. Ivar very readily came into an Enterprize, to which he was prompted by the desire of Revenge as well as Ambition. Ragnar's Father having been taken Prisoner in England, was thrown into a Ditch full of Serpents, where he miserably perish'd. So barbarous a treatment having inspir'd Ivar with a furious hatred against the English, he embark'd, without hesitation, the present opportunity of being revenged.

(5) The Rapin, as the most probable Opinion, makes Osbert's ravishing Earl Bruen's Lady the occasion of the Danes coming to Northumberland, there's no man there that is given at that, and the barbarous Murder of Edmund. The Story goes, that Lodbrock, King of Denmark, going a Hunting in a Bait, was driven out of the sea by a Storm, and call upon the English Coast near Yarmouth. He was land'd and brought to Edmund's Court, then King of East-Anglia, who finding him a great Sportsman, was pleas'd with his Company. Bern, the King's Falconer, perceiving himself outdone in his own Borders by this Stranger, drew him into a Wood, on pretence of shewing him Game, and barbarously murder'd him. Lodbrock's Dog, almost starv'd, comes to the Palace, and being fed, goes away again. The Dog doing this several times, made the King's Servants follow him, and thus were brought to a Sight of the Corpse. Bern was tried for the Murder, and being found guilty, was condemn'd to be put into Lodbrock's Boat, and committed to the Mercy of the Sea, without Tackling or Provision. He was then cast into the sea, and was carried to the Danish Shore. The Boat being known, Bern was apprehended and examined about Ethelbert. He said then, that being cast on the Coast of East-Anglia, he was put to death by King Edmund's Order. Upon which, Ivar and Hingwar, Lodbrock's Sons, had a great Revenge, with a numerous Army, set out for'd by bad Weather into Northumberland. Breton. M. W. G. says only say, that they drew him upon account of the death of Osbert, and so they landed up in defence of the Country. p. 24.

(6) Petrus, in his History of Denmark, places not Ivar among the Kings of that Country: But Malinb. asserts, that this Prince was crown'd in 836, when he was not in his Childhood with the English Historians. Rap.

With this View he concerted with Earl Bruen all necessary Measures to put their Design in Execution. In the Spring he entered the Humber with a numerous Fleet, which spread a Terror over all England. He was conducted by Bruen, and attended by his Brother Hubba, the most valiant Person of his Time. As the Northumbrians had received no Intelligence of this Invasion, they were in no readiness to dispute his landing. So Ivar without any Difficulty became Master of the northern Side of the Humber (1). From whence he marched directly (2) to York, where Osbert was preparing an Army to oppose him.

In this great Extremity, Osbert applied to Ella, though his Enemy, for Assistance. Ella, conscious of his cruel Treatment of Ivar's Father, and dreading the Son's Revenge, very willingly agreed to suspend their private Quarrel, and join their Forces against the common Enemy. Accordingly, he proceeded with all possible Expedition to bring him a powerful Reinforcement. If Osbert could have resolved to stay in York till Ella's Arrival, who was upon the March, he would doubtless have embarrassed the King of Denmark, who by that means would have been forced to oppose the Enemy in two Places at once. But his great Courage would not suffer him to take so good a Resolution. Perhaps it was with Regret that he saw himself constrained to have Recourse to his Enemy, or it may be, was afraid of some Treachery. However this be, without expecting Ella's Approach, he sallied out of York, and attacked the Danes so vigorously, that they could hardly stand the Shock, and were very near being put in Disorder. But their obstinate Resistance having at length cooled the Ardour of their Enemies, they pressed them in their Turn, and compelled them at last to retire in confusion into the Town (3). Osbert, enraged to see a certain Victory, as he thought, snatched out of his Hands, used his utmost Endeavours to rally his Troops, but was slain in the Retreat with abundance of his Men.

This Victory having open'd the Gates of York to the Danes, they entered the Town to refresh themselves, whilst Ella was advancing in Hopes to repair the Loss occasioned by Osbert's Precipitation. Ivar having just triumphed over one of the Kings, and not believing the other to be more formidable, saved him some Trouble, by going to meet him. This Battle was no less bloody than the first, nor less fatal to the English. Ella lost his Life, and his Army was entirely routed. Some say, this Prince was not slain in the Battle; but being taken Prisoner, Ivar ordered him to be dead alive, in Revenge for his Father's Death. The Field of Battle was call'd Ellsgræf, that is, Ella's Overthrow.

After these two signal Victories, Ivar, without any Difficulty, took Possession of all Northumberland. But this not satisfying his Ambition, he marched into Mercia, plundering and ravaging, without Mercy, whatever came in his way. Buthred King of Mercia, having had time to prepare, had called to his Assistance Ethelred's Brother-in-Law, who was come to join him with all the Forces of Wessex. Ivar was now advanced as far as Nottingham (4), in Expectation to surprise the King of Mercia; but when he was informed Ethelred had joined him, he stopp'd short, surpris'd himself to find his Forces inferior to those of the English Princes. The two Armies stood near one another for some time, expecting every Moment to engage. But the Confluence of a Battle, which, in all Appearance, would determine the Fate of both Sides, kept them in Suspence. At last, having faced one another a good while, they parted without Fighting. Buthred chose rather to bribe the Enemy to retire, than hazard a Battle, the Success whereof was doubtful. Besides, he was sensible there was nothing to be got by the Danes, tho' Fortune favoured him, whereas his all was at Stake in case of a Defeat (5).

Ivar, from the time he arrived in England, had cruelly ravaged all the Places wherever he came, particularly the Monasteries, where the English endeavour'd to conceal their most valuable Effects. It may easily be conceived, the idolatrous Danes had no great Regard for the Nuns, and that Multitudes of them were exposed to their brutal Lust. We have a remarkable Story upon this Subject: The Abbess of Coldingham (6), upon the Approach of the Danish Army, prevailed with her Nuns, to cut off their Noses and Upper-Lips, in order to screen themselves from the Outrages they were threatened with. This notable Expedient, it is true, preserved their Honor, but cost them their Lives. The Soldiers beholding contrary to their Expectations, such monstrous Viages, set fire to the Monastery, causing them in the Flames to complete the Sacrifice of their Persons, which they had already begun offering to God.

Ivar not having all the Success he expected in Mercia, turned his Arms another Way, where in all likelihood he should meet with less Opposition. He left Hubba his Brother in Northumberland, and embarking with the Flower of his Troops, made a Descent on East-Anglia (7), where Edmund was King, of whom I have already spoken. This young Prince, more used to Acts of Devotion, than to the Exercise of Arms, having given the Danes Battle, was easily overthrown and compelled to save himself by Flight. He thought of concealing himself in a Church, but being discovered, was brought before Ivar at Hagilston (8). The Conqueror offered to leave him in Possession of his Kingdom, provided he would acknowledge him for Sovereign, and pay him Tribute. Edmund refusing these Terms, Ivar ordered him to be tied to a Tree, and shot at with Arrows, and then to have his Head cut off. Humbert, Bishop of the East-Angles, was also put to Death by Ivar's Order. Edmund's Head being found some time after, was interred with his Body at St. Edmund's-Bury, so called from him. Whilst the Roman Catholic Religion flourished in England, great Numbers of Miracles were pretended to be wrought at his Tomb. I do not know by what Accident his Corps came to be at Toulouse, where it is said to be discovered in 1667.

Ivar being thus Master of East-Anglia, appointed a Danish Captain, one Gedrim or Gothburn, Governor of it. Afterwards, having recalled his Brother Hubba from Northumberland, to be near his Person, he made Egbert, by Birth an Englishman, but entirely at his Devotion, King of that Kingdom.

The good Success the Danes had met with, during this War, inspiring them with Hopes of becoming Masters of all England, they began to form new Projects. Ivar (9), having perfect Information of the State of the Island, found he must begin with Wessex, in order to accomplish his Designs. He was in Hopes, could he once subdue that Kingdom, the rest would follow of Course. On the other hand, he was sensible that all his Conquests elsewhere would be unsecure, as long as the King of Wessex was in condition to assist his Neighbours. These Considerations having determined him to attack Ethelred, he embark'd his Troops and sail'd for the Coast of Wessex, where landing his Army, he advanc'd as far as Reading. Ethelred, who had foreseen his Design, marched his Army towards that Quarter, accompanied by Alfred his Brother. It would be tedious, and perhaps impracticable, to relate the Particulars of this War (10). It is sufficient to say in few Words, that within the Compass of one Year, Ethelred fought nine pitched Battles, and upon all Occasions gave signal Proofs of his Courage and Conduct, tho' Fortune did not always prove favourable. In the last Battle, which was fought near Wittingham, he received a mortal Wound, whereof he died in 872 (1), after a Reign of five Years (2).

In the Spring of the Year 866, the Danish Army putting out to Sea, land'd at Hornsey, and destroyed the whole Country, and Burton Monastery in particular, killing every one of the Munkes there, about 11, hundred, they pass'd into Essex, and there destroyed every thing that came in their way. About a Year after, Eth. Affr. and some others, assembled an Army, and coming to an Engagement with the Heathens, despoil'd them, and slew three of their Kings (or Chieftains) but Alger himself was soon after slain. Whereupon the Danes continued their Ravages, and plundered and burnt the Monasteries of Croyland, Evesham, and Ely; killing every Person they met on the Road. From thence passing into East-Anglia, they cut off, with all his Forces, Earl Ulfkint, who was come out against them, and taking possession of that Kingdom, wintered there. Ingulph. p. 14—24. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. Four Days after, there was another Fight at Reading, in which Ethelred and Alfred were overcome. But, four Days after, they defeated the Danes at Alford near Wallingford; and Alfred, the two Sons, and several thousands of Danes were then slain. A foreigner after, the English were beat at Bosham in Essex, and again two Months after, at Marden in Wiltshire, in which last Battle, Ethelred received his Death's Wound. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 349. Spelman's life of Alfred. p. 42.

After the Battle of Bosham, there came a fresh Army of Danes from beyond Sea, and joined those that were already in England. Affr. vit. Affr. p. 7.

Ethelred seems not to be entirely free from blame, for suffering the Danes to over-run Northumberland and East-Anglia without endeavouring to stop their Progress. But probably this Prince, surpris'd at the Defeat of the two Kings of Northumberland, and the swift Progress of Ivar's Arms, did not think himself in condition to repair the Misfortunes caused by the Diffentions of the Northumbrians. Besides, he did not care, doubtless, to expose in the Defence of Northumberland and East-Anglia, the Forces he foresaw he should want for the Preservation of his own Kingdom. It may farther be said in his Justification, that the Terror, spread over all England, put it out of his Power perhaps, to dispose of his Army as he could have wished. This Terror was so great, that it was no easy matter to prevail with the English to march against formidable Enemies, till compell'd to it in their own necessary Defence.

Tho' Ethelred was noted for his great Bravery, yet his Piety is said to surpass even his Valour. An Historian tells us, that being at Prayers on a Day of Battle, he resolved not to move till the Service was over, tho' the Fight was begun, and the Danes had some Advantage. He adds, God rewarded his Piety with a signal Victory that Day.

Ethelred left several Children, of whom Alfred, the great Grandfather of Edward the Historian, was one. Some say also he had a Daughter called Thyra, married to Tyrtus VI. King of Denmark. Ethelred's Sons were depriv'd of the Crown for the same reason the Sons of his elder Brother Ethelbert were set aside, I mean, Ethelwulf's Will. After his Death, Alfred his Brother was plac'd on the Throne without any one's questioning his Title.

During Ethelred's Reign, the Danes demolished the famous Monasteries of Creynland, Ely, Peterborough, or Medeshamsted, besides that of Coldingham before mention'd. It is chiefly on the Description of what befel the Abbies that Sax. Ann. Historians have enlarged, whilst doubtless, they omitted Events more remarkable, and more worthy the Notice of a curious Reader.

ALFRED
the Great.

ALFRED was no less infested with the Danes than his Predecessor. This Prince, as well as his Brother Ethelred, had frequent Occasion of exercising his Valour, Firmness, and all the other Virtues Heaven had adorn'd him with. Their Fortune however was different; as Ethelred was never reduc'd to so deplorable a Condition as Alfred, so on the other Hand, he was never rais'd to that height of Glory. Divine Providence seems to have shown in the Person of Alfred, with what ease God casts down and sets up Princes, according to his good Pleasure. This is what I am going to show in the Life of Alfred, taking for my principal Guide a celebrated Historian, who has given an exact account of his Actions.

The State of
870.

Ethelred had left the Affairs of his Kingdom in a deplorable Condition. The Danes, already Masters of Northumberland and East-Anglia, were in the very Heart of the Kingdom of Wessex. Notwithstanding the many Battles Ethelred had given them, they were in Possession of several Towns, and not only kept their footing in the Country, but had Reason to hope they should soon go thro' with the Conquest of it. Alfred had scarce been a Month on the Throne (4), when he found himself oblig'd to take the Field (5) against these formidable Enemies, who were advanc'd as far as Hilston (6).

Alfred.

Thither it was that he march'd to attack them the first Time, after his Brother's death (7). He flatter'd himself for some Time that Victory would incline to his Side; but the Scene changing on a sudden in Favour of the Danes, he was forced at length to leave them Masters of the Field of Battle. However, his Loss was not so considerable, as to make him despair of being revenged. As the Danes had also lost abundance of Men, he labour'd incessantly to put his Army in condition to give them Battle again, before they should be reinforc'd. They were assist'd at his Expedition, and tho' victorious, sued for Peace, finding they were unable to continue the War. How much sorer Alfred confid'd in his Troops, who appear'd eager to engage, he thought proper to embrace the present Opportunity of getting rid of his Enemies, without hazarding a second Battle. As they offer'd to march out of his Dominions, on Condition he would molest them in no other part of England, he gladly accepted their Offer, looking upon it as very advantageous, in his present Circumstances. And indeed, this Treaty gave him time to prepare against a fresh Invasion, which he had all the reason in the World to expect. But had he been bent upon engaging again and lost the Day, his whole Kingdom would infallibly have fallen into the Hands of his Enemies.

The Danes quitting Wessex retired to London (8), which they had taken during the late War. Ivar was gone back to Denmark having left the Command of the Army to his Brother Hubba, who being tied up from attacking Wessex, turn'd his Arms against Mercia. Buthred knowing Hubba was unable to resist, since Alfred was bound not to send him any Succours (9), thought it his wisest course to buy off the Danes with a Sum of Money, and save his Country from their Depredations. Upon the Receipt of the Money, they march'd towards Northumberland, designing to take up their Quarters with their Countrymen. But Provisions running short, by Reason of the Devastations themselves had made there, they were under a sort of Necessity to return into Mercia (10). Before they left Northumberland, they deposted Egbert whom they had plac'd on the Throne, and put Ricgga, a Danish Earl, in his Room (11). Buthred finding they were come again into his Dominions, complain'd of their Breach of Faith; but without minding his Complaints, they oblig'd him to give them another considerable Sum to save his Country from the Destruction it was threatn'd with. But no sooner was the Money paid, but they fell to plundering and ravaging, and let Buthred know that even his own Person was in Danger. The Fear of falling into their Hands, oblig'd him to abandon his Kingdom, and retire to Rome, where he spent the residue of his Days in the English College. Mercia being thus left without a King, and Alfred under an Obligation to send no Assistance, the Danes without Difficulty became Masters of that spacious Kingdom. However, not to frighten the Mercians too much, they set over them for King, Ceolulf one of Buthred's Domesticks. Tho' the new King was an Englishman, yet holding the Kingdom in Trust only, till his Masters should otherwise dispose of it, he resolv'd to make use of his Time to fill his Coffers: So that the Mercians suffer'd as much by the continual Rapines and Extortion of their Countryman, as they would perhaps have done by the Hands of a Foreigner.

Tho' the Danes were Masters of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland, they were not yet contented. They could not forbear looking upon Wessex, which contain'd the other four Kingdoms, with a greedy Eye. But as they had always met there with Princes that disput'd every Inch of Ground with them, they were fain to make an Alliance with Affred till a favorable Opportunity presented itself of executing their Designs upon the Kingdom. Mean while, they fell to manuring their Lands, began to consider the Country, they had so often and so terribly laid waste, as their own England being thus divided between the English and Danes, Peace and Tranquillity seemed to be going at last to be restored. The Danes appear'd satisfied with their Lot, and Affred thought himself happy in the Preservation of his paternal Dominions, But the Calamities England was afflicted with, were far from being at an End.

Whilſt Afred batter'd himſelf with the Enjoyment of some Quiet, new Troubles were preparing for him in Den- mark. Halfden, a Daniſh General, had fitted out a Fleet, with which he came and made a Deſcent on Eaſt Ang- lia (1). The Seaſon being far advanced, he lay till all the Winter, expecting the Spring in order to invade Wefſex.
The Arrival of Halfden with freſh Daniſh Troops, ought to have put Afred upon his Guard, ſince it was but too plain they were deſigned againſt him. However, truſting to the Treaty he had lately made with the Danes, he remained unconcern'd, of which Halfden did not fail to take the Advantage. In the Beginning of the Spring, he put to Sea, and went and took by Surprize Warham-Caſtle (2), the ſtrongeſt Place in all Wefſex. The Engliſh hitherto ſeemed not to know what fort of Enemies they had to deal with. They confider'd the Daniſh Irruptions as a regular War, wherein the whole Nation was concern'd. Accordingly, they imagin'd that a Treaty concluded with one Band or Party was obligatory to all the reſt. But the Danes had other Thoughts of theſe Matters. They en-ter'd, with the Conſent of their Kings, into private Aſſer- tations to man out Fleets and go ſhares in what Booty they could get in England and other Countries. For this reaſon, the ſeveral Bands were independent of one another, each thinking themſelves bound by no other Treaty but what they enter'd into themſelves. Afred had made an Agreement with Huſſa; but Halfden did not look upon himſelf as included in it. However, the Engliſh conſidering the Surprize of Warham as a real Treachery, call'd Heaven and Earth to witneſs the Violation of the Treaty. But Half- den, regardless of their Complaints, was about to penetrate farther into Wefſex, had not Afred prevented him by entering into a particular Treaty with him (3). The Author of his Life ſays, the Danes ſwore by the Holy Relicks of the Church, that they would never let Foot again in Wefſex (4). In all Appearance it coſt the King dear to bring them to theſe Terms. It is ſomething ſtrange that Afred ſhould inſiſt upon Mens ſwearing by the Holy Re- licks, who being yet Pagans, could not think themſelves more ſtrongly bound by this, than their uſual Oath, by their Bracelets. Perhaps his Reaſon was, that in caſe they ſhould break their Oath, he thought Heaven would the more aſſuredly puniſh them for it. However this be, they made no more Conſcience of this, than of their former Oaths; but broke it even before they were out of of Wefſex. As they were marching towards Mercia, they met a Body of Engliſh Horſe, who were riding in a careleſs Manner, by reaſon of the Treaty's being concluded, and unexpectedly ſetting upon them, ſlew the greateſt Part of them (5). The Horſes they took upon this Occaſion were of Service to carry them with the more ſpeed towards the Western Parts of Wefſex, where they laid Siege to Exeter (6).

Alfred finding it ~~was~~ in vain to conclude Treaties with such perfidious People, resolv'd to take more effectual Measures to secure himself from their Treachery. To this Purpose, he convened a General Assembly, and in a pathetick Speech plainly shew'd them, they had nothing to trust to but their Valour and Courage to deliver them from their Miseries; that upon so urgent an Occasion there was a Necessity of venturing their Lives in defence of their Country, and of sacrificing Part of their Estates to preserve the rest; in fine, that a generous Resolution was the only Means left to avoid the Calamities their Neighbours were fallen under. These Remonstrances having produced the Effect he expected, an Army was levied, with which he engaged the Enemy seven times in one Campaign. But as Fortune was not equally favorable to him in all these Engagements, he was once more constrained to treat with the Danes. Though he could have no great Dependence upon their Promises, it was the best Way he could take to put an End to this dangerous War. The new Treaty, by which the Danes were obliged to return no more into Wessex, was better kept than the former.

The Welf Saxons looked upon the Retreat of these formidable Enemies as a great Deliverance. But they were not yet at the End of their Miseries. This Band, that had struck them with such Terror, were scarce gone, when a new Swarm arrived under the Command of Rello, the famous Norman General, that became afterwards the Scourge of France. By good Fortune, Alfred was prepared to receive them. After some Attempts, Rello despairing of procuring a Settlement in England, relolved to go in quest of one in France. In all Probability, finding the best Part of England in Possession of his Countrymen, and Alfred ready to dispute the rest with him, he imagined he had a better Prospect in France. Some affirm, it was revealed to him in a Dream what great Success he should meet with on the other Side of the Water.

After Rollo's Departure, Alydred enjoyed some Repose, which afforded him Leisure to think of Means to prevent these frequent Invasions. He found it better to reader Way than to equip a good Fleet, and engage the Enemy before they came to Land, where they generally had the Advantage. As hitherto, the engaging near Sea had not been thought of, their Ships were only fit for Transport, whereas those, now built by Alydred, were contriv'd on purpose for Servise. It was not long before he reap'd the Fruit of this wise Precaution. His Fleet meeting with six (?) Danish Vessels, gave Chase to them, and one of the largest being taken, the Soldiers and Mariners were thrown over-board. This first Engagement was followed by a much more considerable one. An hundred and twenty Sail of Danish transport Ships making to the Shore in order to land their Men, the King's Fleet attacked them, and sunk the greatest Part of them. The next Year another Danish Fleet sailing Westward, met with so violent a Storm, that all the Ships perished, except a few which fell into the Hands of the English.

Alfred encouraged by these Successes, resolved to attack the Danes in the Wesf, where they had fortified themselves by the taking of Exeter. Besides, the Corinsh M had all along sided with them. He executed this Resolution with that Courage and Success, that in the End he obliged the Danes to give him Hofages, and entirely abandoned Wesfex. They retired into Mercia (8), where being weary with leading such unsettled Lives, they were incorporated with their Countrymen, who were in Possession of that Kingdom. After that, they depofed, with one Consent, Cestulph, and divided the Land among themselves (9). What kind of Government they established we know not; but the English Historians, paſſing over in Silence the Civil Affairs of the Danes, relate only their Wars. Thus an end was put to the Kingdom of Mercia; after having subsisted near three hundred Years.

The Year before (10), the Kingdom of Northumberland had met with the same Fate. Halfden, who was gone this year made Egbert King in the Room of Ricgfe, who died in 876. The new King or Vice-Roy was of no longer Continuance. In the first Year of his Reign, Halfden dethroned him, and divided the Land among his Countrymen : Which no doubt gave occasion to the Danes in Mercia to do the same Thing. Thus the Kingdom of Northumberland, which had lasted three hundred and thirty Years from the Time of Ida the first King, was canted out among the Danish Offenders. It proved a very difficult Matter to drive them thence, as will be seen here after.

Though the Danus were in Possession of three of the ancient Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, yet was there not room enough for all those that were already in England, and for those which were continually coming over with intent to settle. The New-comers beheld Wessex with a nation, press'd them so briskly, that they were soon brought to capitulate (1). The Terms he granted them were more advantageous than they had room to expect in their Circumstances (2). He artick'd to give up the Lands of Egft-Angla to those that were willing to turn Christians, but required the rest immediately to quit the Island, never more to set foot in England, and to give Hostage for the Performance of Articles. Guthrum, Governor of Egft-Angla, who, since the Death of Hubba, commanded the Danish Army, agreed to these Conditions, and came to Alfred, with thirty of his chief Officers, having shipp'd off all those that refused to be baptiz'd (3).

On the contrary they affirm, That Ann 876, the Danes left Repton, and dividing themselves into two Bands, one part went along with Helfin, to Northumberland, and wintered there Ann 878, Tiwelc killed Edm. King, Northfolc, i. e. the Inhabitants of G' Wessex; and Helfin making himself Master of Northumberland, invited it amongst his Followers, who began to cultivate the Soil. The other Body of Danes, with two or three German Counts, Ogylf, and Awel, went and wintered at Cambridge, where they staid about a twelfth Month, the next Year went out publicly from Canterbury, and took Warham Castle; without any mention of Helfin's being concerned in that Expedition. See the Sax. Ann. Huntingp. p. 349. S. Doctw. What Reason lays here in Helfin, Huntington relates it of Helfin's Brother, p. 350.

This great Victory set Alfred at the height of his Wishes. He had, by one single Battle, driven out the Danes, and recovered his Kingdom, and saw every Day his Subjects flock to him, whom Fear had dispers'd or constrain'd to submit to the Enemy. He gave Guthrum and his Officers a very civil Reception, and kept his Word faithfully with them. All the Historians agree, that he invest'd the Danish General with the Title of King of Egft-Angla (4). But it is not known whether he did this by virtue of some private Treaty made before with him, or designed by it to gain his Affection to that Degree that he might entirely come in him. However this be, it is certain Guthrum held, with the Title of King, the Kingdom of Egft-Angla, which was wholly inhabited by Danes, and whereof Isar had made him Governor. He divided the Lands among his Countrymen, and exercised the Regal Authority, as long as he lived. Some, particularly Affric, add, that Alfred gave Guthrum the Kingdom of Northumberland also. But this is very improbable, since the Danes had long been Masters of Northumberland, and had shared the Lands among themselves (5). The Case was not the same with respect to Egft-Angla, where the Danes had no fixed Abode, and which was still consider'd as part of the English Monarchy, tho' the Danes were most powerful there. So that Alfred did nothing more than confirm them in the Possession of that Kingdom, by granting them a King of their own Nation, who was to be his Vassal (6).

In all that has hitherto been said, it may be observ'd that at the time of the last Battle there were in England two sorts of Danes, those that were already settled, and those that were endeavouring to procure themselves Habitations. With these last it was properly that Alfred treated. As for the others, having seen their Brethren so roughly handled, they thought themselves happy in the Enjoyment of their Possessions. As the Event was uncertain, they chose rather to sit down contented and acknowledge Alfred for their Sovereign, than run the risk of losing their all, by continuing the War. Accordingly the Danes, settled in the three Kingdoms of the Angles, submitted to Alfred, and swore Allegiance to him. It was however next to impossible that all should be equally satisfied with their Lot. Several accepted of the Terms of the last Treaty only because they knew not where to go, having elsewhere neither House nor Home. If they seem'd desirous to turn Christians, it was to procure a Subsistence, in expectation of a favourable Opportunity to return to their old course of Life. That this was the Case, evidently appear'd from what followed. When it was least expected, the most considerable among them, headed by one Hastings, earnestly solicited Guthrum to renew the War in Wessex (7); but not prevailing (8), they put to Sea, and went and ravaged the Coasts of Flanders. Shortly after, another and no less numerous Troop, inform'd of the great Booty the first Ravagers had met with at Gant, shipp'd off to join them. These two Bands thus united, over-ran Brabant, Hainault, Flanders, Picardy, and Artois, acting unheeded of Cruelties. After which, being again divided into two Bodies, one of them sailed back for England, in hopes of plundering the Country, where they imagin'd they should come unexpected. Having landed in Kent, they march'd towards Rocheſter, with design to surprize the City. But Alfred, who contrary to their Expectation had his Army in a readiness, speedily marching that way upon the first Notice of their Arrival, his Approach made them fly to their Ships in such haste, that they left their Plunder behind them (9). The Vigilance of this Prince having prevented the Designs upon England, they returned to France, and rejoining their Companions, continued their Devastations in that Kingdom.

Hitherto the English had been only upon the Defensive. Exposed to the continual Invasions of the Danes, and uncertain where the Enemy would land, they were generally surpris'd, before it was in their power to defend themselves. The Sea-Coast remaining uninhabited, there was nothing to hinder these Rovers from landing where they pleas'd. Alfred being in Peace, which he had never enjoy'd till now, resolv'd to put his Affairs in better order. His first Care was to equip a considerable Fleet, the Advantage of which he had already experienc'd. As soon as his Fleet was in condition to sail, the Admiral had Orders to cruise along the Coasts, and attack all the Danish Ships in what place soever it should meet them. He surpris'd sixteen in the Port of Norwich (10) in Egft-Angla, of which taking some and sinking the rest, he brought off a considerable Booty (11). Guthrum incens'd at this Act of Hostility in one of his Harbours, and as it were under his Nose, suffer'd the Parties concern'd to endeavour to retrieve their Losses, and even furnish'd them with means. It was not long before they found an Opportunity of attacking in the Night the King's Ships (12), and had some Advantage over them. However, the Fleet kept the Rovers in awe, and freed England from their Ravages.

Alfred having thus secur'd the Sea-Coasts, diligently set about fortifying the rest of the Kingdom with Castles and walled Towns, which he stood in great need of. He repaired those that were gone to ruin (13), and built others in so strong a manner, that they could not easily be assaulted. In a Word, there was not a Post, or Fort, capable of being fortified, but what was defended by some Works, to prevent the sudden Incursions of the Danes. But however, he could not be entirely guarded against them, without one important Place, the Possession whereof would be of great Consequence to him in all Respects. This was the City of London, considerable both for Largeness and Situation, and which being in the Hands of the Danes, would give them a free Passage into Wessex, whenever they had a mind to invade his Dominions. This Consideration made him resolve to invest it, knowing the Garrison to be weak and unable to stand a long Siege. Accordingly, the besieged were in a little time forced to capitulate. He was oblig'd no sooner Master of this great City, but he very much addid both to its Strength and Beauty (14). He committed the Government of it to Ethelred, who had married his Daughter Ethelreda, or rather gave it him in Fee, with the Title of Earl of Mercia (15). Some will have it, he conferred on him the Title of King; but I doubt they have no ground for what they advance. By creating Ethelred Earl of Mercia, he did not invest him with Power over any part of Mercia, but only over London. All the rest of Mercia was in Possession of the Danes, over whom he assert'd no other Right but that of Sovereignty, to which they had lately consented. Ethelred therefore was honour'd with an empty Title, till such time, as by his Valour he became Master of good part of that Province.

The great number of Towns repaired and fortified by Alfred, found him Employment some Years. These Fortifications serv'd equally to defend the Kingdom against the foreign Danes, and to keep those in awe that were settled in the Island; who seeing all the Precautions taken by this wife Prince, were much more disposed to remain in Submission. They even permitted several of the English, whom they had driven from their Habitations, to return and live among them under the King's Protection (1).

Then it was that Alfred had the Satisfaction to see Peace and Tranquillity restored, after so many Years of Troubles. This happy Calm lasted twelve Years (2), during which this Monarch had Leisure to rectify the Disorders introduced by so long a War both in Church and State. As I design hereafter to give a particular Account of the Regulations made by this Prince during the Peace, I shall pass over these twelve Years, and finish the Relation of his Wars. It suffices at present to say, that in this Interval he laid out his constant Endeavours in procuring the Good and Benefit of his Subjects, till he was interrupted by fresh Invasions, of which I am now going to speak.

893. The Danes, who under the Conduct of Hastings, ravag'd for twelve or thirteen Years together France and the Low-Countries, were not satisfied with the prodigious Booty they had gained. According to the Custom of Pyrates, as they prodigally squandered away what they had acquired without Pains or Labour, they were always under a Necessity of renewing their Ravages in order to have wherewithal to subsist. However, disheartened by two terrible Checks given them by Eudes and Arnoul Kings of France and Germany, they resolved to return into England, not so much for the sake of settling there, as plundering the Island. To that purpose, they fitted out three hundred Ships, which they divided into two Fleets. With the first, consisting of two hundred Sail (3), they arrived on the Coast of Kent (4), and took Appledore (5). This Place, which was then very considerable, made them Masters not only of that Province, but also of Suffex and Surry. The other Fleet commanded by Hastings (6), entered the Thames and landed at Middeletun (7). It would be difficult to describe the Miseries inflicted on the Inhabitants of these unfortunate Provinces by the Barbarians. But when we consider, they were idolatrous Rovers and Pyrates, we shall easily conceive they made no Scruple of committing the most enormous Crimes. Alfred was then in East-Anglia, on account of Guthrum's Death (8). As he had received no Intelligence of their Designs, he had made no Preparations for his Defence. All he could do for the present was to take a new Oath of Fidelity from the East-Anglian Danes, which they regarded only whilst he stayed with them. After his Departure, being no longer restrained by his Presence, they went and joined Hastings, in order to go shares in the Plunder. Alfred, amidst all these Dangers was not however discouraged. He drew together what Troops he could, and marched against the Danes who were pillaging Kent. But being informed by the way, that another Body of Danes had entered Wessex, he altered his Course, and advanced towards these last, as judging them most dangerous. The Danes, who were now before Exeter, hastily raised the Siege, and went and vented their Fury in some other Place.

It is impossible to give the Particulars of this War, so confusedly are they related by the Historians. The Reason no doubt was, because there were several Bands of Danes ravaging England, one in Kent, and another in Wessex, and roving continually from place to place. This is what the English Historians could not have a very distinct Knowledge of, since a War undertaken solely for Plunder, must needs be very irregular. Accordingly we find in their Histories, the same Leaders, sometimes in one Province, sometimes in another, without being able to perceive when or how they got thither.

We are ignorant also by what fortunate Accident Alfred saw himself freed on a sudden from his cruel Enemies, who were spread over his whole Kingdom. Thus much however is certain, after they had reduced England to a deplorable State, the last Corners retired, though Historians have not been pleased to tell us the Cause of their Retreat. I am apt to believe their sudden Departure was owing to the Plague, which raged then in England, and swept away great Numbers of Danes as well as English. To this may be added, that they having plundered the Country in such a manner, that there was nothing left to pillage. The greatest part of these Danish Rovers returned to Denmark, under the Command of Hastings; but they did not stay there long. Presently after, Hastings had new Projects on Foot. The Terror he had every where spread along the Sea-Coast, having put all upon their Guard, he resolved to steer his Course where he was not expected, and sailed for the Mediterranean. Whilst there, he found means, by an impious and perfidious Stratagem, to become Master of Luna, situated on the Coast of Tyrrany. He pretended to be mighty desirous of turning Christian, and was actually baptized by the Bishop, whom he had sent for. Some Days after, the Bishop was told, his new Convert was departed this Life, and died like a good Christian, earnestly desiring to be buried in the Church of Luna, to which he had bequeathed a considerable Legacy. By this Device, a great Number of Danes, on pretence of attending the Corps, entered the City, and immediately fell to murdering and plundering the Inhabitants.

Hastings, after so much Mischief done to England, France, and the Low-Countries, chose at length for his Retreat the City of Chartres (9), which Charls, the Son of Charles, presented him with, on purpose to keep him quiet. Here it was he ended in Peace, a Life, almost wholly spent in plundering the maritime Countries of Europe. The Danes, that refused to follow him when he left England, put themselves under the Command of one Sigfrid settled in Northumberland. For some time, these likewise committed Ravages on the Coast of Wessex (10), without venturing however to advance into the Country, by reason of their small Number, and at last they retired to seek their Fortune elsewhere.

Alfred, being at length freed from his Enemies, passed the rest of his Days in profound Tranquillity. Hitherto I have considered this Prince as a Warrior only, sometimes victorious and sometimes vanquished, but, whether prosperous or unfortunate, shewing on all Occasions signal Marks of Valour and military Conduct (11). It is now time to display his other Virtues, and set him in another Light. Henceforward he is to appear as a just, learned, and religious Prince, a Lover of his Subjects, and an indefatigable Promoter of Arts, Sciences, Justice and Religion. But, not to confound his Political with his Moral Virtues, I shall begin with what he did for the Good of his People, as Sovereign, and then speak of his private Life, and Manner of regulating his domestic Affairs.

As soon as the Danes settled in England found they were deprived of the Assistance of their Countrymen, they bethought themselves how to secure their present Possessions. The Continuation of the War was so far from being likely to increase their Advantages, that they had reason to fear they should by that means lose what they already possessed. But supposing they were able to maintain their Ground by Force of Arms, yet a War, which obliged them to have always their Swords drawn, and prevented them from manuring their Lands, could not but be very prejudicial to them. These Considerations induced them at length to submit to the Dominion of Alfred, and acknowledge him for Sovereign of all England. Historians do not inform us whether he was obliged to use Force to bring them to this: But it is certain, his Authority was acknowledged, as well in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, as in Wessex (12). The Welsh themselves, who had been terribly plundered by the Danes, finding they were in no Condition to resist, became his Tributaries (13). It is further added, the King of Scotland paid him Homage also. But this is too disputable a Point to be affirmed for Truth (14).

Alfred makes a Poet. of Laws.

The first thing Alfred had in his Thoughts, the Moment he saw himself thus peaceful and absolute, was to make use of his Power for the Good and Benefit of his Subjects. As the Laws, during the Wars, had been very much trampled upon, and were become almost unknown to the People, he laid out his Pains for some Time, in making a Collection of the best Laws he could find. He inserted some of the Judicial Laws (1) of the Old Testament, and several of those formerly enacted by Ina King of Wessex, and Offa King of Mercia (2) in their respective Kingdoms. To these he added many of his own, adapted to the Circumstances of his People. Throughout these Laws may easily be observed, an ardent Zeal for Justice, and a sincere Desire of rooting out Oppression and Violence (3). They were indeed mild, if compared to those of later Ages, being they punished most Offences by Mildness and Fines (4). But the Strictness where-with Alfred caused them to be observed, counterbalanced their Lenity. If with Respect to private Persons the Rigour of the Law was somewhat abated, it was not so with Respect to corrupt Magistrates; to such Alfred was ever inexorable. He was very sensible it would be in vain to oblige his Subjects to an exact Obedience of the Laws, if Care were not taken that the Magistrates should give them a good Example. History takes notice of his executing four and forty Judges within the Space of a Year, for not doing Justice (5).

Justice was of Justice.

These Precautions seemed to be sufficient to hinder the Poor and Low, from being oppressed by the Rich and Great. But as Alfred was sensible the Spirit of Oppression naturally grew upon Men in Authority, he studied to prevent that Inconvenience. To that End, he ordered, that in all Criminal Actions, twelve Men, chosen for that Purpose, should determine concerning the Fact, and the Judge give Sentence according to their Verdict. This Privilege, enjoyed by the English to this Day, is doubtless the noblest and most valuable, that Subjects can have. An Englishman accused of any Crime, is to be tried only by his Peers, that is, by Persons of his own Rank. By this Means, he is out of all Danger of being oppressed, how powerful soever his Accusers may be. These twelve Men, chosen out of many others, with the Approbation of the Person accused, are called by the collective Name of Jury. These are properly the Persons, by whom the Life or Death of the Party accused is determined. Happy the People that enjoy so glorious a Privilege!

Division of the Kingdom
into Shires, Hundred and Ty-things.

The Wars had caused such Disorders and Licentiousness in the Kingdom, that Vagabonds and Vagrants every where abounded, who committed all manner of Crimes with impunity, their poor and mean Condition screening them from Justice. As they had no settled Abode, upon committing any Offence, they shifted their Quarters, and went where it was difficult to discover them. Alfred beholding with Indignation honest Men thus exposed to the Insults of Villains, was extremely desirous to put a stop to so great Mischief. Having consulted those whom he judged capable of giving him good Advice, he took the following Method to prevent any Person from living in his Dominions, without being obliged to give an Account of his Actions. He divided all England into Shires (6) or Counties, the Counties into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tythings. This being done, all the Inhabitants of the Kingdom were obliged to belong to some Tything; whoever did not, were looked upon as Vagabonds, and as such denied the Protection of the Law. Every Householder was to answer for his Wife, his Children under fifteen Years of Age, and his Domesticks. If any one by his Way of living, fell under Suspicion, he was obliged to give Security for his good Behaviour: In Case he could find none, the Tything threw him into Prison, to prevent their being liable to the Penalty he should incur by any Offence (7). Thus the Householders being responsible for their Families, the Tything for the Householders, the Hundreds for the Tythings, and the Counties for the Hundreds, every one was watchful over his Neighbour's Actions. If a Stranger guilty of any Crime made his Escape, Information was taken of the House where he lodged, and if he had been there three Days, the Master of the Family was condemned to pay his Fine. But in Case he had not stayed so long as three Days, the Householder was acquitted upon making Oath he was not privy to his Crime. I might add here abundance of Particulars not entertaining to Portuguese, as to the English, who behold with Pleasure in these Regulations, the Origin of those Laws they so happily live under at this present Time. But it suffices to say, these wife Institutions produced such good Order and Tranquillity as the like had never before been known in England (8).

In short, to prevent the Kingdom from being infested any more by foreign Enemies, Alfred disposed the Militia in such Manner as enabled him to make Head against an Invasion, in case the Danes should renew their Incursions. He kept in each County, a Body of Troops always ready to march upon the Conduct of the Earl or Governor. Upon the first Notice of an Invasion, the Earls had Orders to join Forces at certain Places, under the Command of a Generalissimo appointed by the King. By this Means, together with a numerous Fleet which was always either ready to put to Sea, or cruising round the Island, he kept the foreign Danes so in Awe, that during the rest of his Reign, they durst not attempt to make a Descent. And for the same Reason, those that were settled in the Island, found themselves constrained to be quiet.

When by these wise Regulations Alfred had provided for the Safety of the State, he endeavoured to make the People relish the Fruits of Peace, by introducing Trade and Commerce. He ordered a good Number of Merchant-ships to be built, which he let out to the principal Merchants, for the Encouragement of Traffick. So that by Degrees the English were in a Condition to repair by this means the Losses occasion'd by a long War. It is affirmed that some of these Merchants traded as far as the East-Indies, from whence they imported several Things, before unknown to the English (9).

After this great Prince had thus regulated Matters, he turned his Thoughts to the Arts and Sciences, which the Wars had almost entirely frightened from the Land. To this End he invited over from foreign Countries learned Men, to whom he gave Pensions, and dispersed them in the several Dioceses, to instruct the People. But not satisfied with this, and desirous of having in his own Kingdom a Nursery of Learning, he founded four Schools or Colleges at Oxford. In the first, the Abbot Nests and Grimbald read Divinity. In the second, Asturias, a Benedictine Monk, taught Grammar and Rhetorick. In the third, John, a Monk of St. David's, set up a Chair for Logic, Arithmetic, and Musick. In the fourth, Johannes Scotus professed Geometry and Astronomy. This last was firmaned Erigena, that is, the Irishman, from the Word Erin or Irin, the true Name of Ireland. He was also called Scotus no doubt upon the same Account, the Inhabitants of Ireland being then termed Sexti. It is related of this Johannes Scotus, so famous in the Republick of Letters, that he was stabbed to Death by his Pupils with Pen-knives. But some say, he taught in Malmibury-Abbey, and not at

(1) With the Dealogues at their Head. See them in Wilkins Leg. Saxon, and Lambard. These Laws of Alfred were used at Wimborgh, as low as the Reign of Edward IV. Spelman, p. 99. Note.
(2) And likewise Edric King of Kent, who was the first that reduced the Saxon Laws into Writing.
(3) If King Alfred, as is supposed, drew up a complete Body of Laws, his now lost; for those lately published by Dr. Wilkins, (who has given us all the Laws extant from Edwards, the first Christian Lawgiver in England, down to the Magna Charta of Henry III) fall short of an entire System of Laws. Alfred's Laws are ranked under two Heads, 1. The Laws of Alfred, forty in Number. 2. The Laws between Alfred and Guthrum, which seems to be no more than Articles of Pacification, and Conditions on which Guthrum was to hold East-Angles. The 37th Law secures the Small of Estate, and provides that if a Freeholder be seized of his Freehold, he shall be restored to him, provided he can prove it. wait monthly by turns : A Custom, which tho' not practised then in other Courts, was afterwards followed by other Princes. As for his Revenues, he divided them in two Parts, one whereof was wholly applied for charitable uses, and subdivided into four Portions. The first for Alms to the poor. The second for the maintenance of the Monasteries he had founded. The third for the Subsistence of the Professors and Scholars at Oxford. The fourth for poor Monks, as well Foreigners as English (1). The other half was thrown into three divisions ; one was expended in his Family. Another in paying his Archbishops and other curious Workmen ; and the rest was bestowed in Pensions upon Strangers, invited to his Court for the encouragement and instruction of his Subjects. When I speak of his Revenues, I mean his own hereditary Estate. It was not customary in those Days, for Princes to levy Taxes upon the People, in order to squander the Money in Luxury and Extravagancies.

What has been said of this illustrious Prince, may suffice to make known the principal events in his Reign, and to give an Idea of his personal Qualities. I might add many more particulars, since his Life alone affords matter for a large Volume. But I believe I may venture to stop here, without injuring the memory of this Monarch, who is justly distinguished with the Surname of Great. No Historian charges him with any Vice, but all unanimously agree to represent him

He died in 900, and in the 52d year of his Age, after a reign of twenty eight years and six months (3), the greatest part whereof was spent in wars and troubles, and the rest in peace (4). His history shows that both in war and peace he govern'd with prudence and steadiness. But what chiefly distinguishes him from the generality of Princes, was his sincere and constant love for his People. Of this he gave demonstration, not by words only, as is too commonly the case, but by real and substantial deeds. Accordingly never was Prince better beloved by his Subjects. No doubt this mutual Affection contributed to destroy in the Danes settled in England all hopes of shaking off his Yoke, when once they had submitted to it.

Alfred had several Children by Alfwita his Queen. His eldest Son, whom he designed for his Successor, died before him. Of those that survived him, Edward mounted the Throne after him. Ethelward, who was bred a Scholar at Oxford, was a very learned Man, and died in the fortieth year of his Age, in 922. Elfwida his eldest Daughter, Wife to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, became very famous in her Brother Edward's Reign. Alfwita or Ethelwita, called also Ethelrude by the Flemish Writers, married Baldwin Earl of Flanders. Ethelgitha, who chose to be a Nun, was made Abbess of Shaftsbury Nunnery founded by the King her Father (5).

7. EDWARD the Elder.

WHEN Edward ascended the Throne England was almost equally divided between the English and Danes. The Danes inhabited Northumberland and East-Anglia, from whence they had driven the English during the wars. The English were still in possession of Wessex, containing the ancient Kingdom of Essex, and all the Country lying South of the Thames. As for Mercia it was peopled with a mixture of Danes and English, but in such manner that the English were superior in the South and West Parts, and the Danes in the East and North. During the latter part of Alfred's reign, the Danes had remained very quiet, out of fear of provoking that Prince to invade their Possessions. Besides, they were very well pleased to enjoy some repose, in order to fortify their Settlements in England. For this reason, the retreat of their Countrymen was to them rather an occasion of Joy than Sorrow. Indeed, they could never have attained to their Ends, if the war had been continually renewed by the arrival of other Danes, who under the name of Friends, would have been as inconvenient to them as to the English themselves. The retreat of these dangerous Guests, and the profound Tranquillity spread over the whole Kingdom, by Alfred's just Administration, having given them time to cultivate their Lands, and augment their Riches by Commerce, they began to entertain thoughts of shaking off the English Yoke. Accordingly, they embraced the first favorable occasion to excite new Troubles in England, not doubting in the least but they would prove the means of putting their design in Execution.

I have observed that King Ethelbert, elder Brother to Alfred, left two Infant Sons. Ethelward, the eldest, being grown at the death of Alfred, to Man's Estate, thought it time to assert his right to the Crown. He pretended, that Ethelwulf his Grandfather, should not with Justice settle the Kingdom upon all his Sons successively, to the prejudice of the Children of the eldest. That granting he had a power to do this, there was no reason the Succession, after the death of the four Brothers, should continue in the Family of the youngest, when the Heirs of the second were alive. That besides, at most he could but entail the Kingdom of Kent, which he was in possession of, and not the Kingdom of Wessex, which belonged not to him when he made his Will. These reasons appeared very plausible ; yet Ethelward could meet with no encouragement from the English. Doubtless, the great Veneration they had for Alfred's Memory, made them adhere to his Son, or it may be, they did not question Ethelwulf's power of settling the Succession as he pleased. The ancient Historians not having expressed themselves clearly upon this point, it would be difficult to decide the matter by the publick Laws of the Saxons, which are not sufficiently known. And therefore, to confine my self to the bare relation of Facts, I shall only say, that Ethelward, finding his Countrymen unwilling to support his Title, was forc'd to apply to the Danes, who probably had put him upon this undertaking.

Ethelward began his design upon the Crown, with seizing Winburn, a fortified Town in Dorsetshire (6). He expected to be attacked ; but hoped, if that place made never so little Resistance, the Danes would keep Edward too much employed in other parts, that it would not be possible for him to retake it (7). But his hopes were all in vain. Edward came upon him with such Expedition, that he was like to have surpris'd him in Winburn, before he had taken necessary measures for his defence. He had hardly time to get out of the Town (8) and fly to the Danes (9), who were now up in Arms. Upon this Prince's coming among them, they proclaimed him King of England, pretending, as they were in possession of half the Kingdom, they had as much right to make a King, as the West-Saxons.

The retreat of Ethelward among the Danes, made the King sensible he was going to be involved in a troublesome War, the consequences whereof were to be dreaded. Not that he thought himself unable to withstand the Danes settled in England, but was apprehensive the foreign Danes would take this opportunity to plunge the Kingdom again into its former Calamities. This consideration made him resolve to do his utmost to put an end to the War, before the Danes had time to send for their Countrymen to their Assistance. Immediately after the taking of Winburn, he marched towards Northumberland (10), at the head of his Army, which daily increased, by Troops coming in from all Parts. The Danes were astonished at this Expedition, and finding themselves in no condition to resist him, were constrained to abandon and banish from their Country the Prince, they had undertaken to protect. They had soon reason to repent of espousing his Cause, or of not defending it better. This fruitless attempt of theirs cost them several strong-holds in Mercia, which Edward deemed necessary to secure. He did not think proper to challenge them more severely at this Time, least the War, which seemed to be over, should break out afresh, if he reduced them to a necessity of sending for succours from Denmark. He was satisfied with repairing some Fortresses in Mercia, in order to confine them within narrower Bounds (1). Ethelred Earl of Mercia, and the Prince Ethelstan his Wife, were very servicable to the King in this War, by making head against the Mercian Danes, and preventing the Welsh from coming to their Aid. It is related of Ethelstan, that having had a very hard labour with her first Child, she made a resolution never to come into the like Case again, and was as good as her Word. From thenceforward she wholly devoted herself to Arms, and like a true Amazon gave proofs of her courage in all the King her Brother's Wars with the Danes. She was generally stiled [not only Lady and Queen, but] King, in admiration of her Manlike and Royal Abilities.

Mean while Ethelward, though absent, was not idle. Upon leaving England, he applied to France, and obtained a powerful aid of Normans. With these forces he landed in Essex (2), and easily became Master of that Kingdom. Edward, not expecting his Enemy could have been so soon ready to make a fresh attempt had taken care only to guard Mercia against the Northumbrian-Danes, imagining Essex to be in no danger. The arrival of the Normans roused the Danes of Northumberland and East-Anglia, and caused them to resolve to make a diversion in favour of Ethelward. Accordingly they take up arms again, and throwing themselves into Mercia, ravage the Country inhabited by the English in a merciless Manner (3). Edward, not without extreme regret, saw himself forced to bear their Injuries, till he could draw his Troops together, which he had dismissed, as believing he should not want them so soon. The moment he was at the head of his Army, he made the Danes pay dear for the mischief they had done the English. In this War he gained so many Victories, that the Danes lost all hopes of throwing off the English yoke, and his Cousin of mounting the Throne. At length Ethelward being slain in Battle (4), and the Danish forces considerably diminished, they were not able to carry on the War with that vigour they began it. However, they continued it two years after Ethelward's Death. But having in vain endeavoured to repair their Losses, they sued for Peace (5); which Edward readily granted them, on condition they would acknowledge him for Sovereign as they had done his Father, and the Normans forthwith return to France.

This Peace could not hold long between two neighbouring Nations so exasperated against one another. Accordingly after three years the War was renewed (6). It proved fatal to the Danes, who lost in a very little time two Battles (7). Edward, who knew how to improve his Victories, took from them several Towns in Mercia, and at length drove them quite out of that Kingdom. Then it was that Ethelred, who had all along bravely defended the King his Brother-in-law, became in reality Earl of Mercia; but was not long for. He was taken out of the World by Death, almost as soon as that whole Province was united under his Government. This Earl was not barely Governor or Viceroy of Mercia: He had some particular Power, the nature of which it is very difficult to learn from the Historians that speak of it.

Malmshury says, he held the Country as a Fief of the Crown, much in the same manner as the German Princes hold their territories of the Empire (8). Of this, Ethelstan his Widow's cession to the King her Brother of the Cities of London and Oxford, is a farther Proof. If Ethelred had been only Governor or Viceroy, Ethelstan would have had no right to resign these two Places, since they would not have belonged to her (9).

Ethelstan having taken upon her the Government of Mercia, after Ethelred's Death, followed the example of her Father and Brother, in fortifying Towns, to take away from the Danes all hopes of settling in Mercia again. Among the Places she repaired or fortified, these are the Chief, Warwick, Tamworth, Walsbury, Chesham, Eadsbury, and Chester (10). This last had lain in ruins for some Time (11). When Ethelstan had taken these Precautions, she carried her Arms into Wales (12), and after several victories obliged the Welsh to become her Tributaries.

The year 915, as some affirm, is memorable for the founding of the University of Cambridge by King Edward. But all agree not in this Matter. Some maintain the origin of this famous University is of a much later Date. Others, on the contrary, carry its Antiquity a great deal higher, and attribute the founding of it to one Cantaber, a Spaniard, three hundred and fifteen years before the birth of our Saviour. Some again, cutting off almost a thousand years of this Antiquity, are contented with asserting, that Sebert, who reigned in Essex in the beginning of the VIIIth Century, was the first Founder. I shall not take upon me to decide this Dispute, rendered very warm by the emulation between Oxford and Cambridge. It is sufficient to have briefly mentioned the diversity of opinions in this Matter. However, I cannot forbear observing, that if the University of Cambridge was in being in King Sebert's Time, or even in Alfred's, it is very surprising, that neither Bede in his Ecclesiastical History, nor Asserius in his Life of Alfred, should take the least Notice of it.

From the year 910, when the War between the English and Danes was rekindled, to the year 922, we find in History nothing but a long series of Battles, the relation whereof must be unpleasant to the Reader (13). I shall therefore without any scruple pass them over in Silence, and mention only the most remarkable Consequences.

The Prince Ethelstan, Sister to King Edward, died during this War (14), leaving an only daughter named Elfwinne, then marriageable. Ethelstan was slain, succeeded her Husband in the Sovereignty of Mercia: I say Sovereignty, because it was certainly more than a bare Government. But not to give wrong notions of this Matter, it will be proper to consider the state of Mercia at the time I am speaking of. Historians not having clearly expressed themselves, have left us very much in the dark as to this Point. It must be remembered, that Ethelred, with the Title of Earl of Mercia, was in possession only of London and its Territory, or at most of the County of Middlesex, and that London, was become the Metropolis of Mercia. Afterwards, Ethelred's narrow territories being much enlarged by his conquests upon the Mercian Danes, Alfred's present to his Son-in-law was become so considerable, as to raise the jealousy of the new King, and make him apprehensive of Ethelred's successors growing too power-

(1) The year 922, a Battle was fought between the Kentishmen and the Danes at Helne, or Hlencroft in Suffex. Sax. Ann. Flor. Werc. places it under the year 924, and H.oved. in the 12th year of King Edward. p. 353.

(2) H.oved. tells us he did in Northumbria, the same year he went away, and came the next year by Sea to Essex, p. 832.

(3) They were run and would all Mercia as far as Glaston in Wiltshire, and there passing the Thames, carried away whomever they could find in Bedfordshire, the same County. In the mean time King Edward pursued them, and waited all the Country that lies between the Devil's-Ditch upon New-market Heath, and the Ouse. Edward recalled his Forces from thence, but the Kentishmen flying behind, were surrounded by the Danes, whereupon they followed a smart Engagement, in which several were killed on both Sides, and among the rest Ethelward, but the Danes got the Victory. Sax. Ann. H.oved. p. 352.

(4) The Saxons Annals tell us, the Battle was obstinate and bloody on both Sides; the King lost the Earls Sigulf and Sigelm, with many more of his Nobles. On the Danes part were slain Eadric their King, with a greater number than of the English, though they had the honour of keeping the Field and burying their dead. Sax. Ann. 905.

(6) The Saxons Annals tell us, in the year 915, in the Army of West-Saxons and Mercians into Northumbria, who plundered that Kingdom for five weeks, and flew many of the Danes. Sax. Ann. H.oved. p. 352.

(7) The Saxons Annals tell us, in the year 915, the Danish Army in Northumbria laid not regarding the Peace which King Edward and his Son had made with them, would again fight the Mercian Mercians. In this Battle were slain several thousands of the Danes, with their Kings Eadric and Hlathred. They were succeeded by one Eadric. The second Battle was fought at Tetentale, or Tetent in Staffordshire. Sax. Ann. Flor. Werc. Huntingd. p. 352.

(8) Ethelstan says the Title of Subregulus Merciorum. Selden affirms, Subregulus is the same with Fuli-man or Count. De Gange lxx, it signifies a lesser King, sometimes a King or Lord. In this last sense it is used by Bede, in the 1st. c. of his History, where he calls Ethelstan a Subregulus. Sax. Ann. H.oved. p. 352.

ful. However, whilst Elfreda lived, Edward seemed not to be jealous of her Prosperity, and had no thoughts of dispossessing her of what she had gained in great measure by her own Valour. But after her Death, he did not think fit to leave her daughter Elfwina in possession of a Demesne, which put it in her power to raise new troubles in England by some ill-contrived Match. And indeed, there are Historians who affirm, the young Princess had resolved upon marrying a Danish Prince (1), and that therefore her Uncle deprived her of her Dominions. He was afraid no doubt, she would introduce the Enemies of the Kingdom into those very Places, that with so much difficulty had been wrested out of their Hands. However this be, after Elfreda's Death, he seized upon Mercia, and carried his Niece with him into Wessex. In all likelihood she passed the rest of her days in a Nunnery. Whether Elfwina's design of marrying a Dane was matter of Fact, or an invention to vindicate the King's proceedings against his Niece, it equally proves, what was before observed, that Ethelred and Elfreda were proprietors of Mercia. If they had been no more than Governors, Edward would have had no occasion to allege her intended marriage as a reason to deprive her of the Government; as, on the other hand, there would have been no necessity of inventing such a Pretence, supposing there was no Foundation for it. I have enlarged a little on this Subject, because of the great variety of opinions concerning the Right and Title of Ethelred.

repose. But if he equalled the great Alfred in military Virtues, it must be owned he was far short of his illustrious Father in all other respects (4).

He had Children by three Wives, the first named Egwinna, a Shepherd's Daughter, was only a Concubine. An Historian relates concerning this Woman, a sort of Romance, which, on account of the Sequel, it will be necessary to insert. I call it a Romance, since by the Author's own confession, it has no better Foundation than some old Songs handed down to his time (5); much the same with your Spanish Romances, wherein are related several Stories of their ancient Kings. The Historian says, Egwinna, a Shepherd's Daughter, as she lay asleep in the Fields, dreamt that the Moon shone out of her Womb to bright, that all England was enlivened by the Splendor. Some time after, she took occasion to relate her dream to an old Woman that had been King Edward's Nurse. This Woman, who pretended to interpret Dreams, imagining there was something extraordinary in this, took Egwinna into her House, and educated her not as a Country Wench, but as a Person of Quality. Egwinna answered all the old Nurse's care and pains about her, and in time became an accomplished Beauty. Whilst she was in the House of her Benefactress, Prince Edward, before he was King, happening to pass by the place where his Nurse lived, made her a Visit. He cast his Eyes on Egwinna, and immediately fell desperately in Love with her. His passion was so violent, that in the most moving and affecting manner he solicited the nurse to put him in possession of the charming Egwinna. The old Woman, who had a great affection for Edward, and had always the dream in her Thoughts, yielded to his request, and brought Egwinna to consent to what he desired so passionately. From that Time, Edward was extremely fond of Egwinna, and had by her three Children, of whom Aethelstan, the eldest, succeeded him. Alfred the second died before his Father. The third was a Daughter, called by some Editha, by others Beatrix.

By another Wife, Edward had two Sons and six Daughters, Elfwine the eldest Son died at Oxford a few Days after his Father; so that he had no time to taste the sweets of a Crown. Edwin the second was deprived of his just Rights, and came to a tragical End, as shall be related hereafter. Of the six Daughters, some were married to powerful Princes, by the care of their Brother Aethelstan, and others became Nuns. Elfreda the eldest was Abbess of Ramsay (6). Ogina was married to Charles the Simple, King of France, and was Mother of Lewis d'Outre-Mer. Editha passed her Days in a Monastery. The fourth, of the same Name, was married to Hugh the Great, Earl of Paris, Father of Hugh Capet. Editha was Wife of Otho Emperor of Germany. Edwiga the youngest espoused Lewis the Blind, King of Provence, who had a Son by her, named Constantine.

another

By Edwiga his third Wife, Edward had two Sons and two Daughters. Edmund and Edred the two Sons were both Kings of England. Edwiga was a Nun, and her Sister Edwiga was married to Lewis Prince of Aquitain. It is very probable this Edwiga was confounded with her Sister of the same name by the second Wife, who was married to Lewis King of Provence, because there was then no Prince of Aquitain mentioned in History.

The Danish Historians give Edward another Daughter named Thyra, who, as they affirm, was Wife of Gorm III, one of their Kings. It is strange they should speak so positively of a Princess of England, unknown to all the English Historians.

During the reign of Edward the Elder, Rollo chief of the Normans in France, had gotten such firm footing in Neustria, that it was not in the Power of the French Mercurial, to drive him thence. Charles the Simple, then King of France, was forced, in order to free himself from the continual fears of so troublesome a Neighbour, to give him a grant of that part of Neustria he was possessed of, lying between the Seine and the Epte, with the Title of Duke of Normandy. The conditions were, that Rollo should do Homage to the Crown of France, be baptized and marry Giselle the King's Daughter. Rollo died, His Death, according to Mexarai, in 917. Some place his death in 924, and others with still less reason in 928. William William succ his Son, by Peppa Daughter of the Earl of Bayeux, was next him his Successor.

ELSWARD, Edward's eldest Son, surviving his Father but a few Days, and the rest of the legitimate Children being all under Age, Athelstan, Son of Egwin was placed on the Throne, with the Consent of the Clergy and Nobility. Tho' this Prince had a mixture of Bastard and Royal Blood in his Veins, the last had so far the ascendant, that the blemish of his Birth was entirely effac'd by his noble Qualities. Alfred his Grandfather had conferr'd the honour of Knighthood upon him, by girding him with a Sword according to the Custom of those days. Edward his Father had committed the care of his Education to Earl Ethelred his Brother-in-law, and the Princess Elsida his Sister, who did their utmost to train him up to Virtue. As he had been present at all their Councils, and attended them in all their warlike Expeditions, he had acquir'd so great experience both in Military and Political Affairs, as join'd his natural Parts, gain'd him the esteem of all the World. So that when he mounted the Throne, he was not only of a fit age, being then in his thirtieth year, but also very capable to govern. History does not inform us what determin'd the English to give the Crown to this Prince, notwithstanding his illegitimate Birth (1). However, his Father thought this defect a sufficient Reason to set him by, and name for his Successor another of his Sons born in Wedlock, though younger than Athelstan. In all appearance, after the death of Elfwold, Athelstan's mature Age and noble Qualities gain'd him the preference before Edwin, the eldest of the legitimate Sons, but too young to govern (2).

This Election however was not pleasing to all. Some of the principal Lords disdaining to be govern'd by a Bastard conspir'd to dethrone Athelstan, and place Edwin in his room. Alfred, chief of the Conspirators, had even taken private measures to seize Athelstan at Winchester, and put out his Eyes. This Plot being discover'd, he was apprehended by the King's Order: but would confess nothing. He obstinately persisted in protesting his innocence, and offer'd to purge himself by Oath in the presence of the Pope. Although this way of justifying himself was far from being a proof of his Innocence, Athelstan was satisfied with it, and sent him to Rome, to take his Oath before Pope John. Perhaps he was unwilling to begin his Reign with Blood, or it may be, was apprehensive, the treating too severely a person of the first Rank, would draw upon him the ill-will of the Nobles. Shortly after, word was sent him from Rome, that Alfred having sworn his Innocence before the Pope, suddenly fell into a fainting fit, which lasting three days, ended with his Life; and that the Pope, convinc'd by this accident of Alfred's Perjury, had order'd his body to remain in the English College till the King's pleasure should be known. Athelstan, pleas'd with being thus rid of his Enemy, without having directly contributed to his death, contented he should have Christian burial. However, his Lands were confiscated, and given to Malmshury-Monastery. The King took care to insert in the Grant the whole Conspiracy, to testify to the world that he dedicated to God what was his own.

In the mean time, new troubles were preparing for the King. As the Danes, settled in England, had been subdued by force, they thought it lawful to make use of the same means to shake off their yoke. The death of Edward, and the conspiracy of Alfred, affording them, as they imagin'd, a favorable opportunity to revolt, they had begun to take such measures as oblig'd Athelstan to march into their Country. He would doubtless have met with more resistance, had he given them time to make greater Preparations. But as they had not yet drawn their Forces together, they were so surpris'd by the arrival of the King on their Frontiers, that without endeavouring to defend themselves, they returned to their Allegiance. Sithric, one of their Kings (3), went and sued for Peace, upon what terms the King was pleas'd to impose. Athel- stan, being desirous to live in Peace with the Danes, that he might have time to establish himself in the Throne, not only pardoned his Revolt, but gave him his Sister Editha in Marriage, on condition he would receive Baptism (4).

The troubles in the North being thus appeas'd, Athelstan march'd back to Wessex, where advice was brought him soon after of Sithric's Death, who by a former Marriage had left two Sons (5), Anlaf and Godfrid. As the Histories of those times are not very particular, we are ignorant of the reason of Athelstan's resolving to deprive these two Princes of their Father's Dominions. However that be, as soon as he heard of Sithric's Death, he return'd at the head of his Army into Northumberland. His march was so expeditious, that Anlaf and Godfrid (6), as well as Reginald, another Danish King residing at York, had scarce time to escape falling into his hands. Their hasty flight gave him opportunity of becoming master of all Northumberland, except the Castle of York.

Though he had taken care to secure his Conquest, by placing strong Garrisons in all the Towns, he was uneasy at the escape of the three Danish Princes. He would have been very glad to have them in his power, but, with regard to two, the thing was impossible. It was not known what was become of Reginald, and Anlaf was fled into Ireland, where it was no easy matter to come at him. Athelstan therefore was forced to be satisfied with requiring Constantine King of Scotland to deliver up Godfrid, who had retired into his Dominions. Constantine being sensible he was not in condition to deny any thing to a Prince at the head of so powerful an Army, promised to deliver the Prince into his hands, and give him a meeting at Dacar (7). But whilst he was preparing for his Journey, Godfrid made his escape, either through the negligence or connivance of Constantine, who however went to meet Athelstan accompanied with Engus King of Cumberland. Athelstan admitted Constantine's excuses for the Danish Prince's escape. But if the English Historians are to be credited, he obliged both the Kings to do Homage for their Kingdoms (8). However, the Scots positively deny that England had ever any right of Sovereignty over Scotland till the twelfth Century. But this dispute, which was never decided, will for the future be dropt, since England and Scotland make now but one Kingdom.

Before Athelstan quitted the North, Godfrid made an Attempt upon York, by means of the Castle, where he had still some Friends (9). But missing his aim, he put to Sea, where for some time he exercis'd Piracy. At length, tired with that way of Life, he surrender'd himself to the King of England, who received him kindly, and allow'd him a handsome Pension. Some time after, upon some disgust or ill-grounded suspicion, he withdrew again, and was never more heard of.

Anlaf, a Prince of greater Abilities than his Brother, took better measures for his Restoration. He had retired into Ireland, where being informed that the King of Scotland was displeas'd with Athelstan, believed he might make use of this opportunity to persuade him to espouse his Cause. To that end, he came to Scotland and intimated to Constantine, that he had reason to fear the worst from the King of England. He represent'd to him, that Athelstan having by surprise seized upon Northumberland, without any the least Pretence, might proceed in the same manner with regard to Scotland, and therefore it was absolutely necessary to prevent him. To this he added the offer of a powerful aid from Ireland, assuring him, with that increase of strength he might easily drive Athelstan out of Northumberland, and free himself from a troublesome and dangerous Neighbour, by restoring that Kingdom to the Danes, who would serve as a barrier against England. Anlaf found no great difficulty to prevail with the King of Scotland, who, besides his being secretly exasperated at the haughty reception he met with at the late Interview, was grown uneasy at Athelstan's Successes, and apprehensive of being invaded himself. He resolv'd therefore to embark in this Enterprize; and having concerted Measures with Anlaff, they parted in order to go and prepare what each had engaged to provide.

Then while, Athelstan, having viewed his Garrisons, and taken all the Precautions he thought proper to secure his late Conquests, was returned into Wessex, where he remained in Peace, not knowing what his Enemies had plotted against him. Shortly after he was engaged in a War with Hæthel King of Wales. This new Enemy was raised by Constance, to keep him employed against the Welsh, whilst he and Alnoth should invade Northumberland. Athelstan, by his Expedition, broke all the Measures of the King of Scotland. The Moment he was informed of the Motions of the Welsh, and the Aid sent them by Constance, he marched into Wales, and giving Hloet Battle obtained a complete Victory (1). After this happy Success, he augmented the Tribute paid by that Prince to England (2).

Thus War being thus ended, Abeltham approached the Borders of Scotland, to make Confinantine repent of his afflicting the Welsh. As soon as he entered the Enemy's Country, he took some Towns, and gave the Scots reason to dread more considerable Losses. As Abeltham was not yet arrived with the promised Supplies, Confinantine durst not venture to engage alone in this War against so powerful an Enemy, who was already in his Dominions, and in condition to carry on his Conquests much further. Wherefore, to gain time till the Irish joined him, he sued for Peace. Abeltham readily granted his Request, being extremely desirous to make that Prince his Friend, for fear he should countenance the Insurrections of the Northumbrians. For this Reason he restored to him all the Places he had conquered in Scotland, in Expectation of gaining by this Generosity a Prince whose Friendship it was his Interest to cultivate. Some Historians however affirm, Abeltham obliged Confinantine to do him Homage for Scotland. But this is what the Scots will never allow.

Abelstan's Generosity was not sufficient to hinder Constantine from pursuing the Execution of his first Project. He rather hastened his Preparations the more, being extremely vexed, he should be forced to receive Obligations from a Prince whom he always considered as his Enemy. Mean while, Abelstan was returned to Wylfax, where he hoped to enjoy some Repose, as he saw nothing about him likely to give him any Disturbance. But he met at home in his own Family with what troubled him more than any thing the War could occasion.

—A certain Court-Lord, Enemy to Prince Edwin the King's Brother, accus'd the young Prince of being concerned in Alfred's Conspiracy. The King too readily gave Ear to this Accusation. He was easily induced to believe that a Prince in whose Favour the Conspiracy was form'd was not innocent. It may be too, he was not forry to find him guilty, as it gave him an Opportunity to dispatch him out of the way. However, he would not put him to death publicly, but order'd him to be expost to the Fury of the Waves in a Vessel without Sails or Rudder. The young Prince went on board protesting his Innocence, but finding the King inexorable, he cast himself head-long into the Sea (3). Abelstar at first was secretly pleas'd with this Occasion to destroy his Brother: but the Moment he had gratified his Passion, was seiz'd with grievous Remorse. To quiet his Conscience he was advis'd to atone for his Crime by some meritorious Act. With this View he found'd the Abby of Middleton in Dorsetshire (4), where Prayers were offer'd to Heaven, Day and Night, for him and his Brother's Soul. The Historians add (5), that, not content with this, he submitted to a seven Years Penance, but do not inform us wherein it consist'd. Edwin's Accuser had not Reason long to rejoice at the Success of his malicious Calumnies. One Day as he waited at Table with the King's Cup, one of his Feet slipping, he would certainly have fallen, had not by the Numblers of the other recovered himself. Whereupon he jocosly says, See how one Brother helps another. This Just cost him his Life. Abelshan, who over-heard what he said, taking it for a Reproach or Banter upon him, ordered him to be executed immediately, and thus revenged his Brother's Death by That of his false Accuser (6).

Whilst these things passed at Court, Constantine continued his Preparations for the Execution of the Project concerted between him and Anloiff. This last, whom some groundlessly stile King of Ireland, had found means to ingage in the League, the Irish, Welsh, and Northumbrian Danes, who ardently desired to have a King of their own Nation on the Throne. Anloiff appeared as Head of this League, though Constantine was no less concerned in it, the War being carried on chiefly at his Expense. This Project was managed so privately, that Anloiff entered the Humber with a Fleet of six hundred Sail, and invaded Northumberland before Atbelston had any Intelligence of his Motions. With so considerable Forces, and the Assistance of the Danes settled in those Parts, he easily became Master of several small ill-guarded Towns. But the fortified Places that were well garrisoned by the English, stopped his Progress, and gave Atbelston time to draw his Army together. He used for great Expedition, that he supplied the two confederate Princes. They were now upon the March towards Bernicia, in order to conquer it for the King of Scotland, but found they were obliged to turn back and oppose King Atbelston, who was very near them, when they imagined him as yet employed in his Preparations. The two Armies met at Brunanburgh (?), where a bloody Battle was fought. Victory declared for Atbelston, and the Allies lost Constantine King of Scotland, six other Irish or Welsh Kings, and twelve Earls and General Officers. This Victory was chiefly owing to the Valour of Turkethil, the King's Cousin, who was afterwards Abbot of Croglard. Atbelston after winning this Battle, easily extended his Conquests farther into Scotland, and chastised the Illois by razing their Tribute to twenty Pound Weight of Gold, three hundred of Silver, and twenty five thousand Head of Cattle. Besides, they were pent up beyond the Wye, and lost all the Country between that River and the Severn. As for the Northumbrian Danes, who had openly sided with the Allies, Atbelston for a Punishment encreased their Yoke, and kept for the future a stricter Hand over them. After he had settled Matters in the Affairs of the North, he marched against the Coriish Britons, who had likewise assisted the Confederates. He took Exeter, formerly destroyed by the Danes, and caused it to be carefully repaired and fortified. From that time, the Britons were forced to retire beyond the Tamar, which served for a Boundary to the two Nations. They were, before this Expedition, mixed with the English in some of the Wiltren Counties.

In almost every Page of the Histories of those Days, we meet with Miracles wrought in favour of the Friends and Protectors of the Monks. Abelghon, who had been a good Benefactor to them, with intent to atone for the Murder of his Brother, was a great Favourite with them. Accordingly they have not failed to give him the usual Marks of their Gratitude. They say, at the Word of St. John of Beverly, he thruck his Sword three Yards deep in a solid Rock, which yielded like Butter. They tell us also, that having lost his Sword in the Battle of Brunnaburgh, another from Heaven came and sheathed itself in his Scabbard. But it would be lost time to relate all the Miracles the Monks have thought fit to stuff their Histories with. It will not be amiss however to note, that the Custom of embellishing all remarkable Events with Miracles, was in Fashion for several Ages.

I shall conclude the Reign of Abelstan with an Incident, the best Historians have thought worth their Notice. A few Days before the Battle of Brunanburgh, Anlaf wanting to know the Posture of the Enemy, went into the English Camp disguised like an Harper, as Alfred the Great had formerly done. But notwithstanding his Disguise, he was known by a Soldier, who however suffered him to go away

But Edwards the South Edwards in (which was his Madness to this King's Edwards) makes Edwards not only to have procured the Death of his Brother Edwards, but also of his Father King Edwards, whom he, therefore, fancied to have been called the Madness; and not content with this neither, said, that he put to D.M. his Brother Edwards also; and Edwards can force to command in a few Lines; for in the first Place, it is agreed by all our Edwards, that King Edwards died a natural Death; and undiscovered. As soon as the Soldier thought him safe, he told Aethelstan what had happened, and advised him to remove his Tent, judging Anlaf had some Design upon that Quarter. He excused himself for not having discover'd this Secret sooner, by saying, he had formerly given his Military Oath to Anlaf, and therefore could not refuse to betray him. Aethelstan forgave him, and follow'd his Advice, which he soon found to be of great Consequence. The next Night the Danish Prince, with a Body of chosen Troops, attacked the English Camp, and penetrated to the very place where he had seen the King's Tent. A Bishop (coming to the Camp that Night, and) accidentally pitching his Tent in the same place, was slain with all his Followers.

Aethelstan out-liv'd the Victory of Brunanburgh but three Years. He died a natural Death in 941, in the forty fifth Year of his Age, and the sixteenth of his Reign (1). Historians have dilated on the glorious Success of his Arms, but much more on the Miracles Heaven wrought in his Favour. But without insinuating on the Wonders his History abounds with, I shall content myself with giving him this Commendation: His Merits made him to be equally feared by his Neighbours, beloved by his Subjects, and respected by the greatest Princes in Europe (2). The Emperor Otho, and Hugh the Great his Brothers-in-law, gave him frequent Demonstrations of their Esteem, by making him considerable Presents. The noble Matches he made for those of his Sisters who prefer'd the Marriage-state to a Cloister, are clear Evidences of his great Reputation in the World. His Sister Ogina, Widow of Charles the Simple, King of France, being obliged to fly for Refuge into England with her Son Lewis, who from thence had the Sit-name of Outremer, he gave them an honourable Reception, and furnish'd them with all things necessary during their Exile. It is even affirmed, his Application and Credit did not a little contribute to the restoring the King his Nephew to the Throne of his Ancestors. Though he seem'd to be entirely ingross'd by military Affairs, he found time however to cause Justice and Civil Government to flourish in his Dominions; witness the excellent Laws he from time to time added to those of Alfred his Grandfather. It appears from these Laws, several whereof are still extant, that his Intent was, all Persons, Ecclesiastical as well as Civil, should be subject to them. He was no Friend to those Privileges and Immunities, the Clergy have so much improv'd, and which very often serve only to authorize Wickedness, and prove a Sanctuary to Criminals.

Amongst all the Monuments of his Piety, which for the most part consist only in building and endowing Monasteries, according to the Custom of those Days, the Translation of the Scriptures into Saxon, the then vulgar Tongue, is one, the Usefulness whereof appears to be least dubious. He took particular Care to have it well done, employing those that were deem'd the most learned Persons in the Kingdom. Hence it is evident how much the State of Learning had been improved by the wise Regulations of the Great Alfred, since in his time it would have been impossible to find any Englishmen capable of undertaking a Work of that Nature.

The famous Dunstan, so often mention'd hereafter, was born in the first Year of his Reign.

Aethelstan having no Issue, Edmund, the eldest of the legitimate Sons of Edward the Elder, was unanimously plac'd on the Throne.

EDMUND.

ATHELSTAN left England in profound Tranquillity. The Welsh paid their Tribute regularly. Anlaf, after his Defeat, was retired into Ireland, where he seem'd to lay aside all Thoughts of any further Projects; and the Danes remained in Subjection. But as soon as this Prince was laid in his Grave, these last prepared for a Revolt. Edmund's Youth made them hope they should at length be able to accomplish their long projected Design of having a King of their own Nation, and throwing off the English Yoke. Anlaf having perfect Intelligence how they stood inclin'd, resolv'd to make use of this Juncture to recover the Crown of Northumberland. But as he was sensible this grand Undertaking could not be executed without a foreign Aid, he found means to persuade Oloaf, King of Norway, to espouse his Cause, who promised to assist him to the utmost of his Power. With the Troops lent him by this Prince, he once more enter'd Northumberland, and appearing before York, the Gates were opened to him, by means of the good Understanding between him and the principal Inhabitants. The Example of the Metropolis was followed by most of the other Towns, whose Garrisons were either expell'd, or cut in pieces by the Citizens, who were generally of Danish Race. Anlaf, not content with being Master of Northumberland, march'd into Mercia (3), where his Countrymen received him with open Arms, and assisted him in recovering several places which Edward the Elder had formerly taken from them.

Tho' Edmund was not above seventeen or eighteen Years of Age, the Progress of the Enemy was so far from daunting him, that it rather made him more eager to decide by a Battle, to whom a Country, so often and so long contended for, should belong. As soon as he had drawn all his Forces together, he resolutely march'd towards the North, though he well knew the Superiority of his Enemy. On the other hand, Anlaf hearing Edmund was advancing with long Marches to give him Battle, went to meet him with the same Resolution. The two Armies meeting near Chester (4), came to an Engagement, wherein Victory held the Balance so even, that when Night came, neither could boast of the least Advantage. Both Sides prepared to renew the Fight as soon as Day should appear. But the Archbishops of Canterbury and York (5), who were in the two Armies, labour'd so earnestly to make Peace, that a Treaty was begun that very Evening, and concluded by break of Day. This Peace was the more easily made, as neither of the Parties could insist upon any Advantage gain'd in that Day's Action, since neither of them could know either their own or the Enemy's Loss. By this Treaty, Edmund was oblig'd to deliver up to the Danes all the Country lying North of the Roman High-way, now called Wallingfreet, which divided England into almost two equal parts, running from North Wales to the most southern parts of Kent, quite to the Sea. Edmund was not at all pleas'd with these Terms, but was in a manner forc'd to accept them by the Nobles that were in his Army. These Lords, weighing the hopes of recovering what was lost, with the Apprehension of being still greater Losers, judg'd it better to end the War on these Conditions, than continue it with the Hazard of what might happen. Doubtless the Remembrance of the Calamities England was formerly expos'd to, made them the more willing to come to this Resolution. Accordingly, Anlaf was put in Possession of the Kingdom of Northumberland, whose Bounds by this Treaty were enlarg'd with several Counties which his Father Sibric had never enjoy'd.

The Northumbrian Danes had not Reason long to rejoice at the Restoration of Anlaf, which they had so ardently desired. This Prince having contracted a large Debt with the King of Norway for the Troops he had lent him, was willing to pay it. To this end, he laid heavy Taxes on the People, by which he forfeited their Affection. The Inhabitants of the ancient Kingdom of Deria were the first that revolted, and having sent for Reginald, his Brother Godfrid's Son, crown'd him King at York. Reginald was no sooner on the Throne, but he made Preparations for the War against his Uncle, who was also preparing to dispossess him. The Quarrel between these two Kings, put Edmund upon marching towards the North, at the Head of an Army, as well to improve the present Opportunity, if there was any Appearance of Success, as to appease the Troubles there, being apprehensive they might give Occasion to the foreign Danes to return into England. He arriv'd upon the Borders of Northumberland when the Uncle and Nephew, wholly intent upon their private Quarrel, thought of nothing less than repulsing the English. Probably, he might with ease have made himself Master of that Kingdom; however, he was satisfi'd with procuring Peace between the two Kings, in such a manner that Reginald was to keep the Crown he had lately received.

But at the same time, Edmund obliged them both to swear Allegiance to him, and be baptiz'd, himself standing God-father.

This forc'd Peace lasted not long, Edmund was hardly return'd into Wessex, when the two Danish Princes took up Arms with one Consent to free themselves from his Yoke, having engag'd the Merican Danes and the King of Cumberland to espouse their Quarrel. Whereupon, Edmund immediately march'd into Mercia, and before the Danes there could be joined by the Northumbrians, took from them Leicester, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, and some other places of less note. Then advancing with the same Expedition towards Northumberland, he surpris'd the two Kings before they had drawn their Forces together. This sudden Attack threw the Northumbrians into such Disorder, that the two Kings fearing to fall into the Hands of Edmund, believ'd it their only Refuge to abandon the Island, where they could not possibly remain in Safety, so closely were they pursued. Their Flight depriving the Danes of all Hopes of withstanding Edmund, they threw down their Arms, and swore Allegiance.

Before he return'd to Wessex, Edmund resolv'd to punish the King of Cumberland, who, without Cause, had sided with the Danes. He easily subdu'd that little Kingdom, whose Forces bore no Proportion to his. However, he kept it not for himself, but thought it more for his Advantage to present it to the King of Scotland, in order to attach him to his Interest, and prevent him from assisting the Northumbrians (1). However, he reserved the Sovereignty of it, and oblig'd that Prince to do him Homage, and appear at the King of England's Court, at the time of the solemn Festivals, if summon'd. This perhaps is what gave Occasion to say, that from thenceforward the Kings of Scotland were Vassals to the Kings of England. They were certainly so with regard to Cumberland; but it does not follow from hence they did Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland.

Edmund's Successes, his Valour and Abilities, render'd him famous both at Home and Abroad. The King of Denmark, tho' frequently solicited by the Danes in England, did not think proper to assist them against a Prince of so great Reputation, and from whom there was so little to be got.

Edmund was not wholly employ'd in military Affairs; there are some of his Laws still in being, which demonstrate how desirous he was of his People's Welfare and Happiness. Having observ'd, Pecuniary Punishments were not sufficient to put a Stop to Robberies, which were generally committed by People who had nothing to lose, he order'd, that in Gangs of Robbers, the oldest of them should be condemn'd to the Gallows. 'This was the first Law in England that made it Death to rob or steal.

In all Appearance this Prince would have render'd his People happy had his Reign been longer; but a fatal Accident robb'd him of his Life, when he began to enjoy the Fruits of his Victories. One Day, as he was solemnizing a Festival (2) at Pucklekirk in Gloucestershire (3), he spied Leolf, a notorious Robber, who, though banish'd the Kingdom for his Crimes, had the Impudence to come and sit at one of the Tables in the Hall where the King was at Dinner. Enrag'd at his Insolence, he command'd him to be apprehend'd (4). But perceiving he was drawing his Dagger to defend himself, the King leapt up in great Fury, and catching hold of him by the Hair, dragg'd him out of the Hall. This imprudent Action cost him his Life. Whilst he was wholly intent upon venting his furious Passion, Leolf stab'd him in the Breast with his Dagger, so that he immediately expired upon the Body of his Murderer. This was the tragical End of King Edmund in 948, in the twenty fifth Year of his Age, and the eighth of his Reign (5). By Elgiva his Wife he had two Sons, Eduy and Edgar, who did not succeed him by reason of their Minority. Edred his Brother was plac'd on the Throne by the unanimous Consent of the Clergy and Nobility (6).

During this Reign Dunstan began to appear in the World. He was in great Favour with Edmund, who made him Abbot of Glastenbury.

About this time William Long-Sword, second Duke of Normandy, was assassinated by Arnold Earl of Flanders, in a little Island of the Somme over-against Penguin. Richard I. his Son, a Minor, succeeded him. As the Affairs of Normandy will hereafter be often mix'd with those of England, it is necessary to give an Account before-hand of the Succession of the Dukes in that Dukedom.

EDRED.
Northumbria.

THE Northumbrian Danes bore the English Yoke with extreme Impatience. Nothing but Force was sufficient to keep them in Subjection. Whenever they thought they had a favourable Opportunity to revolt, they seldom fail'd to embrace it. Tho' during Edmund's Reign they had not been very successful, yet upon News of his Death, they began to think of means to recover their Liberty. They hop'd his Successor, whom as yet they knew not, would not have his Bravery, or at least wanting his Experience, would not have the same Advantage over them. The better to execute their Designs, they gain'd to their Side Malcolm King of Scotland, who look'd upon all Obligations to be cancelled by the Death of Edmund. This Prince, as well as the Danes, was persuad'd, Edred, by reason of his Youth, would be so embarrassed at this unexpected Attack, that it would not be possible for him to make any Resistance. But the Success was not answerable to their Expectations. Edred, not being inferior to his Predecessor, either in Conduct or Courage, was so very expeditious, that he was in the Heart of Northumberland, before the Danes were ready to oppose him. They were extremely surpris'd to find themselves thus attacked, when as yet they had hardly discover'd their Intention to revolt. However, as Edred was in the midst of their Country, they were forc'd to submit and sue for Peace upon what Terms he pleas'd (7).

After having chastiz'd the Danes by fining some, and punishing others, of the principal Authors of the Revolt, Edred advanced towards Scotland, to be reveng'd of the ungrateful Malcolm. But Malcolm seeing the Northumbrians subdued, and himself destitute of Assistance from that Quarter, concluded a Peace with Edred, paying him the Homage due to him.

This Expedition being ended, Edred return'd into Wessex, imagining he had nothing more to fear from the North. But he was unacquainted with the Danes. He had scarce begun to enjoy some Repose, when they revolted again, and recalled Anlaf. Their Measures were so just, and Anlaf's Expedition so great, that he made himself Master of the most considerable Places before Edred could draw his Army together. Whilst he was preparing to save Northumberland, Anlaf continued his Conquests and put his Affairs in such condition, that his Enemy saw no Possibility of recovering that Kingdom out of his Hands. But the turbulent and tyrannical Temper of the new King would not suffer him to treat his Subjects more gently than formerly. In a little time so strong a Party was form'd against him, that he was forc'd once more to retire to Ireland, and one Eric was plac'd on the Throne.

Mean while, part of the Northumbrians still adhering to Anlaf, Northumberland was divid'd into two Factions, who endeavouring to destroy one another, gave Edred an Opportunity, he very well knew how to improve. He march'd his Army without Loss of time into the North, whilst all was in Confusion there, and before the Northumbrians had taken any Measures to resist him (8). At his Approach, Eric fled into Scotland, leaving his People to the Mercy of Edred, who threatend utterly to destroy their Country. Though they had no room to expect a second

Pardon,

Pardon, after so notorious an Abuse of the first, yet as they had no Refuge left, they cast themselves upon Edw'd's Mercy, and amused him with the strongest Protections and most solemn Oaths. As this Prince was naturally of a generous Disposition, he was moved with their submissive Behaviour, and replaced Eric on the Throne, promising with imposing a Tribute, and making him swear Augsburg's. When he had, as he thought, allayed these Commotions, he returned towards Wexlar, marching in a cautious manner, not mistrusting any Treachery from a People that had just received such sensible Marks of his Clemency. But the Danes, who had been rather compelled by his Arms than gained by his Mildness, laid hold of the present Opportunity to attack him with Advantage.

They privately came together, and laying an Ambush in his way, suddenly fell upon his Rear, and put them in extreme Distress. Had it not been for the Valour, Conduct and Resolution of the King, his Army had infallibly been cut in Pieces; and it was not without great Difficulty, that he escaped the present Danger. Enraged at their Perfidiousness, he returned to Northumberland, with a Resolution to punish them without Mercy. His Return caused an universal Conternation. They beheld him ready to take Vengeance on them for their breach of Faith, without being able to make the least Resistance. Their Ruin was unavoidable, if they offered to defend themselves. Their Capitulation, Submission was their only Refuge. (1.)

In this extremity, Submission was the only way to save the Country. But being very sensible Edred would not be imposed upon any more by general Protestations and Oaths, she humbly implored his Pardon upon what Terms he should please to enjoin them. And to convince him further of their Sincerity, they solemnly renounced their Allegiance to Eric, and put Amac, Son of Anloff, to Death; changing them with being the principal Authors of their Treachery (2). Edred was appeased by these Submissions. However, to prevent the like Revolts, he secured all their Towns, and garrisoned them with English. After that, having entirely divested it of its Royalty, he reduced Northumberland to a Province, and made Earl Oufif, an Engllishman, the first Governor. From thenceforward the Northumberians, kept in awe by strong Garrisons and the Englsh Earls or Governors, gave England no farther Disturbance, till such time as the foreign Danes once more became Matters of Northumberland, as we shall see hereafter.

After the Northumbrians were thus quelled, Edred lived in profound Peace. Absolute Lord of all England, and dreaded by the Kings of Scotland and Wales his Neighbours, he govern'd his Dominions in perfect Tranquillity. This great Calm was the Occasion of his turning his Thoughts entirely to religious Affairs, being guided by the Advice of Dunstan Abbot of Glastenbury, who had great Influence over him. The Abbot knew so well how to improve his Credit with the King, that he became Master of his Confidence, and consequently of all State-Matters. When once a Prince suffers his Confidence to be governed by his Ghostly Father, he will find it very difficult to with-hold from him the Management of his temporal Concerns, there being hardly any one thing but what may be made to relate to Religion in some Respect or other. The Trust Edred placed in Dunstan was so great, that not content with being advis'd by him in all things, and making him Treasurer, he submitted sometimes even to receive Discipline from his Hands. He was persuaded, this blind Submission to Dunstan was the readiest way to Heaven. To gratify this Favorite it was that he undertook the re-building of St. James Church and Monastery, in a very sumptuous and magnificent manner. He laid out immense Sums upon this Work, without having the Satisfaction however to see it finished (3).

The Monks made use also of Dunstan their Protector's ^{Int} Interest, to get into the Ecclesiastical Benefices, which they ^{had} could never have done without him. Though Dunstan's Proceedings in this Affair rais'd the Clamours of the Secular Clergy, he gave himself no Trouble about them so long as he could obtain his Ends. However, his haughty manner of acting procur'd him many Enemies, who in the following Reign made him feel the Effects of their Hatred, which they had taken Care to conceal during Edward's Life. If Dunstan favoured the Monks, they were no less zealous upon all Occasions to promote his Glory. They every where proclaimed that Dunstan was a great Saint, that Heaven daily wrought Miracles in his Favour, and that he was frequently honoured with divine Revelations. In their Account, neither the Saints of the first Rank, nor the Apostles themselves were Parallels of so many Graces as he. Though all they said of this Prelate was as ^{great} rated to the last Degree, it fail'd not however to make Impression on the Minds of the generality of the People, who were more easily confirm'd in their Belief of what they were told; as they who knew better things, durst not contradict the Monks, for fear of incurring the Displeasure of the King and his Favorite.

Had Adred lived any time, Dunstan and the Monks would doubtless have carried all before them. But this Prince died when the Monks were but just beginning to creep into the benefices. Those Hilfrics who have made it their Buſineſs to extol the Merits and Sanctity of Dunstan, tell us, that Adred's Death was revealed to him by a Voice from Heaven, as he was coming to fee him. They add, his Horſe fell down dead under him, at the prodigious Noiſe, the Voice made (4). But judicious Authors have taken care not to ſuff their Writings with Tales of this Nature.

Edred reigned but ten Years (5). Elfrid and Bedfrid, ^{Elfrid the} his two Sons, whom he left very young, did not succeed him. His Nephew Edwy, Son of Edmund his elder Brother, was placed on the Throne after him. This Election, by the way, seems equally to favour those who are of Opinion, that in the Saxon times the Succession to the Crown depended entirely on the Suffrages of the Clergy and Nobility, and those who maintain it belonged of right to the next Heir. On one hand, we find Edred's Sons deprived by the great Men of the King their Father's Inheritance, and at the same time, the Crown given to the Son of the elder Brother, in prejudice of those of the younger.

We find in one of Edred's Charters, that he took the Title of Monarch of Albin; and in another, that he styled himself King of Great Britain (6), in which he was followed by Edgar his Nephew. If these Charters were not forged, it may be inferred from thence, that Edred subdued Scotland. But this is no proper Place to examine this matter, which has caused such warm Disputes between the English and Scots. However this be, the Title Edred and Edgar affected to use, was neglected by their Successors, till the time of James I., about the end of the sixteenth Century.

E*DWY* (7) came to the Crown at fourteen Years of Age, with very different Notions of Dunstan from those of his Predecessor. Whether he was prepossessed by the Enemies of that Minister, or had some particular Cause of Complaint against him, he was no sooner on the Throne, but he ordered him to give an Account of the Sums the late King had entrusted him with. Dunstan replied, the Money that had passed thro' his Hands, having been laid out in pious Uses, he was not accountable for an Administration solely relating to Reli-to reverse whatever had been done in favour of the Monks. Accordingly, the Monks were turned out of their Benefices, and the secular Priests put in their room. By this notable Proceeding, three things were intended: First, to mortify Dunstan, which it must do in a very sensible manner. Secondly, to lessen the People's Esteem for him, since the pulling down what he had set up, was a clear Evidence, the Court had no very great Opinion of his Sanctity. Besides, the restoring the Benefices to the secular Clergy, plainly intimated it was wrong to dispossess them. Lastly, as Dunstan and the Monks were in strict Union, their Disgrace could not but reflect upon him. The Persecutions of the most cruel Tyrants against the Church, never extorted from the primitive Christians such bitter Invectives, as this pretended Persecution did from the Monks. As they represent the matter, Religion was never in so great danger. The most pernicious Heresies were nothing in comparison of what was then acted. The Monks of Malmesbury, who were the most concerned, made the greatest Noise of all, and for that Reason were turned out of their Monastery, which was given to the secular Priests. William of Malmesbury upon this Occasion says, that after it had been inhabited by Monks two hundred and seventy Years, it was made a Stable of Clerks (1). Whether Dunstan stirred up the Monks to make these Complaints, or the charging him with it was made a Pretence to punish him, he was banish'd the Kingdom. Some say he voluntarily went into Exile, without any previous Condemnation. However this be, he retired to a Monastery in Flanders (2), where he lived in Expectation of being recalled by some favorable turn of Affairs.

Dunstan's Enemies gloried in his Disgrace. The King himself was highly delighted with being freed from a Man whom he hated, and who, in the former Reign, had shewn him Marks of Disrespect. But he soon learnt how dangerous such kind of Enemies are. He found, by fatal Experience, there is no giving Offence to Ecclesiastics with Impunity, and to Saints least of all others. The Monks, enrag'd to the last Degree for the Loss of their Benefices, cried down, to the utmost of their Power, the Administration of the young King, whom they look'd upon as the principal Author of their Disgrace. By their Lies and Calumnies which they every where spread, they at length persuaded their Votaries, he was the most impious of Men. The Consequence of which was, that great Numbers of Malecontents appear'd in Mercia, of whom Edgar, the King's Brother, was declared Head and Protector. Perhaps he was made to believe, by the Suggestions of the Monks, that he would do God service in deposing his wicked Brother: Or rather, he used that Pretence to mount the Throne, of which he had yet but a very distant Prospect. However this be, having secur'd Mercia, he went into Northumberland and East Anglia, where he found the Danes ready to join him. They desired nothing more than to see the English involved in Trouble and Confusion. This Insurrection was the more surprising to Edwy, as he had never given his People, much less his Brother, any just Cause of Complaint. Besides, he never imagined the Monks could have Interest enough to raise so great Disturbances. However, it was but too true, and as he was taken unprepared, he was not in condition to extinguish the Flame already kindled. In this Extremity, not knowing how to recover what he had lost, he chose to reduce himself to the sole Kingdom of Wessex, which continued faithful to him, and deliver up all the rest.

In the mean time the Rebels, dreading to fall again under the Dominion of Edwy, came to a Resolution of having a King of their own, whose Interest would oblige him to protect and defend them. But as they were a mixture of English and Danes, each Nation was desirous the Choice should fall on one of their Countrymen. The Danes, to attain their Ends, endeavoured to make it believed, that the only way to be safe from Edwy's Attacks, was to call in the Assistance of Denmark. But in truth, their Aim was only to carry the Election. The English, on the contrary, perceiving their Intent, did all they could to hasten the Election, representing how fatal their present State of Anarchy might prove. But the more forward the English appeared to be, the more full of Delays were the Danes, who daily raised fresh Obstacles, in hopes there would be a Necessity at last of sending for Aid from Denmark. At length, after a Year spent in Debates, Edwy making no Efforts for the Recovery of his Dominions, and consequently the Assistance of Denmark becoming unnecessary, Prince Edgar was chosen with the Title of King of Mercia, by which was meant all the Country lying North of the Thames, except the ancient Kingdom of Essex. To heighten the Merit of the new King, it was given out that whilst the great Men were deliberating on the Choice of a King, a Voice was heard from Heaven, commanding them to elect Edgar. The Revelation was easily swallowed by the People, at a time when it was the general Opinion that every the least remarkable Event, was attended by some Miracle.

EDWY in Essex. EDGAR in Mercia.

THIS Partition of England lasted not long. The being deprived of the Kingdom of Mercia, and the seeing the Monks triumphing over his Misfortunes, fat so heavy upon Edwy's Mind, that he fell into an excess of Melancholy, which brought him to his Grave, after he had reigned four Years and some Months (3). If we believe the Monkish Writers, Edwy was a very wicked Prince. Indeed, how was it possible for a King that did not please them, to be reckoned otherwise? However, when we examine all they say to blacken his Reputation, we find but one Thing which can have any Foundation, and which after all has very much the Air of a Fiction, or at least, is greatly aggravated. They say, he kept the Wife of one of his Courtiers for his Mistress, and on the very Day of the Coronation, whilst the great Men were debating the Affairs of the Kingdom, he abruptly withdrew to the Apartment of this Woman, from whence he was brought back by Dunstan, who alone had the Boldness to reprimand him for this infamous Action (4). From that time, if we may believe them, the King and his Mistress were so incensed against this holy Man, that they would have proceeded to the taking away his Life, had he not prevented their wicked Design by voluntary Exile. But to give still a more convincing Proof of the Dissoluteness of Edwy, and the Holiness of Dunstan, they have vented a Thing which plainly shows what Spirit they were of. They say, after Edwy's Death, his Soul being dragged into Hell by a Legion of Devils, one of them was dispatched with the good News to Dunstan. But far from rejoicing at it, the Saint prayed intensely for the Soul that was going to be eternally miserable, that God, moved by his Zeal, snatched it from the Devils, and translated it into Paradise. This last Instance of the Ammofity of the Monks against Edwy, renders their charge of Adultery very suspicious, especially if we consider he was not above fourteen Years of Age when he ascended the Throne. Moreover, there are Historians who assure us, this pretended Mistress was his lawful Wife (5). However this be, we may be certain Edwy might have had one or more Mistresses without all that Clamour against him, had he been a Favourer of the Monks. For they were not at all offended at the Amours of his Brother Edgar, who was much more guilty than he in that Respect. But the one was their Friend, and the other their Enemy. All Historians however have not been guilty of this Injustice to Edwy. Some have been more favourable to him, either passing over in Silence these frivolous Accusations, or giving him the Commendation he deserved (6).

thousand Pounds, besides Holy-Vessels, Shrines, Relicks, and the like. This was a very great Sum, considering that Houfe had been re-built but thirty Years. Hence may be gueſs'd the immense Riches of the Monasteries in thoſe Days.

Edgar, not content with being thus liberal to the Monks, undertook to put them in Poſſeſſion again of the Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, which he performed with a high Hand. Dunſtan, whom he had made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was the principal Author of this Project. This Prelate was ſo much in his Favour, that Edgar's Affection to him was nothing in Compariſon of Edgar's. As he made a very conſiderable Figure both in this and the following Reign, it will not be improper to take a nearer View of him. Beſides he paſſed for a Saint of the firſt Claſs, and nothing can be added to the Praiſes beſtowed on him by Hiſtorians.

Dunſtan, Son of Herſtan, and Nephew of Abeltham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Glaſſenbury in 925. He ſpent his youthful Years with his Uncle the Archbiſhop, who took care to have him inſtructed in all the Sciences, as far as that Age of Ignorance would permit. He excelled particularly in Muſick, Painting, and Engraving, in which he took great Delight all his Life. As ſoon as he had finiſhed his Studies, the Archbiſhop recommended him to King Abeltham, who ſent for him to Court, but however gave him no Preferment. The Author of his Life (1) pretends, the Courtiers envying his Virtue and Learning, maliciously repreſented him to the King as a diſſolute and ſcandalous Liver: Which the King believing, forſook him the Court, without examining the Truth. Some time after the Archbiſhop finding means to undeceive the King, Dunſtan was reſtored to Favour, and preſented with ſome Lands near Glaſſenbury. Here he ſpent ſeveral Years in Retirement, with certain devout Men, whom he had drawn thither, living with them a ſort of monaſtick Life. Glaſſenbury was antiently a ſmall Church, founded, according to the vulgar Opinion, by Joleph of Arimathea, as hath been obſerved elſewhere. This Church having been deſtroyed, Edgar Biſhop of St. David's built another in the ſame Place. This being alſo gone to Ruin, was repaired by twelve Devout Perſons, who coming from Armorica, ſettled in this Place. Ina King of Wexſex, having pulled it down to the Ground, raiſed a ſtately Church, and dedicated it to Chriſt, St. Peter and St. Paul. Several Perſons famous for their Piety, moſt of them Iriſh, retired to this Church, where they were maintained by Edgar's Bounty. From that time there were always Devout Perſons, who made choice of this Place for their Retreat (2).

After Dunſtan had been ſome time at Glaſſenbury, Edmund, Succeſſor of Abeltham, having conceived an Eſteem for him, built there a Monastery (3), and made him Abbot. As Dunſtan was a Perſon of great Addreſs, he knew how to manage this Prince ſo dexterouſly, that he was very much in Favour all his Reign. His Interſt at Court ſtill encreaſed under Edred, to whom he was Prime Miniſter, Favourite and Father Confeſſor. Dunſtan's extreme fondneſs for a monaſtick Life, made him uſe, without any Caution, all his Interſt to reſtore the Monks to the Benefices and eſt of the Secular Priſts, whom he heartily deſpised and at length mortally hated. This Attachment to the Monks, added to his haughty Carriage, procured him abundance of Enemies, and drew upon him the Diſpleaſure of Edwy, Succeſſor of Edmund, as we have ſeen. The haſte Edgar was in to recall this Abbot from Flanders, is a clear Evidence, he was indebted to him for the Crown of Mercia. Upon Dunſtan's return to England, Edgar promoted him to the See of Worceſter. Some time after, the Biſhoprick of London being vacant, he was truſted with the Management of it. This has led ſome Writers into the Miſtake of imagining he was Biſhop of Worceſter and London at the ſame Time. Edgar never ceaſed to give him freſh marks of his Eſteem; and his high conceit of him was the more confirmed by the Miracles attributed to him. The Monks took all imaginable care to ſpread the Fame of theſe Miracles every where, and were ſo very particular in their Circumſtances, that one muſt have been much freer from Prejudice than they generally were in thoſe Days, not to have believed them. It is however very unlikely that Edgar himſelf, who was not of the number of thoſe weak People that ſuffer themſelves to be deceived, was thoroughly convinced of the Truth of thoſe Miracles. But perhaps he was of opinion Pious Frauds were no detriment to Religion. Beſides, he had a very great opinion of Dunſtan's Piety. After Abeltham's Death, Odo, by Birth a Dane, was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, but lived not long after his Inſtallation. To him ſucceeded Elfin, who died as he was going to Rome for his Pall (4). This happening in the beginning of Edgar's Reign, Brithelm Biſhop of Ruth was elected to the vacant See. But Edgar being deſirous of having Dunſtan Archbiſhop, called a general Council, where he repreſented Brithelm as unqualified for ſo great a Poſt; whereupon he was ordered to return to his old Diocèſe, and Dunſtan was choſen in his Room. This Election not being exactly Cannical, it was thought fit Dunſtan ſhould go to Rome, on pretence of receiving his Pall, that he might at the ſame Time juſtify theſe Proceedings. The Pope, who was not ignorant how great a Sway Dunſtan bore at the Court of England, and with what Zeal he had eſpouſed the Interſt of the Church of Rome and the Monks, readily confirmed his Election, conſtituting him moreover his Legate for England, with a very extenſive Authority. At his Return, Oſwald's Relation was through his means made Biſhop of Worceſter, and Ethelwald his intimate Friend, of Wincheſter. Theſe three Prelates, by holding together, intirely governed the Church during Edgar's Reign. Edgar committing to them the Management of all Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, was not contented with granting whatever they deſired, but even took a Pleaſure in doing them Favours, unasked.

As ſoon as Dunſtan ſaw his Credit firmly eſtabliſhed, he returned to his grand Project in favour of the Monks, which he had been forced to lay aſide during the Reign of Edwy. This Affair was not without its Difficulties. The great Men of the Nation looked upon it as a Miſfortune, that the guidance of the Churches ſhould be wreſted out of the Hands of the antient and lawful Governors. They were ſtill leſs pleaſed with its being committed to the Monks, who, by the Rules of their Order, and according to the Cuſtom hitherto obſerved, were excluded from the Pafſoral Functions, in order to employ themſelves wholly in Prayer within the Walls of their Monasteries. Beſides, they were of opinion, that inſtead of encouraging and enriching the Monks, it would be much better to put a ſtop to the People's Zeal, who were perpetually bequeathing to them conſiderable Legacies, whereby Eſtates were paſſed away in Mortmain, to the great Prejudice of the Nation. It was eaſy therefore to ſee this Project would meet with great Oppoſition from the Nobles. But on the other Hand, the People, who did not look ſo far before them, were intirely in the Interſt of the Monks, and extremely offended at the ſcandalous Lives of the ſecular Clergy, who applied the Revenues of the Church to uſe directly contrary to the intent of the Donors (5). It muſt be confeſt, the Clergy, at that Time were full of Ill-Vices, and that Pride, Avarice, Gluttony, Drunkenneſs, Luxury, openly reigned among them. Dunſtan and his Party did all that lay in their Power to expoſe theſe Irregularities, in order to irritate the People againſt their Pafſors. They ſucceeded ſo well in their Deſign, that Multitudes eſpouſed the Cauſe of the Monks, purely out of contempt of the ſecular Clergy. But what did the Monks moſt Service, was the King's being ſo vigorous a Champion for them. His good Opinion of them was ſtill increaſed by comparing them with the ſeculars, who indeed obſerved no Meaſures in their Exceſſes. And therefore this Prince thought to do the Church ſignal ſervice in putting it under the Government of the Monks, whom he looked upon as ſo many Saints. Edgar being thus inclined, Dunſtan found no Difficulty to perſuade him to countenance a Reformation he believed ſo advantageous to the Church. To give the finiſhing ſtroke to this Work, he cauſed a Council to be aſſembled, in hopes their Authority, together with the King's, would ſurmount all Obſtacles. Edgar was pleaſed to aſſiſt in Perſon at this Council, and made a Speech, which plainly ſhewed how greatly he was prejudic'd in his Favour. As this Harangue manifeſtly diſcovers the Diſpoſition of the King, of Dunſtan, and of the other Directors of the Affairs of the Church, with regard to the ſecular Clergy, it

Edgar's Harangue to the Clergy.
Falsely represented,
p. 360.

"Almighty God having vouchsafed of his infinite Mercy to shew his Goodness to us in a remarkable manner, 'tis most reasonable, Reverend Fathers, we should exert our Endeavours to make a suitable Return. That we are in Possession of this plentiful Country is not owing to the Strength of our own, but to the Help of his all-powerful Arm, who has been pleased to manifest his Loving-kindness towards us. 'Tis but just therefore we should bring ourselves, our Souls and Bodies in Subjection to him, who has subdued all things for us, and should take care that all that are under us should be obedient to his Laws. It is my Office, Reverend Fathers, to administer Justice without respect of Persons; to suppress the Rebellious; to punish the Sacrilegious; to protect the Poor and Weak from the Hand of the Oppressor. It is my Business also to take Care that the Church and her Ministers, the holy Fraternities of the Religious, have all things necessary to their Subsistence and well-being. But it is your Duty to examine into the Life and Conversation of the Clergy. To you it belongs to see that they live agreeably to their Profession: That they are sober, temperate, chaste, hospitable to the Poor and the Stranger: That they are careful in the Administration of their Office, constant in their Instructions to the People. In a Word, that they are worthy of the glorious Character of the Ministers of Jesus Christ. With submission be it spoken, Reverend Fathers, had you taken due care of these things, I should not have had the Dissatisfaction of hearing from all Hands the enormous Crimes daily committed by the Clergy of this Land. I insist not on the Smallness of their Tonsure, contrary to the Canons of the Church, or their Effeminacy in their Habits, on their Haughtiness in their Gestures, on their immodest Discourses, which plainly shew all is not right within. I omit their Negligence with regard to Divine Service: Hardly will they vouchsafe their Company at the public Prayers, and when they come to Church to celebrate the Holy Mysteries, one would think they are going to act a Play. But the chief Subject of my Complaint, I speak it with extreme Regret, is what ministers occasion of Grief to the Good, and of Joy to the Prophane, I mean the lewd and scandalous Lives of the Clergy. They spend their Days in Diversions, Entertainments, Drunkenness and Debauchery. Their Houses may be said to be so many Sinks of Lewdness, Public Stages, and receptacles of Libertines. There they have Gaming, Dancing, and obscene Singing. There they pass the Night in Rioting and Drunkenness. 'Tis thus, Reverend Fathers, 'tis thus the Bounty of my Predecessors to the Church, and their Charities for the Maintenance of the Poor; and what is more, the adorable Blood of our Saviour, are consumed? Was it for this that our Ancestors exhorted their Treasures? Was it for this they were so liberal of their Estates? Was it to deck the Concubines of the Priests, to provide for them splendid Entertainments, to furnish them with Dogs and Hawks, that our Forefathers display'd their Munificence to the Church? These are the Crimes which the People complain of in private, and the Soldiers in public; which are sung in the Streets, and acted on the Stage; and yet they are forgiven, they are overlook'd, they are conniv'd at by you! Where is now the Sword of Levi, and the Zeal of Simeon? Where is the Wrath of Moses against the Worshippers of the Golden Calf? Where is the Indignation of St. Peter against Simon the Magician? Imitate, Reverend Fathers, imitate the Zeal of these holy Persons, and follow the way of Righteousness, shewn you by the Lord. It is high time for you to draw the Sword of St. Peter, whilst I make use of the great Constantine's. Let us join our Forces to expel the Lepers out of the Temple, to cleanse the Sanctuary, and to cause the Lord to be served by the true Sons of Levi, who said to his Fathers, and to his Mothers, I know you not, and to his Brethren, I know not who you are? Let the Disrespect to the Relicks of the Saints, and the daily Profaning of the holy Altars, rouse you up. Be moved at the great Abuse of the Piety of our Forefathers. One of our Ancestors, you all know, dedicated to the Church the Tithes of the Kingdom: The glorious Alfred, my great Grandfather, laid out his Revenues in religious Uses. You are not ignorant of the great Benefactions of my Father and Uncle, which it would be highly dishonourable for soon to forget, seeing the Altars are still adorned with them. You, Dunstan, Father of Fathers, raise your Imagination a little I pray you, and fancy you behold my Father looking down from Heaven, and expostulating with you in this Manner: It was you that advis'd me to the Building of so many Churches and Monasteries. It was you I made Choice of for my spiritual Guide, and the Inspector of my Behaviour. Did not I always obey your Voice? Did I not always prefer your Advice before Wealth? How frankly did I lay out my Treasures, when you said the Word? My Charities were always ready when you call'd for them. Whatever was desired for the Church was immediately granted. If you complain'd the Monks were short in their Conveniences, they were forthwith supplied. You us'd to tell me, such Liberalities brought forth immortal Fruit, and were highly meritorious, since they were expended in supporting the Servants of God, and maintaining the Poor. And is it not an intolerable Shame they should be laid out in adorning and decking a Pack of Prostitutes? Are these the Fruits of my Benefactions? Are these the Effects of your glorious Promises? These, O Dunstan, are the Complaints of the King my Father. What can you answer to this Charge? I am convinced that you have hitherto been unblameable, when you saw a Thief you confin'd not to him, neither have you been partaker with the Adulterer. No, you have endeavour'd to correct these Abuses. You have argued, exhorted, threaten'd. But since these means have proved in vain, 'tis time to apply more effectual Remedies. You have here ready to assist you the Reverend Father Ethelwald Bishop of Winchester, and the venerable Oswald Bishop of Worcester. To you three I refer the Management of this important Affair. Exert the Episcopal in Conjunction with the Royal Authority, to expel from the Church of God the disorderly Clergy, and put in such as live regularly in their Room (1).

After the King had made so full a Declaration of his Mind, the Friends of the Seculars durst no longer oppose Dunstan's Designs, perceiving it would be to no purpose. Shortly after, the secular Priests were expell'd from the Monasteries, and the Regulars put in their Place. Ethelwald Bishop of Winchester leading the way in his Diocese, was quickly followed by Dunstan and Oswald, and all the other Bishops, who being Monks, without much Solicitation, imitated these three Prelates. The antient Histrorians, for the most part, represent those Days as the Golden Age, and as the happiest England ever knew.

Perhaps it will seem strange that the secular Clergy should at this time be more bitterly inveig'd against than in the following Centuries, when the Lives of the Priests were no less scandalous. To account for this, it must be observed, the Popes had for some time prohibited the Clergy from marrying, and were very severe to all who refused to comply with their Decrees. This Prohibition, which at present is a fundamental Article in the Church of Rome, met at first with great Opposition, especially in England, which set the Pope upon using all means to bring the English Priests to a Compliance. Dunstan's Interest, and his Address to engage Edgar in the Project, were mighty Helps to them. We must therefore carry in our Minds this Prohibition against the Clergy's marrying, in order to comprehend the Occasion of the Complaints of the Monks and their Favourers against the Seculars, and to judge how far they are to be credited. Though it is but too true, the Priests at that time led very disorderly Lives, yet that was not the thing that drew this Storm upon them. It was their Marriage which gave the Offence, and which their Enemies would fain have to be thought a more heinous Crime than Concubinage, or any other they could lay to their Charge. Their Wives were always called Concubines, or by a more opprobrious Name. But notwithstanding all the Endeavours of the Court of Rome, this pretended Abuse could not be reformed till the End of the twelfth Century, when the Celibacy of the Clergy was established after a three hundred Years Struggle.

The Monks were bound in Gratitude to make a suitable Offer-Return for the Service Edgar had done them. Accordingly the Monkish Historians have endeavour'd by their eulogies and Commendations, to make him pass for a real Saint. But to enquire whether for want of Attention, or some other Reason, they have related some Particulars of his Life, which beget not that Idea, they intended to give of him. Indeed, to consider only his Political Actions, it must be confess'd, he was a great Prince. But a great King and a great Saint, are two very different Characters. For Instance, it is dif-

(1) Edgar in reciting this Speech is rais'd and polish'd in the Original above the Elevation of the Tenth Century; and therefore says, he should have been present, if you might have wak'd the Matter he touch'd into a brighter Form, had he not met with this Harangue in Ricardus's, an antient Historian.

scult to justify, by the Rules of the Gospel, a bloody Execution (1) done by Edgar's Order in the Life of Thanet, upon a very slight Occasion, as Historians do allow. What might not these same Historians have said of his unruly Lust, and vicious Inclination of Women (2), of which I am now going to give a few Instances; who published to the World that the Soul of his Brother Edwy was about to be dragged into Hell for having had but a single Mistress?

It is easy to see, if Edgar had not purchased the good Opinion of the Monks by his excessive Complaisance, they would have given him no better Quarter than his Predecessor, who was much less faulty in that respect.

To conclude the Reign of Edgar, which was disturbed neither by foreign nor domestic Wars, it remains only that I give an account of his Amours, which are something uncommon, and shew his good Qualities were not without a great mixture of Failings. His first Mistress was a Nun (3), whom he took by Force out of a Convent, and could not be prevail'd with to send back again by the Solicitations of Dunstan. He had a Daughter by her nam'd Editha, who was greatly celebrated for her Sanctity. It is true, he aton'd for his Crime by not wearing his Crown during the Space of seven Years. A severe Penance indeed for a Fault, his Confessor ought to have looked upon as a Sacrilege! But this is not the first time the Sins of Princes have been extenuated, and the rigour of their Penance magnified. His second Mistress, whom some however call his lawful Wife, was Elfrida, firm'd the Fair, from her Complexion. By her he had a Son call'd Edward, who succeeded him. An extraordinary Adventure gain'd him a third Mistress. Going one Day by Andover, he took up his Lodging at a Lord's House, who had a very beautiful Daughter, with whom he fell passionately in Love at first Sight. As he was very violent in his Passions, he resolv'd to gratify his Love without delay, so commanded the young Lady to be brought to his Bed, without troubling himself to obtain her Consent. The Mother of the Lady being utterly against her Daughter's being the King's Concubine; but withal, dreading, by her Demol, to draw down his Displeasure upon herself and Family, devis'd this Expedient. She prevail'd upon one of her waiting Women to lie with the King instead of her Daughter. At break of Day the King perceiving his Bedfellow was going to rise, would not let her, by which means she was forc'd to discover the Cheat. He was at first very angry at being thus deceiv'd. But the good-looking he had taken to the Girl, moderating his Anger, and giving him time to reflect on the Dishonour he intended his Host, he readily forgave the Trick he had been serv'd. He kept this Girl as his Mistress till he married.

As all Edgar's Amours, it seems, were to have something particular in them, so his very Marriage was not to be in the common way. He was inform'd that Ordang, Earl of Devonshire, had a Daughter the greatest Beauty in England, upon which he resolv'd to marry her, if he answer'd the Description given of her. However, as he was unwilling to make any Advances he might have reason to repent of, he communicated his Design to Earl Ethelwald his Favourite, and order'd him to go upon some pretence, and see whether the Lady's Beauty was as great as Fame reported. Ethelwald being arriv'd at the Earl of Devonshire's, had no sooner cast his Eyes on Elfrida his Daughter, but he fell desperately in Love with her. His Passion was so sudden and violent, that forgetting all the King his Master's Favours, he demand'd Elfrida for himself. His Suit being granted, he was married as privately as possible, making his Father-in-law believe he had important Reasons for not divulging his Marriage. Returning soon after to Court, he told the King there was nothing extraordinary in Elfrida; that he was amazed the World should talk so much of her Charms; that in all Appearance, the Fame of her Beauty was owing more to her Father's Riches than any thing else. This Report, which was far from inflaming the King's Love, had the Effect Ethelwald expected. Edgar, growing out of Concert with the Match, laid aside all Thoughts of it. Ethelwald perceiving the King was grown perfectly cool upon the matter, represent'd to him one Day, that though the Fortune of the Earl of Devonshire's Daughters was nothing to a King, yet it would be the making of a Subject; and therefore humbly desir'd his Leave to make his Addresses to her, as being the greatest Heiress in the Kingdom. Edgar, who had lost all Inclination to Elfrida, very willingly granted his Favourite's Request, and even appear'd extremely well pleas'd that he was likely to marry to so great an Advantage. Ethelwald, as soon as he had obtained the King's Consent, return'd to his Wife, and publicly solemniz'd his Wedding. But fearing his Spouse should appear too beautiful in the King's Eyes, he kept her on some pretence at his Country Seat, without suffering her to come to Court.

How cautious soever Ethelwald had been, it was not possible his Treachery should be long a Secret. Favourites are seldom without private Enemies, who desire nothing more than to have an Opportunity of ruining them. Edgar at length was inform'd of the Truth; but dissembling his Repentment, he was willing, before he shew'd it, to be satisfied with his own Eyes of the Truth of what had been told him. To that end, he took Occasion to go into those Parts where Ethelwald kept his Wife, and when he came near the place, told him he had a mind to visit his Lady, of whom he had formerly heard so many fine things. Ethelwald was thunder-struck at this, and did all he could to divert the King from his purpose; but his Artifices were all in vain, and serv'd only to confirm the King the more in his Resolution. 'All he could obtain, was Leave to go before, on pretence of preparing for the King's Reception. As soon as he came home, he threw himself at his Lady's Feet, and confessing what he had done for the sake of possessing her, conjur'd her to use all her Endeavours to conceal her Charms from the amorous King. Elfrida promised him whatever he desired, but was bent however to break her Word. No sooner was he gone to meet the King, but she set off her natural Beauty with all the Art she was Mistress of. The Event answer'd her Expectation. The moment Edgar cast his Eyes on her, he fell desperately in Love, and from that instant was resolv'd to make her his Wife. The better to effect his Design, he pretended to see nothing extraordinary in Elfrida's Beauty; at which the Husband was overjoyed. Accordingly, he took his Leave of her with a seeming Indifference, but at the same time in his Heart rag'd Love and Revenge; which of all the Passions rais'd the most violent Emotions in the Soul of Man. Quickly after, he order'd Ethelwald to go for Northumberland, on pretence of some urgent Affairs. But the unfortunate Earl never perform'd his Journey. He was found dead in a Wood, where he was thought at first to be murdered by Robbers. But People's Eyes were soon open'd, when they saw that the King, instead of making Inquiry after the Murderers, married the Widow. Some say, that Edgar slew Ethelwald with his own Hand at a hunting Match (4).

After what has been said, it is easy to see, there was Edgar's a great Mixture of good and bad Qualities in this Prince. Character and that the Commendations given him, are in many Respects carried too far. This was the Effect of the Prejudice of the Monks in his Favour, for his so vigorous espousing their Cause. This Prejudice was so great that S. Dunelm one of them makes no Scruple to say, Edgar was to the Brompt. English, what Remulus was to the Romans, Cyrus to the Perfians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arjaces to the Parthians, and Charlemain to the French. But one plainly perceives, this Encomium raises his Character too high, since he came infinitely short of the great Men he is compared with. Accordingly, After-Ages, less prepossessed in his Favour, have ranked him among more suitable Company, in a much lower Class. Very judicious Historians have taken him from among the Saints, where his Flatterers placed him, and have not scrupled to rank him in the number of the vilest of Princes (5). This Notion of Brompt, him may be grounded on what is related of Canutus the 909. Great, who upon mention of the Sanctity of Editha, Edgar's Daughter, said, He could never believe it possible for the Daughter of so wicked a Father to be a Saint. This leaves room to suspect, the Monkish Historians have pass'd over in silence several of Edgar's Actions, which would have made us conceive a very different Idea of their Hero, from what they have given us.

Edgar reigned sixteen Years from the Death of his Brother Edwy. He died in 975, in the thirty second Year of his Edgar's Age, leaving two Sons and a Daughter. Edward, his eldest Son, was born of a Concubine, or at least of a very doubt- Children

(1) Edgar in the Saxon Annals, Anno 969, is said to have order'd all Thow to be laid waste. Brompt says, it was for inflicting his Laws. M. Wotton says, it was for having and punishing some Ten Merchants that touch'd upon the Island.

(2) Melinsbury owns, that he was reported to have been Lefevre and Grail. p. 59.

(4) Melinsbury says, he took Ethelwald into a Wood (Harwood Forest) upon pretence of Hunting, and killed him there with his Lance. The natural Son of this Norman beginning to come in at this Accident, and viewing the dead Body of his Father, the King sternly asked him, How he dur'd the Game? The Youth replied calmly, that whatever pleas'd the King, ought not to be disputing to him. This easy Answer, on so moving an Occasion, surpris'd the King, and gave him a strong Affection for the young Man ever after. Elfrida built a Nunnery in the Place where her Husband was slain. Melinsbury says, Edgar was slain. Melinsbury says, Edgar was slain.

refresh himself. But as the King's Design was only to pay his Respects to his Mother-in-law as he went by her Castle, he only desired a Glass of Wine to drink her Health. Whether Elfrida had already form'd a Design of destroying the King, to make way for her Son to the Crown, or that favorable Opportunity put the Thought in her Head, the young King had no sooner lifted the Glass to his Mouth, than a Ruffian stab'd him in the Back with a Dagger (1). Perceiving himself wounded, he set Spurs to his Horse, which soon carried him out of Sight. But not being able to keep his Saddle by reason of the Loss of Blood, he fell off his Horse. To complete his Misfortunes, his Foot hung in the Stirrup, and by that means he was dragg'd a good way before his Horse stopp'd, just by a poor blind Woman's Houfe that stood in the Road. To this Houfe, the People sent after him by Elfrida tracing him by his Blood, found him dead, and his Body miserably torn. Elfrida imagining she could conceal this horrid Deed, known only to her Domesticks, order'd the Corps to be thrown into a Well. But it was found there a few Days after, and carried to Warham (2), from whence it was remov'd to Shaftsbury, and laid in a Monastery founded by King Afred. It is pretended to have worked many Miracles there; that a blind Man was restor'd to his Sight, and a Cripple to his Limbs, by only touching the Body. The poor Woman also, in whose Houfe his Body lay one Night, is said to be cur'd by his Intercession; and the Well into which he was thrown, endued with the Virtue of healing several sorts of Distempers. In fine, it is reported that Elfrida, curious to know herself the Truth of these Miracles, resolv'd to go to the place, but her Horse, in spite of all her Endeavours, would not stir one Step forward. With such Prodiges as these do the Histories of those Times abound. Thus far is certain, Elfrida, willing to atone for her Crime, founded two Nunneries, one at Ambrosbury (3), and another at Wharwel near Andover. In this last she shut herself up, in order to do Penance the Residue of her Days. She is said to have frequently cover'd her Body all over with little Croffes to keep off the Devil, whom she had but too much reason to fear.

I do not know upon what Foundation Edward was made both a Saint and a Martyr, unless it was pretended, he was murder'd out of Revenge for his great Affection to Dunstan and the Monks. Indeed that was sufficient then to procure him these glorious Titles. It is certain, in those Days all the Favours of the Monks pass'd for so many Saints, and their Enemies for the Objects of God's Wrath. However this be, the young Prince, whose Reign I have gone through, is generally known by the Name of Edward the Martyr (4).

STATE of the Church of ENGLAND,

FROM THE

Union of the Seven Kingdoms, to the End of the Reign of EDWARD the Martyr.

THE continual Wars in England during the hundred and fifty Years we have just run through, were no less fatal to the Church than the State. They produced an extreme Corruption of Manners, and a profound Ignorance all over the Kingdom. The Destruction of the Churches and Monasteries, the plundering what was designed for their Subsistence, and the Necessity of defending themselves against the Danes, and of being wholly employed in the Exercise of Arms, turned Multitudes from the Study of Religion. It is no wonder therefore, if during such troublesome times, we meet with very few Materials for an Ecclesiastical History. To this may be added, the greatest part of the Monasteries, where the Memoirs of what pass'd in Church and State were laid up, having been demolished, the Historians who have wrote of those times, were deprived of that Assistance. The Reader therefore must expect to find but few remarkable Events relating to Religion, but few Councils to inform us of the Doctrine and Faith of the Church of England, and but very few learned Men, whose Writings might afford us some light. It will be necessary however to relate the principal Circumstances transmitted down to us, as they will be of service in clearing the Events of future and more happy times.

During the Reign of Egbert, nothing happened in the Church worth Notice. Ethelwulph's Reign furnishes us with a Subject, which, though mentioned elsewhere, it will not be amiss to speak a little more largely of in this place;

I mean the Grant of the Tithes. The Charter runs thus:

"I, ETHELWULPH, by the Grace of God King of the West-Saxons, &c. with the Advice of the Bishops, Earls, and all other Persons of Distinction in my Dominions, have, for the Health of my Soul, the Good of my People, and the Prosperity of my Kingdom taken the prudent and serviceable Resolution of granting the tenth part of the Lands throughout my whole Kingdom, to the Church and Ministers of Religion, to be enjoyed by them, with all the Privileges of a free Tenure, and discharged from all Services due to the Crown, and all other Incumbrances incident to Lay-Fees. This Grant has been made by us to the Church, in Honour of Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and All-Saints, and out of regard to the Paschal Solemnity, and that Almighty God might vouchsafe his Blessing to us and our Posterity."

Dated at the Palace of Wilton, in the Year 854, Indiction the second, at the Feast of Easter.

The Terms, Date and Subscriptions of this Charter, have induced several learned Men to believe it spurious. But without entering into the Controversy, I shall content myself with observing, that long before this Charter, the Clergy of England claimed a right to the Tithes, if they were not already in actual Possession of them.

He has likewise the Honour of standing in the Roman Martyr 1823, March 18. Where Baronius takes Notice of a Letter in Pope Innocent VI's Register, for the keeping St. Edward's Festival, Coll. 1. 3.

This is evident from the seventeenth Canon of the Council of Calcutth, held in 785, where we find they ordered the payment of Tithes from the Law of Moyse. It is true, King Ethelwulf might have a mind to confirm the Rights of the Clergy, by granting them a Charter for the Tithes. But in that case, it is something strange he should pass over in silence the Divine Right of Tithes, on which the Clergy chiefly insisted. If this Charter therefore is not to be considered as a Forgery, it seems at least to be of very doubtful Authority. Add to this, that by the tenth part of the Lands must necessarily be meant the tenth part of the Profits; which must be owned to be a very forced Interpretation, especially in a primordial Act, such as this (1).

In the Reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert and Ethelred I, we have nothing relating to the Church, but the Destruction of the Monasteries, and the pathetic Description made by the Historians, of the Danish Fury exercised upon the Monks. This they chiefly insist upon, as being, in their Opinion, the most material historical Events. They particularly lament the three famous Monasteries of Croyland, Ely and Medeshamsted, whose Monks were all massacred, and the Libraries burnt (2).

Edmund's
Martyrdom.

The pretended Martyrdom of Edmund King of East-Anglia would require our notice, had it not been spoken of elsewhere (3). I call it pretended, because it does not appear, this Prince lost his Life in any of those Causes which make the Sufferer a Martyr. Otherwise, we must say that there were in England as many Martyrs as there were Christians put to death by the Danes. However, he stands in the Calendar with that Title, and Miracles were affirmed to be frequently wrought at his Tomb during several Ages (4).

Tho' I have amply insisted on every thing relating to the Reign of Alfred, it will not be improper to remind the Reader of two things, which may be of use hereafter. The first is, the Ruin of the Monasteries; which was so great, there was not a Monk left in England, being all slain by the Danes, or forced to fly out of the Kingdom. Some of them perhaps took other Professions when they saw the loss of their Revenues had depriv'd them of their Subsistence. As soon as Alfred was rid of the Danes, he built Monasteries, and furnish'd them with foreign Monks, there being none to be found in the Kingdom. It will seem strange, no doubt, that he should chuse to be at the charge of new Monasteries, rather than repair the old, whose Walls, for the most part, were still remaining. But it must be observed, the Secular Clergy had taken possession of them, and lived there in common under the Direction of an Arch-Priest. It is plain, Alfred saw some Inconvenience in dislodging them.

The other thing I would put the Reader in mind of, is, the gross Ignorance the English were fallen into during the War with the Danes. We have already seen in the Life of Alfred, how that Prince himself complained of it; and resolved for that reason to invite into his Dominions as many learned Foreigners as possible, to found the University of Oxford (5), and use several other means to restore the Sciences in his Kingdom.

Edward the Elder, following the Example of his Father, founded, for the same reason, the University of Canterbury, as some assert (6). I shall not here allege the Arguments for and against the Antiquity of this illustrious University, as being a matter attended with great Difficulties, and besides, not immediately relating to the State of the Church. But we have another particular belonging to this Reign, where Religion is more concerned, by reason of the Consequences pretended to be drawn from thence, and which it will be proper to insist upon a little.

Malmesbury relates in his History, that in the Reign of Edward the Elder, Pope Formosus being informed, there had been a seven Years Vacancy in the West-Saxon See, sent a Bull into England, excommunicating the King and all his Subjects. Whereupon the King assembled a general Council, and Plegmund Archbishop of Canterbury, causing the Bull to be read, it was resolved, the Vacancies should be filled, and three new Sees erected in Wales. Plegmund (continues the Historian) went afterwards to Rome, to get the Curse taken off, and at his return, consecrated seven Bishops in one Day. An ancient Register of the Priory of Canterbury says much the same Thing, with this Addition, that the Council made a particular Provision for the Cornish Men to recover them from their Errors. By the way, we are to understand by the Errors of the Cornish, who were some of the Remains of the old Britons, their refusing to acknowledge the Papal Authority.

The Roman Catholic Writers make a great flourish upon this Bull, and produce it as a strong Instance of the Pope's Authority, not only over the Bishops, but the Kings of England. But after all, this Bull upon Examination will be found inconsistent with Chronology. Malmesbury dates it in 904. But Pope Formosus died in 896, and was dragged out of his Grave in 897, by Stephen his Successor. Baronius, to solve this Difficulty, says the Date in Malmesbury is false, and should be written 894 instead of 904. 'Tis true, this Correction falls the Matter right as to Formosus, but then the Cardinal falls into another Anachronism with regard to Edward, who did not ascend the Throne till the Year 900. Edward therefore must be changed into Alfred. But no Historian mentions Alfred's being excommunicated. Notwithstanding all this, they are extremely loth to part with this pretended Bull. Some have supposed two Excommunications: one by Pope Formosus in 894, against the Bishops only, without any mention of King Edward: Another by Pope John IX, which threatened the King. To support this Supposition, Malmesbury, who speaks of Formosus's Bull, and Polydore Virgil, who mentions Pope John's, are cited. But these Authorities are very insufficient, since Malmesbury is plainly mistaken, either in the date, or in the name of the Pope; and Polydore Virgil does not say it was John IX, as is pretended, but John X, that threatened Edward with Excommunication, as indeed it must be, if the Bull was dated in 904. Thus this Bull, which has been so much

(1) The Charter here translated is in the Mongueth, p. 100, and is dated at Winton in 844. Whereas there is another Charter very different from this in Ingulphus, and Matthew of Westminster, and at Winchester in 855. To solve this Difficulty, it is supposed that Ethelwulf bestowed this Grant first at Winton for the Tithes only of his own Dominions, and the Year following at Winchester for the Tithes of the whole Kingdom. Though it must be owned that they both seem'd equally to extend to all his Dominions. See Ingulph, p. 17. Edit. Gal. et Al. M. H. Soc. Hist. Ant. 534. Ingulph. 109, this Charter was made after Ethelwulf's Return from Rome; but that could not be, seeing he was then only King of Kent.

(2) See Ingulphus, p. 22, 23, 24, where you have a lamentable Account of the Destruction of these three Monasteries.

(3) Anno 945. K. Edmund I. gave one of his Royal Towns, then called Badricksforth, with divers other Lands, to build a Church and Monastery, in memory of St. Edmund the Martyr, whose Body was there enshrined; which Town was from him called St. Edmundsbury. Matt. West.

(4) Michael Walsingham says, his Head being thrown among the Briars and Thorns in the same Wood where Lodbrok was murdered by Born, the Roll Anglorum, after the Days were gone, went out to see for it, and having sought in vain for some time, the Head at last cried out, Here, here, here, and was called till they came to the Place. The Head was put to his Body, and buried with it. When they came to take up his Corpse, many Years after, it was found whole and entire, and the Head grown to the Body, without the least Scar, only a Mark round the Neck like a Scarlet Thread. Mat. West. Fl. H. Soc. Hist. Ant. 534. Ingulph. 109, this

(5) There is a Passage in Alfred's Life of K. Alfred published by Mr. Canden, p. 16, that talks of a Dispute between Gravelin, whom Alfred had sent to Oxford, and the old Scholars, settled there before. From whence it is inferred, that Alfred was not the first Founder of this University. On the other hand, it is objected, that this Passage in Alfred's Life is spurious. That it is not in the Copy published by Archbishop Parker; that Udal is a Name for its being interpreted, and that it speaks of things done after Alfred's Death, &c. It is further objected, both against the Antiquity of Canterbury, as well as Oxford, that neither of them are mentioned by Ride; that Alfred calls them Worshipful and Monks by the Danes, says not a Word of any Damage done to Oxford or Canterbury. That Alfred complains there were very few on this side the Humber that understood the Church-Prayers in English, or could enter Latin. Lastly, That had there been in then being two famous Universities in England, the Ocean was there for his scholars by sea. See Canterbury Man to indicate it is Subd. 1. The most probable Opinion therefore is, that the University of Oxford was first founded by Alfred in 896. See Br. W. H. Soc. Hist. Ant. 534. Ingulph. 109, this

(6) There is a Manuscript Charter of Privileges, lodged in the Library of Clare Hall, said to be granted to Canterbury by this King Edward. But however, some have carried back the Antiquity of this University to the Year 394 before Christ, pretending it was then founded by one Caesarius, a Spaniard, and that it was restored by Sigbert King of East-Angles, in 630, whom others account the Founder. But it is plain from the Remains in the Note above, that there was no such Thing as any University at all in Alfred's Time. And as some say, Call. Hist. Fl. H. Soc. Hist. Ant. 534. Ingulph. 109, this boasted of, falls to the Ground, as inconsistent with Chronology.

As to the Consecration of the seven Bishops mentioned by Malmshury, there is not the same reason to question the matter of fact. Tho' as to the time, this Circumstance is somewhat perplexed; it is certain however, in the beginning of the Xth Century there were six Bishops in Wessex, whereas a little before there were but three. Ralph de Diceto places the erecting of the three new Sees in 909. To reconcile this Historian with Malmshury, who fixes the date of them to 904, this expedient is proposed, which, if it has no foundation, is at least not improbable. It is thought, that in the Synod or mixt Assembly held at Winchester in 904, the erection of the three new Bishopsricks was resolved. But as these new Sees were to be taken out of the Dioceses of Worcester and Sherburn, it was agreed, this should not be done till after the death of the present Bishops, that the Revenues, they had hitherto enjoyed, might not be lessened. Both these Bishops happening to die in 909, or perhaps a little before, and the Bishopsricks of Worcester and Suffex being also vacant at the same time, Plegmund consecrated seven Bishops at once, namely, Fridstan Bishop of Winchester, Werstan of Sherburn, Kenulph of Worcester, Beornock of Selsey in Suffex, Eadulph of Crediton, or Kirtan, Athelm of Wells, and Athelstan of Petrochistow or Padstow in Cornwall. The three last Sees were the newly erected. Tho' Malmshury and Higden affirm the new erected Bishopsricks had the Pope's Confirmation, it is certain at that time, and for more than two hundred years after, there was no such thing requir'd. And therefore very probably, when these two Historians mentioned the Pope's Confirmation, they had an Eye to the Custom of their own Times.

We meet with very few particulars of Moment, except some Councils spoken of hereafter, in the Reigns of Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. The most remarkable thing was the Charter of Privileges granted by Edmund, on account of Dunstan the first Abbot, to Glastenbury Abbey, after it was re-built. These Privileges were so extensive, that the King seem'd to intend to invest the Abbot with a sort of sovereign Power within the Precincts of his Jurisdiction (1).

The Abby of Croyland was also rebuilt in the Reign of Edmund by Turketul the King's Cousin and Chancellor. He afterwards turned Monk himself, and was made Abbot by Edred, who put him in possession, by the delivery of a Pastoral Staff, according to the custom of those days. Turketul obtained a very advantageous Charter for his Abby. However, Edred refus'd to grant him the Privilege of Sanctuary, which that Abby had enjoyed before its destruction, being unwilling Malefactors should be protected from Justice.

This Prince was entirely sway'd by Dunstan, who made use of his Interest, not only to put the Monks in possession of the Abbies, which the secular Clergy had appropriated to themselves, but also of the Benefices. If Edred had not died so soon, Dunstan would doubtless have settled this Affair in such a manner, as to have made it unalterable. But this Prince dying before it could be completed, Edwy his Successor turn'd the Monks out of the Benefices, and even out of some of their Monasteries. To read the tragical Complaints of the Monkish Historians upon this occasion, and their bitter Invectives against Edwy, one would imagine this Prince had utterly rooted out the Christian Religion. Whereas upon a closer Inquiry, it will appear, the Monks were dispossessed only of the two Monasteries of Abington and Malmshury (2). This loss however was so grievous to them that they stirr'd up the Northumbrians and Mercians to a revolt, as hath been related.

It is needless to repeat here what has already been said of the great Interest of Dunstan in the reign of Edgar, and what he did in favour of the Monks. The Truth is, he can't be blamed for exerting his power in replacing them in the Monasteries. Though the religious Houses were desolated during the wars, they belonged not to the secular Clergy, since they were founded for the Monks.

But he can't be so easily excus'd, for endeavouring to introduce the Monks into the Benefices, on pretence that the secular Priests were most of them married. I shall not examine here upon what ground the Councils and Popes prohibited the Clergy from marrying. This matter has been so fully handled by several Authors, that nothing new can be added. I shall only remark, that from the Conversion of the Englisb to Dunstan's time, the Clergy of England were not oblig'd to Celibacy, and that Dunstan, undertook an unprecedented thing, when he attempted to bind them to it, in pursuance to the Papal Decrees. It has been observ'd in the reign of Edgar, how Dunstan, countenanced by that Prince, gain'd his point so far, as, not indeed to oblige them to put away their Wives, but to expel them their Benefices for keeping them. However, notwithstanding his great Interest and Affection to the Monks, he could never re-instate them in the northern Monasteries. For above two hundred years the Abbies in those parts were uninhabited, and the very name of a Monk was scarce heard of there.

I have but little to say (3) concerning the new Bishopsricks, or the removal of the Episcopal Sees from one place to another, at a time when one half of the Kingdom was in the hands of the Danes, who as yet were Pagans. Northumberland, Mercia and East-Anglia, being expos'd to their continual ravages, it is not to be expected the affairs of the Church should proceed in a regular course. East-Anglia had never a Bishop for above two hundred years, and in Northumberland, the See of Hagulfstad was reduc'd to so wretched a state, that having long been without a Bishop, it was forc'd at last to be united to York. During Alfred's Reign, the Bishopsricks of Lisester and Lincoln were united in one, and the See remov'd to Dorchester (4), where it continued till the Reign of William the Conqueror, when it was transferr'd again to Lincoln. I have already mention'd the erection of the three new Bishopsricks in Wessex, and therefore it is needless to say any thing more of them. This is all that occurs, unless I were to give a List of the Names of the Bishops that succeeded in each See; which would lead me too far. Those who have a mind to it, may consult Dr. Heylin, who has published a Book upon that subject, where you have the year of the Infatment of each Bishop.

The Councils, held in this interval, were properly mix'd Assemblies, consisting of the Clergy and Nobility, and term'd in Saxon, Witten-Gemot, that is, an Assembly of wise Men, or rather, Mycel-Synod, which signifies in the same Language, the Great, or General Assembly. Both these names are render'd in Latin by the word Concilium. But because in these Assemblies, Laws and Ordinances relating to the Church as well as the State, were enacted, several of them are reckon'd among the Councils or Synods. As for Councils purely Ecclesiastical, it does not appear there was any, from Egbert to Edward the Martyr.

Next to the Assembly of Winchester, where Ethelwulph is said to have given a Grant of the Tithes, the most considerable with regard to religious Affairs, was the Synod of Gravelly, in the Reign of Athelstan. The Canons or Laws of this Council are these Nine.

The Ist enjoins the payment of Tithes (5).

The IId commands the Magistrates to put the Laws in execution against those that were convinced by all the Circumstances of an Ordeal Tryal (6).

The III^d is against Witchcraft and Highwaymen.

The IVth relates to the Towns where the Money was to be coined. At Canterbury there were to be seven Mints, four for the King, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbot of St. Augustine's. Rochester

(1) This Charter was engrav'd in Letters of Gold in a Book of the four Gospels, and presented to the Abby by the King.

(2) And perhaps Glastenbury, which were all the Monks had in Edwy's Time, the rest were in Possession of the Seculars. See Tiamoth High. Aur MS. l. 21. Wulfstan. Vit. Edel.

(3) Edred found'd a Bishop's See at St. Germans in Cornwall, which was afterwards annex'd by Canute to the See of Crediton, or Kirtan. Speed, p. 341.

(4) In Oxfordshire.

(5) To which is added the King's Order to all his Officers and Governors, to maintain a poor Man in Diet and Clothes; namely, that out of every two of his Villages, or Towns, there should be given an Amphora or nine Gallons of Meal, a Gammon of Bacon, or a Ram worth four Pence. They were each of them also to manumit a Slave. Speelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 398.

(6) See the Manner of this Tryal at length, in the Dissertation on the Government and Laws of the Anglo-Saxons.

was to have three, two for the King, and one for the Bishop (1).

The Vth regulates the Circumstances and Formalities of the Ordeal Trial, to know whether the Person accused were guilty or not. And here we have two things worth remarking. The first is, That the Priests are spoken of as fixed or settled in certain places. Whence it is plain, that in those days they did not live together in common; but each had his particular Church. The second is, that the accused Person was to receive the consecrated Bread. Whence it may be inferred, that since the Eucharist was called Bread after the Consecration, the Church of England was far from believing Transubstantiation.

The Vith forbids buying and selling on Sunday.

The VIth is against Perjuries and false Witnesses (2).

Brompt. The VIIth orders the Bishops to assist the Judges in the execution of the Laws, and to sit upon the Bench with them (3).

The IXth lays a Fine upon remiss and negligent Magistrates, which was to be paid to the Bishop (4).

Speelman, Vol. I. p. 425. We find another Synod or mixt Assembly, in the Reign of Edmond, wherein the Ceremonies of Marriage, and Preliminary Securities, the Parties were to give one another, are settled.

I have spoken elsewhere of the Council where Edgar harangued so strenuously against the secular Priests, and of several others, that were assembled on occasion of the Controversy between the Monks and Clergy, and therefore shall say nothing more of them here.

Ol's Conc. p. 231. Speelman, Conc. Vol. I. p. 415. To the Eccelesiastical Laws passed at these General Assemblies or Councils, may be aptly subjoined certain Constitutions made in those days. The ten following are Old's, Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Ist threatens all those who injure the Church in her Property with Excommunication.

The IId exhorts Princes [and other great Men] to be governed by the directions of the Bishops, because God has entrusted them with the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

The IIId admonishes Bishops to discharge their Duty (5), without any mercenary Views, or respect of Persons.

The IVth and Vth give good Advice to the Clergy.

The VIth does the same with regard to the Monks.

The VIIth prohibits unlawful Marriages, upon the score of nearness of Relation: But the degrees of Consanguinity and Affinity are not recited.

The VIIIth recommends Unity and Charity among Christians.

(1) London was to have eight, Wichester six, Leicester, Southampton, Exeter, Shaftsbury, Warham, two each, and every other great Town was to have one. If any Person belonging to one of these was found guilty of defrauding the Curia (which was to be all at one sort) his right Hand was to be cut off, and a third of a hundred of the Mint. See Speelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 399. The same Appointment was made by John, only he ordered that (besides the Places here mentioned) Canterbury should have seven, Rochester three, Hastings and Chichester one each, &c. See Lig. 64. in Willelm.

(2) The Penalty is, not to be believed afterwards, and to be debarred of Christian Burial.

(3) Both the Council were some remarkable Civil Laws enacted, particularly one against Thieves, requiring, That if a Thief be taken in the fact, no man shall press him, till he be answered by a jury, and had done any thing above the value of eight pence. If any one is contrary thereto, he shall pay the value of the Thief, dead, or make amends for it to the King, and yet the Thief himself shall not be pardoned, who if he continues only, make his defence, or fly for it, shall find no favour. A Thief taken upon Friday, shall there stay five days, and then after the payment of one hundred and twenty shillings, be discharged; but his Kindred must give security for his good behaviour; otherwise, if he steal again, they must either pay the value of his Head, or bring him back to Prison; and in case of a second offence, he shall pay to the King, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own Head; and if any defend him, he shall pay to the King one hundred and twenty shillings.

(4) Namely, of the Diocese where the Magistrate lived.

(5) That is, to go and preach about their Diocese every Year, &c.

(6) The IId orders the Payment of the Title of Cattle before Whitsuntide, of the Fruits of the Earth before the Equinox, and of Seeds at the Feast of St. Martin. Speelman, p. 444.

(7) And to continue till break of Day on Monday, Speelman, p. 445. Edgar made several other Constitutions for the Regulation of Religious Houses. In one of the Books belonging to Windsor Cathedral, Edgar makes himself General of the Monks, and Queen of the Nuns. Speelman, p. 417.

(8) These Canons were translated by St. H. Speelman, from a Saxon Manuscript in Bennet's College in Cambridge. They are not known where or by what Authority they were drawn up. Coll. Eccl. Hist. p. 186.

(9) That is, the consecrated Bread. Had they thought then, that our Saviour's Body and Blood, as the Trent Catechism would it, had been present under the appearance of Bread, they would never have burnt the Eucharist in this manner.

(10) The LIId orders Priests to preach every Sunday. Speelman, p. 444.

(11) The LXIVth declares Hunting and Hawking are improper Diversions for a Priest, who is to make Books his Entertainment. Speelman.

The IXth prescribes fasting on Wednesday, Friday, and the four Ember-Weeks.

The Xth enjoins the punctual Payment of Tithes, from Reasons taken out of the Old Testament, without Mai, 12. 12. any mention of Ethelwulf's Charter.

There are other Constitutions, published under King Edgar, but the Author of them is unknown. The principal are,

The Ith, which confirms the Civil Privileges and Immunities of the Church, and orders the payment of Tithes (6).

And the Vth, by which the Solemnity of Sunday is to begin at three a-Clock on Saturday in the Afternoon (7).

In this Reign were published a Body of Canons (8), of which the following are particularly remarkable.

By the Vth, if a Priest receiv'd any Injury, the Complaint was to be prefer'd to the Synod, who were to treat the Case, as if the Injury had actually been done to the whole Body of the Clergy, and take care that satisfaction be made at the discretion of the Bishop of the Diocese.

The XIth enjoins the Priests to learn some employment, in order to get their livelihood in case of misfortune.

The XVIIth orders Parents to teach their Children the Lord's-Prayer and the Apostles-Creed, without which they were neither to be admitted to the Eucharist, nor buried in consecrated ground.

The XXIXth forbids the burying in Churches all those that were not of known and approv'd Probity.

The XXXIId prohibits the Priests from officiating without the Service-Book before them, for fear the truffling to their Memories might make them mistake.

By the XXXVth, no Person was to eat or drink before the receiving the Communion.

The XXXVIIIth enjoins the Priest to have the holy Eucharist (9) always ready by him: But in case it grew so stale that it could not be eaten without disgusting the Palate, it was to be burnt in a clear Fire, and the Ashes laid under the Altar. Hence it is easy to see what the Church's Opinion was then of the Eucharist, since it was believ'd it could grow stale, and was to be burnt after it was spoil'd (10).

The LIId forbids the eating of Blood (11).

After these Canons, there follows a very particular Form of Confession, with what Penances the Confessor is to enjoin. We find here that the Penitent was order'd to say the Lord's-Prayer three-score times a day, but not so much as one Ave Maria; a clear evidence, that the praying to the Virgin Mary was not yet introduced into the Church.

Nothing more remains relating to the Church of those days, but to give a brief account of the most noted Persons for Piety and Learning.

The first Saint we meet with is Swiðin or Swiðon (1), who having been Preceptor to King Ethelwulf, was promoted to the See of Winchester. By his advice Ethelwulf is said to have granted a Charter of the Tithes to the Church. This alone was sufficient to gain him a Saintship, though he had been distinguished upon no other account. But besides this, he is affirmed to have wrought abundance of Miracles, which I do not think proper to swell this Abridgement with.

Humbert, Bishop of East-Anglia, massacred, or, if you will, martyr'd by the Danes, with King Edward, has the Honour also of being rank'd with the Saints.

Alfred the Great, independently of his Royal Dignity, was one of the most considerable for his Piety and Learning (2).

Johannus Scotus, surnamed Erigena, that is, Irishman, [Ireland being then called Erin] liv'd at this time. He had acquired a great reputation in France, where Charles the Bald entertain'd him at his Court, and us'd to converse with him with great Familiarity (3), when Alfred invit'd him into England. At first he was the King's Preceptor in Languages and the other Sciences, afterwards he taught at Oxford, from whence, in all appearance, he was remov'd to Malmesbury, since it was in this Monastery that he is said to be stabb'd to death by his Scholars with Pen-knives. Before he left France, he was engag'd by the Emperor's Order in the dispute concerning the Nature of the Eucharist. In his Treatise (4) upon this Subject, he strongly argued against Paschasius's Doctrine, who maintained, the Body of Christ in the Eucharist to be the same that was born of the blessed Virgin. It must needs be, that the contrary opinion defended by Scotus, was not look'd upon then as heretical, since it prevented not Alfred from inviting him into England, from having a very great esteem for him, and entrusting him with the education of youth. Nay, it is certain, he was honour'd as a Saint and a Martyr after his death. Roger de Houeden says, Scotus at first had an obscure burial; but afterwards a miraculous Light shined over his Grave for several nights together, the Monks of St. Laurence's remov'd his body into their Church, and buried it close by the Altar. His Epitaph also, the antiquity whereof, according to Malmesbury, appears from the Structure and Dedication of the Verles (5), is express for his passing for a Saint, when that was made. All these circumstances are a strong presumption, at least, that Transubstantiation was not the Doctrine of the Church of England at that time. For had it been so, how was it possible the English should honour as a Saint one that had so openly combated their Opinions? This inference a little perplexes the Roman Catholics. However, one of their Historians does not scruple to own, that the Name of Scot is registr'd in the SUPPLEMENT of the Gallican Martyrology, and commemorated among the Saints on the fourth of the Ides of November. He moreover adds, that his Name had been inserted even in the Roman Martyrology, and did remain there till expung'd by Cardinal Baronius. This Historian indeed pretends, Scotus retracted his former Errors: but gives us no Authority for what he says. He only alleges, that without a recantation it is not likely the Church would have honour'd his Memory. But this is supposing that Transubstantiation was the doctrine of the Church at that time, which must first be prov'd, before this Argument can be of any force.

Grimbald liv'd also in the same Century: He was one of the first Clerg for his Learning, and had a great reputation. He was invit'd into England by Alfred the Great, (who was acquainted with him at Rheims) and preferred to the Government of the new Abby at Winchester.

Among the Englishmen,^o eminent for their Learning, Affricus was one of the most considerable. He wrote the Life of Alfred the Great in 893, and died Bishop of St. David's in Wales (6). He must not be confounded with another of the same name, Bishop of Sherborn, who died in 883.

Wulfred, Bishop of Worcester in Mercia, lived in the Reign of King Batfred. When the Danes became masters of Mercia, he retired into France, from whence he was recalled by King Alfred. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Saxon; and having acquired a great reputation when living, he was registr'd a Saint after his Death.

Plegmund, who was Archbishop of Canterbury, pass'd for a very learned Prelate, and was particularly eminent for his Skill in Divinity.

Dunulf had been an Herdsman. He is affirm'd by some to be the same that shelter'd Alfred, whilst the Danes were masters of the Kingdom. However this be, he had the good Fortune to be known to this Prince; who finding him a Person of a Genius superior to his Birth and Employment, got him instructed in Learning, and promoted him afterwards to the See of Winchester. As this City was then the Metropolis of Wessex, where Alfred kept his usual residence, he us'd the advice of this Prelate in Affairs of the greatest Moment.

Wulf Bishop of London, had also a great share in Alfred's Esteem, as appears by his Letter to this Prelate prefixed to his Translation of Gregory's Pastoral.

Neot was an Abbot distinguished for his Birth, Learning, Regularity, and Zeal for promoting the Interest of the true Religion. Some say, he was nearly related to King Alfred, and others that he was defended from the Blood-Royal of East-Anglia. He died in 890 in Cornwall, where he left his name to the Town of Neot or St. Neot (7).

Oda, Archbishop of Canterbury, was the Son of an East-Anglian Dane. Though he was born of Pagan Parents, he had the good Fortune to know and relish the Christian Religion, and for that reason was expelled his Father's House. In this extremity, he put himself into the service of an English Nobleman, who had him baptized, and sent him to School. When he became capable, he entered into Orders, in the Reign of Edward the Elder. His zeal, virtue, and capacity, gained him so great a character, that Alfred made him Bishop of

(1) He was bred a Monk at Winchester, where he was made Abbot. Malm.

(2) He was twelve years of Age before he could read, which he first began to learn upon this occasion. His Mother seeing him one Day mightily delighted with a little Book, beautifully adorned with Capital Letters in Gold and other Colours, said, in his and his Brother's hearing, See now! give that Book before thee shouldst fit out it by heart. Alfred, who knew not so much as his Letters, though twelve years old, applied himself to it diligently till his Father, that he never saw till he was a year and repeat the Book to his Mother. From this time, he had a great Relish for Books, and it did him. There is extant of this March's Works relating to History, a Paraphrastic Translation of Boetius's Consolation of Philosophy, and a Book of Gregory of the Kings of the West-Saxons. Poverty had to great a Veneration for his Memory, that he has the Title of Saint sometimes lodg'd upon him, and what is more, his Name stands in the Calendar of the English Martyrology, printed in 1608, and in two Saxon Calendars cited by the Associates on the Saxon Translation of the N. T. The Day of his Death is registr'd on the 26th of October.

(3) The Emperor one Day, as he was sitting opposite to him at Table, asked him merrily, Quid intersit inter Scotum & Scotum? He replied, Mensores. When the Emperor took in good part. Hoved.

(4) This Book was condemn'd by the Council of Vercelli in 1020, Earing, Epp. ad Rich. 'Tis now lost, though some will have it to be the same with that which goes by the Name of Rabais or Borstein. But Alscholius confutes this Opinion.

(6) He was bred a Monk of Menevia or St. David's, when the King prevail'd upon, with much ado, to come to Court, on condition he should try there for Nine Months, and at the End fix Months, by turns. He wrote the Life of Alfred to the 43d year of his Age, i. e. to the year 893, according to his Comput. Some say, he was a Monk of St. David's by some later Hand. He lives through the whole a great deal of Modesty. He mentions nothing of the Norman Dilection of Alfred and St. Cuthbert, which other Historians largely insist on. He is cited by Flower of War, and others. The Treatise was first published by Archibald Parker in the old Saxon Character. A new Edition is lately put out by Mr. Wise, Fellow of Trinity College Oxford, in a new form of the printed Character about the Antiquity of Oxford. Another Piece has been published by Dr. Cole, under the Title of Alfred's Annals. The second Edition does not question but 'tis the true Offspring of Affricus. Leland calls it the Chronicle of St. Neot's; because he found it in that Monastery.

(7) Where he was buried, and when Earl Athel's Seat in Huntingdonshire was turned into a Monastery upon his Account, his Body was removed thither, and the Town before called Amstelburg, was from him named St. Neot's. Sherborn. Some ascribe to the efficacy of his Prayers, the glorious victory, obtained by that Prince over the Danes at Brunanburgh. Odo had no less Interest with King Edmund, who resolved to promote him to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury: But Odo modestly excused himself, telling the King his abilities were too slender for so high a Post. The King not admitting his excuse, he further alledged, that Translations were not warrantable by the Canons. This scruple being removed, by the examples of Justus and Mellitus who were translated from Rechefer and London to Canterbury, he started another Objection, and alledged, that the Archbishops from Augustin downwards having been all Monks (1), he looked upon himself as unqualified for that Station, since he had not been educated under any religious Rule. This new difficulty was also got over by sending to the Abbot of Fleury in France, and entreating him to admit Odo into his Society. Thus the Prelate having nothing more to object, accepted at length, though with great reluctance, the See of Canterbury. As he became afterwards a vigorous Champion for the Monks, it may be presumed, this was one of the chief reasons of placing him among the most illustrious Ecclesiasticks of his Time. He is said also to have the gift of Miracles, which the Favoured of the Monks seldom failed to be honoured with.

Dunstan would make a large Article here, did I not but think what I have elsewhere said of him sufficiently makes known his Character. There are Modern Historians, even among the Protestants themselves, who, carried away by the Testimonies of the ancient Writers, have given great commendations to this pretended Saint, without considering upon what doubtful Authorities they proceed. It is highly probable, that Dunstan's firm adherence to the Monks, was the ground of those excessive praises bestowed on him, of which, perhaps, he would otherwise have been deemed unworthy (2).

The same may be said of Ethelwald, Bishop of Winchester, and Oswald, Bishop of Worcester first, and afterwards Archbishop of York. Their great zeal in the cause of the Monks, is doubtless what contributed most to their reputation. The Monks, being almost the only Writers in those Days, have drawn the characters of Persons according to their Prejudices and Interests.

Turketul, King Edmund's near Relation and Chancellor, became famous in this Age, for preferring a Cloyster to a Court, where he lived in great Reputation. But what raised his merit most with the Historians, was his rebuilding and restoring to its former splendor, the Abbey of Croyland (3), demolished by the Danes.

(1) There were several that in all probability were not Monks, as Wighard, whom Hede, l. 4. c. 2. calls a Priest, and Nobelm, who succeeded Turketul.

(2) The famous Story of St. Dunstan and the Devil is thus related by the Monkish Historians. As St. Dunstan was one Day busied in his Cell near Glastonbury, in making a Gold Cup of a curious Workmanship, the Devil appeared to him in a beautiful Form, tempting him to Sin. Dunstan perceiving an Spirit who he was, takes up a red-hot pair of Tongs, and catching hold of the Devil by the Nose, made him howl in such a terrible manner, that he was heard all over the Neighbourhood. Hig. Polyb. p. 270. Edit. Gale. Brompt. p. 878, 879.

(3) Turketul left the Monastery at his Death in possession of many curious Relicks; among the rest Ingulphus, (p. 51. Hist. Croyl. Edit. Gale) mention the Thumb of St. Bartholomew the Apostle, given him when Chancellor by the Emperor; he had so great a Veneration for it, that he always carried it about him, and when in any Danger, cross'd himself with it. The naming of Bells, together with the Benediction, as a defensive against Thunder and Lightning, being introduced in this Age by Pope John XIV. Turketul cast a great Bell, which he called Quintus. His Successor taking the hint, added some more to it, and made the first tunable Ring of Bells in England. Leggib. p. 53.

AFTER the Murder of Edward there was not the least Pretence to refuse the Crown to his Brother Ethelred, who was the only Prince of the Royal Family, and too young to be accused of partaking in his Mother's Crime. Accordingly, Dunstan could not help crowning him (1), being then but twelve Years of Age, though he plainly foresaw it would prove fatal to his whole Party. It is affirmed, that Dunstan at his Coronation foretold, by the Spirit of Prophecy, the Calamities, England was going to be exposed to in his Reign. But Predictions of this Nature are always to be suspected, when attributed to Saints, such as Dunstan, by Authors who wrote after the Event. However this be, the People had very different Thoughts of this new Reign. They flattered themselves, they were about to enjoy a State of Tranquillity, under a Prince who had already given an Instance of his good Nature, in bitterly lamenting the Death of his King his Brother, though it procured him the Crown. An Historian says, his Tears appeared so unseasonable to his Mother, that catching up a Wax-taper in a Passion, she beat him so unmercifully with it, that he could not endure the Sight of a Wax-light ever after.

The first thing Ethelred did after his Coronation, was to remove the Body of the late King to Shaftsbury Church. Hardly had he performed this Office, but he found himself attacked by the Danes, who suffered him to enjoy no Repose during the Residue of his Life: If this Prince had followed the Steps of his Predecessors, perhaps he would have caused these old Invaders to lay aside all Thoughts of any new Attempts upon England. But his natural Cowardice, joined to an extreme Sluggishness (2), an insatiable Avarice, and many other Failings, soon let them see, he was not like to prove a very formidable Enemy. For sixty Years past they seemed to have forgot England, and the English on their Side, to have lost all Remembrance of the Calamities they had suffered from the Hands of those cruel Enemies. However, after so long an Interval, during which the Danes settled in England, seemed to have entertained the same Affection for this their second Country, as the Natives themselves, the foreign Danes took it in their Heads to renew their Invasions. They no sooner appeared, but the others, resuming their old Inclinations, joined their Countrymen, in order to improve the present Opportunity, and free themselves from the Dominion of the English.

The Danish Rovers made their first Attempt on Southampton, where they arrived with seven Ships, and after plundering the Town and the adjacent Country (3), they carried the same Devastations into Cornwall.

This Year another Band landing at Portland, pillaged and sacked the Country round about, after which they proceeded elsewhere to increase their Spoils (4).

These frequent Descents were so much the more incommensurable to the English, as having so many Coasts to guard, they knew not where to assemble and expect the Enemy. If at any time they happened to have it in their Power to give them Battle, all the Advantage they could gain, in case Fortune favoured them, was to recover the Plunder. But when they themselves were worsted, the Country was sure to be exposed to all imaginable Cruelties before another Army could be drawn together. Very often, whilst the English Troops were upon the March, to oppose one of these Bands, they were forced to change their Route, and march where the Danger seemed more pressing. Thus, what Care soever might be taken, one part of the

(2) This cowardly and sluggish Temper of his was predicted by Dunstan, when at his Baptism (like Constantine the Emperor, from thence called Cyprianus) he bewray'd the Font, which, Malsherry says, denud'd Dunstan is, that it made him swear by God and St. Mary, this Boy will prove a Politician, lib. 2. c. 10. de Gest. Kingdom was always exposed, since there was no foreseeing where the Pirates would land. There was but one way to remedy this Inconvenience, which was, to keep a Fleet at Sea strong enough to engage the Danish, before they disembarked their Troops. But a time of Minority was not very proper to take such a Precaution.

In this manner passed the first ten Years of this Reign. It would be needless to describe at length the Ravages committed by the Dans during that time. It is but to imagine the whole Kingdom was a Scene of Murders, Conflagrations, Plunderings, and other Devastations, which, after some short Intermissions, were continually renewed.

983. During these Troubles, Elfric, Duke of Mercia, one of the best Supports of his Country, died in 983. His little Elfric, Duke of Mercia, Regard for the Monks after Edgar's Death, was probably the Reason of their reporting among their Votaries, that he was eaten up of Lice. Afric his Son succeeded him.

him. The next Year, Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester, one of Dunstan's Confidants, and a great Friend of the Monks, departed also this Life. He is said to have founded a dozen Monasteries. If that be true, he was, no doubt, assisted by the Liberality of the two former Kings, with whom he was in great Favour (1).

was in great Favour (1). The Credit of the Monks declined very much in the Reign of Ethelred, as well by reason of the frequent Invasions of the Danes, as because the People, full of their Misfortunes, were regardless of every thing else. Nay, they began to mistrust the Sanctity of the Monks, not being able to forbear wondering, that Men who had obtained from Heaven so many Miracles on their own private Account, could not by their Merits and Prayers secure the Kingdom from the Calamities it was incessantly exposed to. On the other Hand, as their Credit with the former Kings had helped to acquire them a great Reputation, so this King's Disinclination to them turned greatly to their Prejudice. Ethelred, whose Thoughts were not taken up with Religion, put the Monks and other Ecclesiasticks upon a Level with the rest of his Subjects. He gave a convincing Proof how little he regarded the Clergy, in a Difference between him and the Bishop of Rocheſter. The rence between him and the Bishop of Koblenz. The Bishop having laughingly refused to comply with some Demand of the King's, he ordered the Soldiers to lay waste the Lands belonging to the Cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew (2). In vain did the Bishop threaten him with Vengeance from the Apople, and cause Archbishop Dunstan to interpose in his Quarrel; Ethelred fledged both, nor could be appeased but by Money (3). Dunstan, displeased to the highest Degree at this Behaviour, denounced upon the King and his Council the Judgments of God, ready to fall on their Heads, for presuming to lay sacrilegious Hands on the Church's Property; but he was not heard. His Credit was sunk for loss, that hardly was he known to be alive, so careful were the new Ministers to depress him. He died quickly after in the Year 988; not so much of old Age, as of Grief and Vexation to see himself no longer distinguished as formerly.

*Old

Official Archbishop of York soon followed him. He was his particular Friend, and one of the three Prelates that governed the Church during the Reign of Edgar. The Death of these Patrons of the Monks, a contagious Disemper (4), which swept away Multitudes, and moreover, the continual Invasions of the Danes, put an end to the Quarrel between the secular and regular Clergy, in such manner, that it was never more heard of.

After the Danes had pillaged the Coasts of England ten Years together, they gave over their Ravages for about two Years. This Intermittion put the English in hopes, their Enemies having turned their Thoughts to some other Country, would for the future leave them in quiet. But these hopes were short-lived. In 991, Jufin and Guthmund, two Danish Captains, landed a great Body of Troops at Grinwich (5). Whilst they were busy in plundering, Brihtnoth, Duke of East-Anglia, advanced towards them, in expectation to surprize them, but found them too well prepared. He was overthrown, and his Defeat expofed the adjacent Country to greater Devaftations. The victorious Danes having nothing more to fear, penetrated flill farther

Two Years after, another of their Fleets sailing up the 993.
Humber, the Pirates landed in the North's side, and ravaged in a merciless manner all that lay along to the N. of those Quarters. Ethelred sent an Army against them, under the Command of three Earls, Egbert, Wulfstan, Godwin. But the Generals, being led to the forces in fight of the Enemies, were the first that turned their Backs, and by their shameful Cowardice occasioned the Loss of the Army. The King had imprudently trusted these three Lords with his Troops, who, being of Danish Extraction, were suspected of Treachery.

Extraction, were suspected of Treachery. How great was the Misfortune, inflicted upon England by these Foreigners might be, it is certain, they were nothing in comparison of what followed. Swegen King of Denmark, and Olais (8) King of Norway, allured by the good Success of their Subjects in England, wanted to share in the Spoil brought from thence every Year. To that purpose, fitting out a numerous Fleet, they entered the Thames, and landed their Troops near London. They made several Attempts to become Masters of the City, but meeting with a braver Resistance than they imagined, retired. To make themselves Amends for the time spent in vain before London, they went and plundered Kent, Hampshire, and Suffex, threatening to lay waste the whole Kingdom. Ethelred, who had no more Conquest than Courage, not knowing how to put a Stop to these Ravages, had recourse to the same means made use of before on a like Occasion. He bound himself by a Treaty to pay a certain Sum of Money (9) within such a time, on condition they left his Subjects unmolested, and departed the Kingdom. Whereupon, the two foreign Kings caused all Hostilities to cease, and retired to Southampton. Shortly after the King of Norway paid a Visit to Ethelred (10), who persuaded him to be baptiz'd, and stood himself Godfather. At his Departure, Olais obliged himself by Oath never to infect England more, and perform'd his Promise.

It would have been happy for the English, if Stowen, ^{The very king's return home,} who departed at the same time, would have followed his Example. For they would have eaped all those Calamities, that Prince afterwards brought on the Land. When he failed for Denmark, he left a Fleet at Southampton, to keep the English in awe, and oblige them to perform the Articles of the Treaty. After his Departure, his Admiral very earnestly pressed the Payment of the Money. But as there was no haste made to comply with his Demands, he took their Delay for a Refusal, and resolved to renew the War. Mean while, to deceive the Vigilance of the English, he set sail, as if he designed for Denmark, but on a sudden, he unexpectedly entered the Severn, and after destroying the Country of the Welsh with Fire and Sword, cross'd the River and penetrated into Dorsetshire (11), where he committed the same Ravages. All the Forces that could be brought against the Danes were as soon defeated as levied. They sack'd whole Counties, it being impossible to oppose them. At last, finding nothing more to plunder in those parts, they put to Sea again, and landed in Kent (12). The Inhabitants, by endeavouring to make some Resistance, only increased the Fury of their Enemies, who treated them with the utmost Barbarity. To complete their Misfortune, a Fleet equip'd by Ethelred to engage them at Sea, was rendered useless by the Dissentions and Unskillfulness of the Commanders. In this melancholy Situation, England would have been irremediably perished, if ^{997. The first time the Danes ravaged the island.} Are unexpectedly call'd off ^{998. and ravage Cumberland, but for what reason is unknown (1). After that, he returned to London, where he kept his usual Residence.

The Quiet Æthelred enjoy'd was of no long Continuance; the Danes slaying in Northumbria no longer than was necessary to put the young Duke out of Danger, returned into England. Cornwall felt the first Effects of their Fury; then entering Wessex, they became Masters of Exeter. The Consecration of the English was so great, that they made but a faint Resistance. Whether Æthelred was betrayed by his Generals, or the long Peace enjoyed by the English during the foregoing Reigns, had enervated their Courage, they were contently vanquish'd. The King himself was seized with such Terror, that he durst not venture to be present in the Battles for fear of falling into the Hands of the Danes, who probably would have thrown him no Favour. In fine, the Danes ever victorious, got Possession of the Isle of Wight, Hamshire, and Dorsetshire, where they had their Magazines. From hence they made continual IncurSIONS into the neighbouring Counties, without any one daring to oppose them. England was then in a deplorable Condition. The fourteen Counties were perpetually ravag'd by the foreign Danes, and the northern People by the same Nation, whom the English could not but look upon as their Enemies. For, they not only refused to fight against the Foreigners, whom they still considered as their Countrymen, but joining with them, even helped to destroy a Country they ought to have defended with all their Power, since it was become their own. In this Extremity, Æthelred, who had no Resolution, was far from imitating the Firmness of his Ancestors, who in like Circumstances, were never daunted by Misfortunes. This timorous Prince, seeing no other way to avoid the still greater Miseries the Nation was threatened with, yielded at last to pay the Danes thirty thousand Pounds (2). This Sum, which in those Days was very considerable, was levied by a Tax, called Danegeld, that is, Danish Money, or Money for the Danes (3). This was the Original of that famous Tax which afterwards became so extremely burthensome to the Nation, even long after the Danes had quitted England. But the Clergy and Monks always found means to be exempted.

The Danes, satisfied with this Agreement, ceased their Ravages, and return'd home. However, abundance of them, perceiving England to be much preferable to Denmark, staid behind, and lived among the English. Their Number indeed was not so great as to render them very formidable, considering they were dispersed; but then they were supported by their Countrymen of Northumberland and East-Anglia. Besides the English dreaded nothing so much as the Renewal of the War, which made the Danes very insolent. They did what they pleased, without any Controul. The English, dispirited by their past Calamities, were afraid, on the least Occasion, of drawing into the Kingdom fresh Armies of Foreigners. Thus whilst the Danes abounding in Wealth and Ease, passed their Time agreeably, the English were forc'd to labour and toil incessantly, to satisfy the Avarice of their new Masters. In short, the whole Kingdom stood in such fear of the Danes, that they had always the Appellation of Lord-Danes. The Word itself, as well as the Meaning, was altered a little after. At this Day, in some parts of England a rich idle Man that takes upon him, is by way of Derision called a Lurdane. But notwithstanding this Alteration, the Traces of its original Signification are still visible in the Word.

Elgiva, Æthelred's Queen, dying, whilst the Danes were thus insolently domineering in England, the King demanded Emma (4), Sister of Richard II. Duke of Normandy, in Marriage. His Suit being granted, and the Marriage consummated, he thought himself out of Danger, depending upon the Assistance of the Duke his Brother-in-Law, when there should be Occasion. This Expectation inspired him with the barbarous and furious Resolution of destroying the Danes by a general Massacre. To execute this Project, Orders were sent privately (5), throughout the Kingdom, that in one Day all the Danes were slain with such implacable Fury and Cruelty, that the Particulars cannot be read without Horror (6). Sweyn's Sister (7), who was married to an English Lord, having at first been spared, Æthelred was so barbarous as to cause her Children to be murdered in her Presence, and then her Head to be cut off. This Princess, who met her Death with an heroic Constancy, was severely revenged shortly after.

This bloody Tragedy, acted on the thirteenth of November 1002 (8), was very like the Massacre of the Romans by the Britons under Boudicca; not only the same Barbarities, but the same Consequences also attended both. The English, as the old Britons, were so far from throwing off their Yoke by this wicked Expedient, that it served only to make it more heavy and insupportable. Though Historians assure us, all the Danes in England were massacred on this Occasion, it is hard to conceive how this could be effected in Northumberland and East-Anglia, where the Danes were most powerful. Was it possible they should stand still and suffer their Throats to be cut, without making any Resistance worth Notice? This Consideration makes me apt to believe, that by all the Danes, we are to understand only those, lately settled in England, and dispersed in Wessex and Mercia.

Æthelred was persuaded this bloody Massacre, of many thousands, would procure him some Repose. He could not imagine, the Danes would ever think of any future Invasions. At least, he hoped, in case the Desire of revenging their Brethren should bring them to England again, the English would see the necessity of shedding the last drop of their Blood to prevent falling into the Hands of their incensed Enemies. He relied moreover on the Assistance of his Brother-in-law the Duke of Normandy, a powerful Prince, interested in his Defence. But such a detestable Policy rarely produces the intended Effects, or rather, seldom fails of ending in the Ruin of the Projector. God, who beholds such Tragedies with Horror, does not often suffer them to go unpunished. Of this we have an Instance in the Miseries that befel Æthelred and his Subjects, who were almost as guilty as their King.

Sweyn received the News of this Massacre by some Danes, who escaped by getting on board a Vessel ready to sail for Denmark. Their Relation of the Cruelties of the English to those of his Nation would have been sufficient to throw him into Resolutions fatal to England. But when he was informed of his Sister's Death, and the barbarous Manner of it, he was seized with a raging Fury. Every thing contributing to stir him up to Revenge, he solemnly swore, he would never rest till he had Satisfaction for so bloody an Outrage. It was not therefore with intent to plunder, that he made a second Expedition into England, but to destroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword. However, as he did not doubt but Æthelred had taken all possible Precautions to oppose his Entrance, he would not fail without being sure beforehand of a Place where he might safely land his Troops. Cornwall was then governed by Earl Hugh, a Norman, whom the Queen had placed in that Post as a Man the King might perfectly confide in. To this Governor Sweyn dispatched a trusty Messenger, to endeavour to gain him to his Interest, by the Offer of a great Reward. Hugh yielding to the Temptation, promised to admit the Danish Fleet into his Ports, and suffer the Troops to land without Molestation.

Upon this, Sweyn, having equipped a Fleet of three Sweyn land hundred Sail, landed in Cornwall with a numerous Army, and meeting with no Opposition, marched directly to Exeter. As this City was in no Apprehension of an Attack, Huntingdon he easily became Master of it, and putting the Inhabitants to the Sword, reduced it to Ashes. This first Exploit was followed by several others, no less fatal to England. Where-ever Sweyn carried his Arms, Revenge and Con-

(1) Though not one of our English Historians have mention'd on whom or for what this War was made, John Fordun in a Scottish History gives this Account of it: Æthelred having paid large Sums to the Danes, sent to Malcolm Prince of Cumberland, under Gyene King of Scotland, to pay him a Share, which he refusing to do, and asserting he was only bound to make War with the rest of the Kingdom, when requir'd, Æthelred invaded his Country, on pretence he should kill the Danes, but presently after the two Princes struck up a Peace, and became Friends. See also S. Dunelm. p. 79, 80.

(3) For the Payment of this Money every Hide of Land was tax'd yearly Twelve-pence. A Hide of Land is such a quantity of Land as may be plough'd with one Plough in a Year. Hide reckons in it much as will maintain a Family. Some say it was an halgated Acre, others, that it contained no certain Number of Acres. The Distribution of England by Hides of Land is very antient, mention being made of it in the Laws of Ina. Danegeld was the first Land Tax in England. It was afterwards called Hidage, which Name remained afterwards upon all T. x. and S. M. d. imposed on Lords. The Normans call'd this hidage metu Taxes, sometimes Tallages, and Auxilia & Subsidia. The Saxon Kings below that had their Levies of Money and Personal Service, towards the building and repairing Cities, Castles, Bridges, Military Expeditions, &c. which from the Word Ware, that is, repair, were term'd Waregeld, brigete, houseld, &c. Danegeld was reliev'd by Edward the Conqueror, but levied again by William I. and II. Then it was reliev'd again by Henry I. and finally by King Stephen. This ancient Tax probably might be a Precedent for our Land-Tax of three or four shillings in the Pound, when it first existeth. See Leg. Eccl. Conf. p. 12.

quest being his chief Aim, he destroyed all with Fire and Sword. Towards the end of the Summer, being informed Alfred, Duke of Mercia, was advancing with a powerful Army (1), to give him Battle, he resolved to meet him. Ethelred acted very unadvisedly in giving the Command of his Army to this Lord, whom he had formerly banish'd the Kingdom out of mere Caprice, and whose Son's Eyes he had ordered to be put out (2). The Remembrance of this Injury being still fresh in the Duke's Mind, he was pleas'd with having so fair an Opportunity to revenge it. As soon as he was in sight of the Enemy, he feign'd himself sick on a sudden, and pretending he was unable to fight in his present Condition, ordered a Retreat, which he took care to make with so much Confusion, that the Danes very easily routed his Army. After this Victory, Sweyn took several Towns (3), with an immense Booty. But as he had no Design to keep them, he set them on Fire, and went and pass'd the Winter in Denmark.

The Calm England enjoy'd upon Sweyn's Departure, lasted not long. In the following Spring he landed in East-Anglia, and taking Norwich, burnt the whole Town to the Ground. Ulfketel, Governor of East-Anglia, unable to resist him, gave him a great Sum of Money, to prevent his doing any farther Mischief (4). But upon receipt of the Money, Sweyn breaks the Treaty, and takes Thetford by Surprize, a Town then of great note, and serv'd it as he had done Norwich. Incens'd at this Breach of Faith, Ulfketel levied some Troops with wonderful Expedition, and posst himself between the Danish Army and Fleet. Sweyn perceiving he intended to cut off his Retreat to his Ships, march'd back to give him Battle, before he should be reinforced with more Troops. He found the English very advantageously encamp'd, expecting him with a Resolution to stand their Ground, and exert their utmost in Defence of their Goods and Chattels, which their Enemies were carrying off before their Face. The ill Fortune of the English was come to that Height, that it was next to impossible they should so much as once get the Advantage. The Danes obtain'd a signal Victory, though not without great Loss on their Side. They even own'd they were never in more Danger of being defeated (5). Ulfketel, though of Danish Race, was the faithfullest as well as bravest of all Ethelred's Subjects, and did him the most Service. But it was not so with the other Lords. All the Historians agree, Ethelred was betray'd by all that approach'd him. Sweyn had his Spies, not only in his Court, but in his very Council. The Great Men, for the most part, were brib'd, or at least, there was scarce one that serv'd the King heartily, by reason of their little Esteem for him. Whatever Councils were held to consider of Ways and Means to resist the Danes, the Diffentions between the Nobles, too common in the Courts of Princes so little respected, prevented them from coming to any Resolution, or putting what was resolv'd in Execution. The Avarice of the Clergy, and particularly of the Monks, very much help'd to increase the Disorder. Notwithstanding their great Riches, they refus'd to contribute their Quota in defence of the Kingdom, pleading their Privileges and Immunities, as if they had no Share at all in the Danger. It is no wonder therefore the Danes obtain'd so many Victories in a Country so ill defended by Them, who were so much concerned for its Preservation. The Famine that happen'd soon after, would have compleated the Misfortunes of the English, had it not accidentally prov'd the Occasion of Sweyn's returning to Denmark for want of Subsilience in England.

Upon the Retreat of the Danes, and ceasing of the Famine, the English began to entertain Hopes of enjoying some Tranquillity, when they saw another Danish Fleet arrive at Sandwich in Kent. Ethelred immediately levied an Army (6) to give the new Invaders Battle: But after committing some Ravages, they retir'd to the Isle of Thanet, where it was not possible to attack them. They knew the English Army, consisting only of Volunteers who serv'd at their own Expence, would soon disband themselves, as it actually fell out. Winter coming on, the English returned to their Homes, it not being in the Power of the King to keep them any longer together. Then the Danes issuing from their Retreat, renew'd their Ravages in Kent (7) and the neighbouring Counties, well assur'd they should meet with no Opposition. Ethelred saw no other Course to stop the Progress of a Mischief that threatned the whole Kingdom, but to give them the Sum of thirty thousand Pounds, with which they were very well satisfied.

The King, being freed from this Incumbrance, celebrated the Wedding of one of his Daughters with Edric first named Siron (8), a very powerful Lord, whom he had just made Duke of Mercia. If hitherto Ethelred had liv'd in continual Fears and Troubles, it was nothing in comparison of the Misfortunes he drew on himself by this fatal Marriage. He had inconsiderately taken into his Family a Traitor fold to the Danes, who never fail'd on all Occasions to betray the King and Kingdom to the Foreigners.

Hardly was a Year pass'd since the last Treaty with Danes, when they demand'd the same Sum again (9), pretending it to be a yearly Tribute due by Contract from Ethelred. This Demand was accompanied with Threats of destroying the whole Kingdom with Fire and Sword, if the Money was not immediately paid. This new Pretension of the Danes convincing the King and his Council, there was no possibility of ever contenting their insatiable Avarice, it was judg'd the Money would be better laid out in equipping a Fleet capable of defending the Kingdom from their Incursions. Necessity made them put this Resolution to speedily in practice, that quickly after, the King had a Fleet well-mann'd and victuall'd (10), the Command whereof was given to Brithric, Brother of Edric Siron, Duke of Mercia. These Measures oblig'd the Danes to retire for fear of being forc'd to a Sea-Engagement, which their Ships were not so fit for as those of the English (11).

The first thing Brithric did, after his being made Admiral, was to use all his Interest to ruin Ulnath, a Lord distinguished Quality (12), but his Enemy. He accus'd him to the King of fit to purge what Crimes, of which Ulnath did not think fit to know himself by a publick Trial, being sensible his Condemnation was already concert'd. He resolv'd therefore upon a voluntarily Exile, to screen himself from this Persecution; and perswaded nine Captains (13) to follow him with their Ships. After which he infest'd the English Coasts, and did as much Mischief as the Danes. Brithric, enraged at his Enemy's Escape, and his daring to brave him thus, put to Sea with eighty Sail to give him Chase, and endeavour to seize him alive or dead. But he met with so violent a Storm, that the greatest part of his Ships were lost or fell into the Hands of Ulnath. Thus this great Fleet, which could not be fitted out without a prodigious Expence, was render'd unserviceable by the Admiral's Passion. The Loss became still more irrevocable, by the Diffention among the Sea Officers; several of whom went and join'd Ulnath.

In the mean time, the Danes took Advantage of these Disorders. The next Spring two of their Fleets arriv'd in England, one in East-Anglia, under Turkil, another in the Isle of Thanet, under Heming and Anlaf. These Leaders joining their Forces in Kent, plunder'd the Country, and then laid Siege to Canterbury. The City would have infallibly fallen into the Hands of the Danes, if the Inhabitants had not purchased a Peace with a large Sum of Money (14).

Whilst the Danes were pillaging Kent, Ethelred drew an Army together to oppose their Ravages. As soon as he was ready, he posst himself between them and their Ships, to prevent their embarking and carrying off their Booty. In all appearance, he would have executed his Project, and perhaps gain'd some further considerable Advantage, considering the Superiority of his Forces, if Edric had not found means to bring off the Danes. The Traitor Hoved, perceiving their Danger, represented to the King, his Father-in-law, that it would be more advantageous to let them retire than hazard a Battle, which might prove fatal to him. This pernicious Advice made such Impression on the King, that he suffer'd them to march by, with all their Plunder, unmolested. But instead of failing for Denmark, as 'twas expected, they threw themselves into the Isle of Thanet; from their Enemies, hoping they should repair by a Peace, the damages sustained by the War. But they were far from seeing yet the end of their Miseries. Hardly had they enjoyed any quiet, when news came that Sweyn (6) was entered the Humber (7) with a powerful Fleet, threatening the whole Kingdom with Desolation and Ruin. As this Prince found the Country unprovided with Troops and unable to defend itself, he quickly became master of Northumberland, East-Anglia, in a word, of all the Counties lying North of Wallingford. But these conquests not satisfying his ambition, he takes Hostages of all the principal Towns; and leaving his Son Canute to command the newly conquered Counties, he advances southward, and on a sudden lays Siege to London, where Ethelred was shut up. Though he was but ill provided with necessaries to besiege in form a place of that importance, he imagined the Citizens would be terrified at his Menaces. But finding they were not moved by them, he desisted from his enterprize, and went and ravaged the western parts of Wessex, where he found no opposition to his Arms. However, as he could not be easy, whilst London was out of his power, he resolved to besiege it once more. But whilst he was preparing for the Siege with greater precaution than before, he had information of Ethelred's departure from thence. This unfortunate Prince ever dreading to fall into the hands of an Enemy he had so heinously injured, and perceiving himself unsafe at London, retired into Normandy with all his Family. Whereupon the Londoners, being left to take care of themselves, judged it a rash undertaking to maintain alone the rights of a Prince relinquish'd by himself. They resolved therefore to submit to the King of Denmark, to whom all the rest of the Kingdom was now subject. Presently after the surrender of London, Sweyn was proclaimed King of England without any opposition, no one Person in the Kingdom daring to dispute his Title.

15. SWEYN King of Denmark, and first of the Danish Kings in England.

THE first act of Sovereignty exercised by the new King, was an immense Tax on the Kingdom for payment of the Danish Troops, who assisted him in his Conquests. No Historian mentions the Coronation of this Prince. Perhaps he neglected this Solemnity, believing it unnecessary, or, it may be, matters of greater Importance, afforded him no time to think of it, during his short reign of less than a year. Some say he died a natural death, being choak'd by a Rheum. Others believe, he was poisoned. Whatever was the cause, 1014. He dies suddenly. Malimb. S. Dunelm. M. West.

'tis certain, he died suddenly, which gave occasion to the legend Writers to say he was killed with a Club or Lance by St. Edmund, formerly King of East-Anglia. It is pretended, this Saint did it to save the Town, where his Body lay buried (8), from being plundered for refusing to pay the Tax imposed by the new King. The shortness of his reign, and perhaps his not being crown'd, are the reasons Historians, for the most part, have not reckon'd this Prince in the number of the Kings of England.

ETHELRED II. restor'd.

UPON the death of Sweyn, his Son Canute was proclaimed King of England by the Danes. But the English recalled Ethelred, promising to support him in the Throne, against all the attempts of the Danes, whose Government was become insupportable. Ethelred at first was loth to trust to their Promises, being apprehensive of a design to deliver him into the hands of his Enemies. But being encouraged by the good reception his Son met with, whom he had sent before to found the People's Inclinations, he returned to England. He was received with great demonstrations of Joy; and his Subjects swore Allegiance to him again, as if he had begun a new reign, his flight being considered as a sort of Abdication of the Crown. For his part, he promised to reform whatever was amiss in the Administration of the Government before his retreat. The eagerness of the English to throw off a foreign Yoke, made them flock to the King with such zeal and haste, that he soon found himself at the head of a powerful Army. His first Expedition plainly showed, his misfortunes had made no great alteration in him. Instead of marching against the Danes, he made use of his Forces to be reveng'd on the Men of Lindsey (9), who had some way displeased him. After he had gratified his Passion by the chastisement of these People, he prepared to march and fight the Danes, who little expected so sudden a revolution. Though Canute had for

AFTER Ethelred's death, the City of London and all the Lords there present proclaimed his Son Edmund King of England, who had already given signal proofs of his Courage and Conduct. But the Danes, and all the Counties in their possession, declared for Canute (1). However, as the English obeyed him against their Wills, abundance of them came and offered their service to Edmund, whom they looked upon as their lawful Prince, though they were constrained to swear to his Rival. By this means the two Kings were more upon an equality, which occasion'd many Engagements with various Success, that serv'd only to prolong the War, but not to decide the Quarrel. The City of London being a great support to Edmund, the Danish King thought of taking it from him, believing the depriving him of his chief strength would put a speedy end to the War. With this view, whilst Edmund was elsewhere employ'd (2), he approach'd London, and forming the Siege, carried it on vigorously. But the brave resistance of the Citizens giving Edmund time to throw in Succours from the other side of the Thames, Canute saw himself oblig'd to raise the Siege. Having thus lost his aim, he us'd many stratagems to surprize the Enemy, or draw him off from London. This last Project succeeding, he went and laid Siege a second time to the City. But he met with the same difficulties as before; the Inhabitants, by a very obstinate defence, gave Edmund time to come to their relief.

Canute vexed to see his measures thus broken, suddenly rais'd the Siege, to go and offer Edmund Battle (3), who was no less desirous of deciding the quarrel by one single Action, and therefore, instead of retreating, march'd towards him. In this Battle, which was very bloody, they both gave signal Proofs of their Conduct and Courage, without either of them being able to make Victory incline to his Side. After a long fight, the two Armies were oblig'd to part with almost an equal loss. The English Army however had like to have been worsted by the artifice of Edric Strem, who was on the side of the Danes. This Lord perceiving the English Troops, contrary to his expectation, fought in such manner as made the Victory dubious, cut off the head of one Ofmer a Soldier, who very much resembled Edmund, and fixing it on the top of his Lance, advanc'd to the foremost Ranks, and exposing it to the view of the English, cry'd out aloud, Fly, fly, you Scoundrels, behold the head of your King, in whom you trust. The English were thunder-struck at this sight, which would have occasion'd their defeat, had not the King shown himself with his Helmet off to his astonished Troops, and by that means reviv'd their courage, which the belief of his Death began to cool. The Battle lasting till night, without any visible advantage on either side, Edmund prepar'd to renew the fight next morning. But Canute, who had other designs, retired, during the night (4), to his Fleet that expected him, and imbarking his Troops, rowed along the Coast for some time, to amuse the Enemy, who could not guess his intention. When he thought he had deceiv'd Edward, he landed his forces, and besieged London a third time. But succeeding no better than formerly, he retir'd elsewhere.

The particulars of this War would be curious enough, if it were possible to give a clear Account of them. But we meet with extreme confusion in this part of the Eng- lish History. What may be gathered from Historians for 1016, certain, is this, that the two contending Princes fought Sax. Ann. within the space of one year, five pitch'd Battles. One Malm. of these Battles, fought in Effex, would have infallibly S. Dunelm. prov'd fatal to Canute, had it not been for the pernicious advice of Edric Strem, who continually changing sides, was then in the English Army. Edmund had been so generous as to pardon him, and so easy as to give credit to his Oaths of being entirely devoted to his service for the future. Nevertheless, this Traitor, who was a Creature of the King of Denmark, let no opportunity slip of serving the Dane. As he saw the Danes, hard pressed by the English, retreating in great disorder, he artfully persuaded Edmund to stop the pursuit of the Fugitives, by making him apprehensive their despair might cause them to rally, and the Victory, by some unforeseen Accident he snatch'd out of his Hands. This Artifice, which had formerly taken effect with Ethelred, wrought likewise with Edmund, who suffered himself to be guided by this fatal Advice. One is at a loss which to admire most, Edmund's Imprudence in being govern'd by a Man of known Disloyalty, or the Traitor's Boldness and Confidence. Tired at length with dissembling his real Sentiments, he threw away the mask in the last Battle near Affandun (5). Whilst the two Armies were engaged, he suddenly deserted his post, and joined the Danes, who received him as their real Friend. This Treachery caus'd such consternation among the English, that throwing down their Arms, they thought of nothing but saving themselves by flight. Edmund's Loss upon this occasion was irretrievable, the flower of the English Nobility being slain in this unfortunate Battle. The Earls Afric, Goodwin, Ulfketel, Ethelward, all of distinguished Valor and Loyalty, fell that day with their Swords in their Hands in defence of their King and Country.

After this important Victory, Canute looked upon himself as irresistible. He could not conceive, Edmund would ever be able to bring another Army into the Field that durst look him in the Face. But as the English were in extreme danger, they made extraordinary Efforts for their deliverance. Edmund had for him the hearts of his Subjects, and particularly the Londoners, who were always ready to give him effectual proofs of their Affection and Loyalty. And therefore, so far was he from being cast down by this grievous misfortune, that he rallied his dispersed Troops, and drawing together a more powerful Army than what he had lost, went in quest of his Enemy, who was marching to Gloucester. Canute, for his part, unwilling to give him time to augment his Forces, made haste to meet him with intent to offer him Battle. The two Kings stood in sight of each other for some time, at the head of their respective Armies (6), without either giving the signal of Battle. The dread of the Event held them equally in suspense. Edmund was sensible, he should be irretrievably undone, if he lost the day; and Canute foresaw a general defection of the English, in case he were vanquish'd. Thus, in all appearance, the gain or loss of a great Kingdom depended on the success of that important day. At last, Edmund, who was strong and robust of Body, and for that reason surnam'd Iron-side, sent Canute a word, that to prevent the great effusion of blood, that was going to be spilt in their quarrel, he judg'd it proper for them two to decide it by single Combat. Canute returned in answer, That, though he came not be-

(5) Afric was slain near Walden. Canute built a Church here in Memory of this Battle, to pray for the souls of the slain; and caused four Hills to be built, on top of which Monuments were erected, and inscribed into, there were found three Sax. Ann. with abundance of pieces of Bones in them, and many Claws of Iron, like those on Hunt. Ethel. These Hills are commonly call'd Battle-Hills, though they lie in Aldford Parishes. hind his Antagonist in Courage, yet being of a weak Constitution and small stature, he should take care how he engaged in to unequal a Combat. Adding, if Edmund was desirous to prevent any further effusion of blood, he was ready to resign the decision of matters to the principal Officers of the two Armies. This proposal was received with Joy by the Nobles of Edmund's Party, who passionately desired to find some expedient to put an end to so total a war. Edmund, on the contrary, would fain have deputed the quarrel by Arms; but however durst not oppose the Nobility, for fear it should occasion their defection. Plenipotentiaries therefore were nominated on both sides, who met in a little Isle in the Severn, called Alney, over against Gloucester, to consult about settling the pretensions of the two Princes. After a short Conference, the Peace was concluded by the partition of the Kingdom. Wessex, that is, all the Country South of the Thames, with the City of London, and part of the ancient Kingdom of Essex (1), was assigned to Edmund. Canute had for his share the Kingdom of Mercia, including Northumberland and East-Anglia. Every thing being settled, the two Kings met in the Isle of Alney; and mutually swearing to preserve the Peace, Edmund retired into Wessex (2).

Edmund's challenging Canute has given occasion to some Historians to affirm, the two Kings actually fought a duel in the Isle of Alney. And to make this appear the more probable, they have taken care to be very particular in the circumstances of this mighty Combat. They tell us, after it had lasted a good while without any advantage on either side, Canute finding his strength to fail him, lifted up the Visor of his Helmet, and proposed the division of the Kingdom, which Edmund consented to immediately. It is further added, at the same instant, they ran to embrace one another, to the astonishment of the two Armies, who were Spectators. But the best Historians not mentioning this single Combat, it can't be conceived they would have neglected to embellish their Histories with so notable an Event, had there been any Foundation for it (3).

Edmund did not long enjoy the peace, that cost him so much pains. Edric Streon, his Brother-in-law, fearing the union of the two Kings might prove fatal to him, bribed two of the King's Chamberlains to assassinate him. Some report, he employed his own Son in this execrable Treason. Thus died that brave Prince, who deserved a better Fate (4). He had not sat on the Throne a whole Year. But in so short a Reign, he had given frequent proofs of an undaunted Courage, a consummate Prudence, and a generous Temper.

He left, by Algiha his Wife, two Sons, Edmund and Edward, of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. He had also a natural Son, named Edwy, who was afterwards put to Death by Canute.

The Duke of Mercia, who was mightily pleased with doing Canute so signal a service, made haste to bring him the first news of it; but Canute detested so barbarous a Deed. However he concealed his Sentiments, because he thought he should have farther occasion for the Traitor, and even promised to advance him above all the Peers of the Realm. He kept his word with him; but in a very different manner from what the Villain expected.

THE Death of Edmund furnished Canute with an opportunity and pretence of becoming Master of Wessex, which the lawful Heirs were little able to dispute with him. It was not properly by force of Arms, that he undertook to carry his point, but by extorting the consent of the Nobles. How averse soever the English might be to the Danish Government, he was in hopes, the dread of plunging the Kingdom into fresh calamities, would make a still deeper impression on them, and constrain them to comply with his Desires. Wherefore he required a general Assembly to be called in Wessex (5), in order to set forth his claim, reckoning it would be always reasonable to use force, if he met with too strong an opposition. Edmund having left two Sons and two Brothers, Canute did not seem to have any right to pretend to the Crown. But he maintained, that in the Treaty of the Isle of Alney, the agreement was, the Survivor of the two Kings should succeed the other. He moreover plainly intimated, he should not stand to the determination of the Assembly, if the matter were decided against him. Edmund's two Sons were very young, and his Brothers in Normandy, where they thought of nothing less than obtaining the Crown of Wessex. On the other hand, Canute was in great power, and threatened very hard. Besides his possessing half the Kingdom, he had many Friends among the West-Saxons themselves, without reckoning those who were perwaded any expedient was preferable to the renewing of the War. It was therefore scarce possible for the Friends of the English Princes to surmount so great Obstacles. Had they been obligately bent to continue the succession in the Family of Edmund; they would have, probably, renounced in the Kingdom a War, which must have ended in its Destruction. In this perplexity, they were contented with intimating, that they would agree, Canute should be declared Protector of Edmund's Children, till the eldest was of age to govern. By this means, though they placed not these Princes on the Throne, at least they preserved their rights entire. But Canute was not satisfied with a borrowed Power. He was willing to succeed Edmund in his own right, by virtue of the treaty of Alney; a right, which though all did not acknowledge, yet none durst openly contest. Though the treaty did not expressly say what he asserted, he maintain'd it to be the true sense thereof, and that he could not be otherwise understood without Infringement. To prove this to be the design of the peace, and demanded of them, whether there was any thing stipulated in favour of Edmund's Sons? And upon their answering, there was no mention at all of the Princes (6), he infer'd from thence they had no right to succeed their Father. This reasoning, weak as it was, being supported by the votes of his party, and moreover by the fears of the English in general, was sufficient to determine the Assembly to comply with his Will. His reasons were thought, or feigned to be thought, very solid; and without a closer examination, he was acknowledged and proclaimed King of all England, and all the Lords, both English and Danish, swore Allegiance to him. Then he was crowned, and immediately after, he divided the Kingdom into four Governments, Mercia, Northumberland, East-Anglia and Wessex. The first he gave to Edric Streon, the second to Eric, the third to Turkill, reserving Wessex to himself, without appointing either Duke or Earl.

Canute was too politic not to know the motive of the English acknowledging him for their Sovereign. All that came near him, took care to hide their Sentiments, he was sensible an Enmity of near two hundred years standing, and fomented by continual wars, could not be extinguish'd in so short a space. For this reason, he resolved to use all possible precautions to hinder the revolt of the English. To this end two things were equally necessary, namely, the gaining the Affection of his new Subjects, and the getting rid of those that could give him any uneasiness. Tho' these two Projects seem'd inconsistent, he despair'd not however of accomplishing them, and accordingly spent the beginning of his reign to that purpose. As he well knew, the most effectual means of becoming popular, was to cause Justice to be administered fairly and impartially, he publicly declared there should be, for the future, no distinction between the English and Danes. After this, he published an Edict (1), ordering that every County should be govern'd by the same Laws as in the time of the Saxon Kings. He excepted however the northern Counties, because they were peopled with scarce any other but Danes, who had introduc'd particular Laws of their own, which there was no occasion to alter. The same Edict denounc'd the severest punishments against Malefactors, of what Nation soever; the King's aim being to let the English see, they had no reason to fear any respect of persons. These wise precautions produced the intended effect. The people were never weary of testifying their satisfaction to see themselves govern'd by their ancient Laws, under the protection of an equitable Prince, who seem'd to have no other view but the happiness of his Subjects.

Some will have him to be taken off by Poison: Others to be slain by an Arrow shot by an Image made of purple, which discharged itself upon the King's shoulder. But this is improbable. (See the various Opinions about his Death in Bromton, p. 906.) The Annals say, only, he died suddenly. He was slain by his Grand-son Egbert at Glaffenbury. With him fell the Glory of the English Saxons, and by his Death the Danes prevailed, and the Saxon Monarchy in a manner ended, after it had lasted one hundred and ninety years from the Establishment by Egbert, four hundred and twenty two from the founding of the Hegparth, and five hundred and forty eight from the Arrival of the Saxons under Horgf.

As soon as Canute saw the progress he had made in the hearts of the English, he believ'd he might venture without danger upon the second branch of his Project, the freeing himself from those that gave him most uneasiness, and particularly the Saxon Princes, Afred and Edward, Brothers of the late King, were retir'd into Normandy, with their Mother Emma, plainly foreseeing it would not be in the power of the West-Saxons to do Justice to the Royal Family. As for Edmund's two Sons, they remain'd in England, being too young to think of providing for their safety. These two Princes, notwithstanding their youth, made the new King somewhat uneasy, by reason of the People's affection for them. He would not have scrupled to put them to death; but he could not take such a step in England, without running the risk of becoming odious to the English, which was destroying his designs. However, as he did not think himself perfectly safe, whilst these two Princes were alive, he gave them in charge to one of his Domesticicks to carry them into Denmark (2), under colour of sending them abroad to travel. But in reality it was only to have it in his power the more easily to dispatch them out of the way, when their absence should have lessened the affection of the People.

The Person entrusted with the Princes, being conscious of the King's designs, was touch'd with compassion for these Innocents, and instead of carrying them to Denmark, conducted them to the King of Sweden, discovering at the same time his Master's Intentions. The King of Sweden gave the English Princes a very civil Reception: but however, not to quarrel with Canute, he sent them to the Court of Salomon, King of Hungary, his relation, who was willing to take care of their Education. In process of time, Salomon gave one of his Daughters in marriage to Edmund; and to Edward, his Sister-in-law Agatha, Daughter of the Emperor Henry II. Edmund died soon after his Marriage; but Edward had five Children, of whom two died in Hungary: The rest were, Edgar Ateling, Margaret, and Christina.

There were still in England two Sons of Ethelred II. both nam'd Edwy, of whom one was born in Wedlock, the other a Bastard. This last was call'd, but for what reason I know not, The King of the Clouds. Canute was no less troubled about these than the other Princes, every thing contributing to the Suspensions of a Prince, who, not being satisfied with the lawfulness of his Title, thinks himself insecure in the Throne. And therefore to make himself easy in this respect, he banish'd them the Realm. But some time after, recalling the first, under pretence of being reconcil'd to him, found means to dispatch him out of the way. The other, after enduring many hardships in his Exile, return'd into England, where he kept himself concealed, being privately supplied by his Friends with necessaries for his subsistence (3).

Canute would have been very glad to be freed with the same ease, from the trouble occasion'd by Afred and Edward, Brothers of King Edmund, who were retir'd into Normandy with their Mother. But he knew not how to get them out of the hands of Duke Richard II. their Uncle. He was even apprehensive, the Duke, whose Forces were not to be despis'd, would one Day espouse their Cause. To prevent this danger, he bethought himself of gaining the Duke of Normandy to his Interests, by demanding in Marriage his Sister Emma, Widow of Ethelred II. and by offering him at the same time Efritha one of his Sisters. These Proposals being accepted, the two Marriage-Solemnities were celebrated in a magnificent manner. If Emma was pleas'd with being once more Queen of England, it was not so with Afred and Edward her Sons, who openly shew'd their dislike. Edward especially, never forgave her for thus scandalously espousing the mortal Enemy of his first Husband. Both of them were also extremely incens'd against her for consenting, the Succession to the Crown of England should be settled by the Marriage-Articles, on the heirs of her body by Canute. This was cutting off, as far as lay in her power, from the Family of Ethelred, all hopes of ever mounting the Throne.

After Canute had by these precautions secur'd himself from all danger from the Saxon Princes, he thought it time to get rid of some Lords, whose Fidelity he suspected, or whose Power made him uneasy. The three principal ones were, the Duke of Mercia, the Duke of East-Anglia, and the Earl of Northumberland. These Lords had done him signal services; but this was the thing that render'd them formidable to him, being sensible how it lay in their power to hurt him, if they should undertake it. He knew Edric Streem was a Villain, and as he could not rely on his Fidelity, since he had so often betray'd the two former Kings, notwithstanding the obligations that ought to have attach'd him to their Interests, he resolv'd to begin with him. He quickly found a fair opportunity to execute this design, by even doing an act of Justice very acceptable to the English. This Lord, having one day the Infelence to upbraid him publicly, for not rewarding him for his past Services (4), and particularly for freeing him from so formidable a Rival as Edmund, afforded him the pretence he had some time been seeking. Edric had no sooner dropt these words, but the King answer'd in a Rage, since he was so audacious as openly to avow so black a Treason, of which he had hitherto been only suspected, he should receive his due Punishment. At the same instant, without giving him time to reply, he commanded him to be immediately beheaded, and his body thrown into the Thames (5). It is said, he order'd his Head to be fix'd on the highest part of the Tower of London (6), that he might perform his Promise to the Traytor, to raise him above all the Piers of the Realm. Thus Edric receiv'd at last the just reward of his Treacheries. Eric, Earl of Northumberland, was banish'd the Kingdom shortly after, under some pretence, Turkil, Duke of East-Anglia, frightened by these examples, and perhaps by the King's Emiliaries, voluntarily absented himself (7), for fear something worse might befall him. Several other Lords of less note falling in like manner a sacrifice to the King's Jealousy or Suspitions, their Posts were fill'd with those in whom he plac'd greater Confidence.

From this time the English began to enjoy a state of Tranquillity, which appear'd the sweeter to them, as they had been many years strangers to it, and had no reason to expect it. However, they were forced to pay a Tax of fourscore thousand Pounds (8), for the Arrears due to the Danish Army, great part of whom were sent back to Denmark (9).

Canute finding the whole Kingdom in profound Tranquillity, and having no reason to fear a Revolt, resolv'd upon a Voyage to Denmark (10). His Presence was absolutely necessary there, on account of the Danes and Fandals being at War. He took with him such of the English Lords as he suspected, least his absence should encourage them to raise disturbances in the Kingdom. For this reason also he carried with him the Flower of the English Troops, under the command of Earl Godwin, Son of Unloth, mentioned in the Reign of Ethelred II. Godwin, who was a Person of great experience, signalized himself in this War, by a very bold though successful Action. The two Armies of the Danes and Fandals being near one another, Canute design'd to attack the enemies early the next morning. Whilst his Troops were refreshing themselves, in expectation of the Battle, Godwin privately withdrawing from the Camp, with the Body under his command, fell upon the Vandals in the night, and putting them in disorder by this sudden attack, made great Slaughter of them, and routed the whole Army. At break of day, Canute preparing for the Battle, and not finding the English at their station, did not question but they were revolted to the Enemy. While he was perplexed in his thoughts at this unexpected accident, he saw the English General arrive, who was come himself to bring him news of his Victory (1). Though this action was of a dangerous Consequence, the King however was very willing, upon this occasion, to dispense with the Rules of military discipline, which require'd that Godwin should be punish'd for daring to fight without Orders. He received him with abundance of Careless, and as a Reward for so signal a Service, created him Earl of Kent. I shall have frequent occasion hereafter to speak of this Earl, who became at length the greatest Lord in England.

This War being happily ended, Canute returned into England, where immediately after his arrival he convened the Great Council (2), to confirm the Danish Laws, which, for some time, had been observed in part of the Kingdom, and particularly in Northumberland. There were then in England three sorts of Laws, namely, the West-Saxon, Mercian and Danish Laws (3). But these last had not the Sanction of publick Authority, till Canute, at his return from Denmark, put them upon a level with the antient Laws of England.

Canute, after his return into England, lived in profound Tranquillity, wholly employed in causing Justice and Peace to flourish, and rendering his Subjects happy. But some time after he was obliged to discontinue these pacifick employments, and take a second Voyage to Denmark, then invaded by the Swedes. This Expedition was not very prosperous. The English Troops he carried with him were great sufferers; and he had the mortification to meet with Misfortunes, he had not been used to.

Two years after, unmindful of his ill success in the last War with the Swedes, he entered into another, which made him ample amends for his former losses. He resolved to revive some old Pretensions to Norway, which had never been fully clear'd. Olaf, who then sat on the Throne of Norway, was a weak and unworthy Prince. Canute thought it would be easier for him to prosecute his pretensions in the Reign of such a Prince, than at any other time. He began the execution of his design with privately forming a strong Party among the Norwegian Lords (4). As soon as matters were ripe, he sail'd for Denmark with a considerable Body of English Troops (5), and suddenly landed them in Norway. Olaf, who had no intelligence of his practices, surpris'd at this attack, and more so, to see the major part of his Subjects side with the Enemy, found there was no remedy but to abandon his Kingdom, and save himself by Flight. Upon his retreat, Canute was crown'd King of Norway, regardless of the Right, so long as he had the Power in his hands. Two years after the dispossessed Prince attempting to recover his Dominions, was slain by his own Subjects, and Canute remain'd peaceable Possessor of the Kingdom. Olaf, after his death, was ranked among the Saints, and honoured with the glorious Title of Martyr.

The Conquest of Norway fully satisfied Canute's Ambition. From that time, laying aside all thoughts of warlike Affairs, he gave himself up to acts of Devotion: That is to say, he made it his principal business to enrich the Churches and Monasteries; as if the Usurpation of two Kingdoms, and all the consequent evils could be repaired by so slight a Satisfaction. Among other things he took particular care to give publick Marks of his respect to St. Edmund, formerly King of East-Anglia, slain by the Danes. Perhaps he gave some Credit to the Story of his Father Swein's being kill'd by that Saint, or rather, was willing to stifle the Report. However this be, he built a stately Church over the Grave of the Prince, and very much enlarged the Town where his Body lay buried, which from him had the Name of St. Edmundsbury. The Monastery, which was in the same place, and called Brendisforth, had been endowed by Edward the Elder. Canute enlarging the Building, and augmenting the Revenues, this religious House became one of the finest and richest in the Kingdom (6).

After he had shown, as he thought, visible marks of his Devotion, he resolv'd upon a Journey to Rome, which he perform'd in 1031. Whilst he staid there, he made many rich Presents to the Churches, and confirmed all the Grants of his Predecessors to the Church of Rome and the English College. He obtain'd, for his part, certain Privileges for the English Churches, and some advantages for those who came to visit the Tomb of the Apollis. But the most material Privilege, procur'd for the English, was an exemption from paying any Toll as they pass'd through Italy. The Emperor Canutus I, who was then at Rome, and with whom he had contracted a strict Friendship, granted him the same Privilege. The King of Dacia, was pleas'd also, on his account, to grant the same favour to the English in his Dominions. By this means the English Pilgrims and Travellers were eas'd of a great Expence, and freed from a thousand Injusts and Oppressions, to which they were more liable in France, Italy, and Germany. We have a large account of these matters in a Letter writ by this Monarch from Rome, to the Assembly of the General of the English Nation, informing them what he had done in favour of his Subjects. In this Letter he professes a great Piety, and a fix'd Resolution to govern his Kingdom after the most exact Rules of Justice, desiring that his Nobles to assist him in this good design (7).

As soon as he came back to England, he applied himself to the Dedication of the Church of St. Edmund, which he had begun before his Journey to Rome. In fine, having spent some years longer in continual acts of Devotion, on (8), he died in 1035, in the nineteenth year of his Reign (9).

Historians have not failed to give this Prince the surname of the Great, a Title, which seems peculiar to Conquerors, as if true Grandeur consisted in invading the Rights and Properties of others. But, not to confine Grandeur within such narrow bounds, Canute may be said to merit this glorious Title, if we consider only the latter part of his reign. The end of his Life was very different from the beginning. One would have thought he had not been the same Prince, who, to gain Kingdoms that belonged not to him, had caus'd so much Blood to be spilt, and trampled upon Religion and Justice. Some years before his death, he became humble, modest, just, and truly religious. If there be no exaggeration in what Historians say of him, from the time he was thoroughly settled on the Throne of England, he gave daily marks of Piety, Justice, and Moderation, which gain'd him the Affection of his Subjects, and an universal esteem among Foreigners. We have the following Story of him, which shows at once his good Sense, and to what heights Courtiers are apt to carry their Flatteries. One day, as he was walking by the Sea-side (10), his Attendants extolled him to the Skies, and even proceeded to compare him to God himself. Offended at these extravagant Praises, and willing to convince them of their Folly and Impiety, he ordered a Chair to be brought, and seating himself in a place where the Tide was about to flow, turn'd to the Sea, and said; O Sea, thou art under my Dominion, and the Land I sit on is mine: I charge thee not to presume to approach any further, nor to dare to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign. Having said this, he sat full for some time, as expecting the Sea should obey his Commands. But the Tide advancing as

At Canute's death, the Sea was low, hanging upon a gentle Defcent, with a little River on its English side; saw a Monastery very great and fair, which was called the Edmundston, large and spacious, and unparallel'd Magnificence. The Monastery itself looks like a City, so many Gates it had, and a wall as high as a City, many many Towers, and a Church, then such nothing can be more fitly, to which as Appendages, there are three more of considerable Beauty and Magnificence on the same Church-yard. There are two still entire, viz. St. Mary's and St. James's; the third, which has in Rome, was the great Church of the Monastery. But the numerous value of the Gifts at St. Edmund's Tomb, the Revenues at the Dissolution amounted to one thousand five hundred and thirty Pounds Year & a large Sum in those Days. He left three Sons, all of a fit Age to govern, to whom he bequeath'd his three Kingdoms by Will. Sweyn the eldest, and a Bastard, had Norway for his share: Some such by the Mother (1). To Harold his second Son by the same Woman, he gave England; and to Canute or Hardicanute, whom he had by Emma of Normandy, the Kingdom of Denmark. Gunilda, his Daughter by the same Prince, was Wife of the Emperor Henry IV.

As I shall soon have occasion to mix the Affairs of Normandy with those of England, it will not be improper to give some account beforehand of what pass'd among the Normans.

Richard II., Duke of Normandy, dying in 1026, Richard III., his Son succeeded him, who reigned but one year, and by his death left the Dukedom to Robert his Brother; who was no sooner in possession, but he show'd an Inclination to espouse the Interest of Alfred and Edward his Cousins, Sons of his Aunt Emma and Ethelred II. As they were both at his Court, and he could not help pitying their Case, he believ'd his recommendation might procure them some favour in England. Persuaded of this, as soon as he heard of the death of Edmund's Son, he sent Ambassadors to Canute, to entreat him to give the two Princes some part of the Kingdom of their Ancestors. This Embassy arriv'd in England, when Canute found himself so firmly seated in his Throne, that he thought he might safely disregard the Solicitations of the Duke of Normandy. Robert was so incensed at his refusal, that he resolv'd to compel him to do Justice to the English Princes. To that purpose he fitted out a powerful Fleet, and imbar-king with a numerous Army, resolv'd to make a Descent upon England, where he did not question but the English would readily join him. But meeting with a violent Storm, he had the Mortification to behold the greatest part of his Fleet perish; a Loss which could not be easily retrieved. In the mean time, these preparations satisfying Canute, that the Duke of Normandy really intended to attempt the Restoration of his Cousins, he endeavour'd to amuse him with offering them part of the Kingdom of Wessex. But Robert would not have been imposed upon by this offer, had not his misfortune at Sea constrain'd him to suspend the execution of his design, as it induc'd Canute also to go from his word. Some time after, Robert took a resolution to go in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, deferring, till his return, his intended Invasion of England. But he died in his way home. He left only a natural Son, called William, on whom, before his Departure, he settled the Succession. This is the same William the Bastard, whom we shall see hereafter ascend the Throne of England.

18. HAROLD I. Surnamed Harefoot, the third Danish King of England.

WHEN Canute espoused the Princess of Normandy, it was agreed, that the Children by this Marriage should succeed to the Crown of England. Notwithstanding this agreement, Canute left England to his Son Harold born in Denmark, and gave Denmark to Hardicanute, his Son by Emma of Normandy (2). In all appearance, he did not think the English had been sufficiently inured to the Danish yoke, to venture to place on their Throne his youngest Son, who was not above fifteen or sixteen years of Age, and of no great Genius. However this be, that Article of his Will met with great opposition from the English. They looked upon Hardicanute, born in England, of a lawful Wife, Widow of one of their Kings, as the only Person capable of succeeding; whereas Harold was consider'd but as a Foreigner and a Bastard. The Danes, on the contrary, were firmly bent to perform Canute's last Will and Testament. This difference might have been of ill consequence, if Harold had not with the utmost expedition seiz'd the Treasury laid up by the King his Father at Winchester (3). By the help of this, he was enabled to make himself fear'd, and to gain several of his opposers. Consequently, in a General Assembly in Mercia (4), he secur'd a majority of Voices, and got himself proclaim'd King of England. The Danes were all for him to a Man, and of course, the English Mercians, or the Inhabitants on the North of the Thames, who looking upon the Danes as their Masters, durst not directly oppose their Will.

Mean time, the West-Saxons, who did not think themselves conquer'd, as soon as they came home, conven'd an Assembly of the States of Wessex, and by the management of Earl Godwin, Hardicanute was elect'd and proclaim'd King of Wessex, the West-Saxons leaving the Mercians free to acknowledge Harold for their King (5). For the better understanding this matter, it must be remembered, there were Danes or People of Danish Extraction dispers'd all over England, but their chief Settlements were in Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumberland. And therefore, in all the Country North of the Thames, called then by the general name of Mercia, there were more Danes than English. On the contrary, in Wessex, that is, South of the Thames, the English were the most numerous, having admitted among them such of their Countrymen, who, to avoid living under the Dominion of the Danes, had quitted the northern Parts. By this means Wessex was exceeding populous, and become more powerful than ever, being capable of bringing into the Field great Armies as the rest of England. After this manner the Kingdom of Judah in old time grew strong at the expense of that of Israel. The Forces therefore of the West-Saxons and Mercians being equal, it is no wonder they were jealous of one another, and every one desir'd to have for Sovereign Him of the two Princes that was like to be most favorable. It was very probable, this division would cause a War between the two Nations. But Harold, who was not possess'd of his Father's Qualities, imagin'd, he was not strong enough to undertake the Conquest of Wessex. It was owing therefore to the equality of their Forces, that the two Kingdoms remained in Peace.

Hardicanute, who was in Denmark (6), made no little Earl Godwin to come and take possession of the Crown of Wessex; whether he was detained by other affairs, or on this, as well as on all other occasions, gave way to his natural Sluggishness. During his absence, Earl Godwin held the reins of the Government in an absolute manner, independent of Emma, the Queen-Mother, who was not beloved by the West-Saxons. Mean while Harold was contriving to gain by secret practices, a Kingdom which he found himself unable to subdue by Arms. As he had been deprived of it by the sole credit of Earl Godwin, he believ'd there was no readier way to ascend the Throne of that Kingdom than by gaining the Earl to his Interest. He took advantage therefore of his Brother's absence, to make Godwin his Friend by means, which, though not declared in History, may be easily guess'd at (7). Be this as it will, he succeeded to his Will. Godwin, who was not very scrupulous, finding his account in what was propos'd to him by Harold, promis'd to place him on the Throne of Wessex. This affair was so dexterously managed, that suddenly, on pretence that Hardicanute neglect'd to come into England, Godwin procur'd Harold to be acknowledg'd King of Wessex. This change however was not made

19. CANUTE II, or HARDICANUTE, the fourth Danish King of England.

AFTER the death of Harold, the great Men of both Nations, unanimously made an offer of the Crown to Canute, firnamed the Hardy, not to denote his Courage, but his strong constitution (1). He was then at Bruges, conceiving measures with the Queen his Mother, for the recovery of the Kingdom of Wessex, by means of a powerful aid promised him by the Earl of Flanders. The news of Harold's death putting an end to their Conflulations, he came to England with forty Ships, he had brought from Denmark (2). He was receiv'd with great demonstrations of Joy, both by the English and Danes. Earl Godwin himself, though he had no reason to rejoice at his arrival, after what he had acted against him, was the foremost to do him homage.

The new King began his Reign with an uncommon act of Cruelty. The ceremony of his Coronation was hardly over, when out of impatience to be revenged on his Brother, though dead, he commanded his Body to be dug up and thrown into the Thames (3). But all his care to prevent the Body from being buried again, proved ineffectual. Some Fishermen finding the Corps floating on the Water (4), delivered it to the Danes, who interred it in the burying-place of their Nation in London (5). It is further added, the King being informed it, ordered the Body to be thrown once more into the River; but, being found again, it was privately buried at Westminster.

Shortly after, Hardicanute impos'd an exorbitant Tax on the Kingdom (6), for the payment of the Fleet sent back to Denmark. Tho' the English had often paid the like Tax, term'd Danegeld, they were diffatisfied to have it renewed on this occasion, when there appeared no necessity for it. The Inhabitants of Worcester oppos'd the levying this Tax with the greatest Heat. They even proceeded so far as to kill two of the Collectors (7). Whereupon the King immediately ordered Godwin Duke of Wessex, Leisric Duke of Mercia, and Steward Earl of Northumberland, to draw their Forces together, march to Worcester, and destroy the City with Fire and Sword.

These Lords executed in part the King's Orders, though with great reluctance. The City was burnt, after having been plunder'd four days together. But the Inhabitants had leave to retire into a small Island in the Severn, nam'd Beovery, till the King was appeas'd (8).

Not long after Prince Edward, Son of Ethelred II, and Brother of the King by the same Mother, appear'd at Court. He met with a very civil reception, and presently demanded Justice against Godwin, charging him with the murder of his Brother Alfred (9). The King was well enough pleas'd with having an opportunity to punish the Earl, not so much perhaps for the death of Prince Alfred, as for what he had done in favour of the late King. He was cited therefore to appear and answer to what was alledged against him. But Godwin, who knew the covetous Temper of the King, wisely diverted the storm by a magnificent Present before his Tryal. This Present was a Galley, with a gilt Stern, mann'd with fourscore choice Soldiers, every one of whom had upon his Arm a gold Bracelet weighing sixteen Ounces, with Helms and Swords all gilded, and a Danish Battle-ax adorn'd with Gold and Silver, hanging on his left Shoulder, and a Lance of the same in his Right-hand. Every thing in the Galley was unfeverable to this magnificence. By means of this noble Present, the Earl was acquitted, upon taking his Oath, he had no hand in the death of Prince Alfred (10).

Hardicanute did not long enjoy a Crown he was unworthy to wear. He died suddenly in the third year of his Reign (11), at the nuptial Feast of a Danish Lord at Lambeth (12). Perhaps his death was hasten'd by poison (13); but his excessive Cruelty and Gluttony, rendered him so odious, that he died unlamented, neither was any inquiry made into the manner of his Death. All Historians unanimously agree, he spent whole days and nights in feasting and carousing (14). There is one however that praises him for keeping open Table four times a day, and exclaims against the nigardness of the Kings his Successors, who abolish'd so laudable a Custom.

20. EDWARD III. the Confessor.

HARDICANUTE leaving no Issue, Edward, Son of Ethelred II, and Emma of Norway, was the only Prince then in England that had any pretensions to the Crown. It was but reasonable the race of the Saxon Kings should be restor'd to the Throne of which they were unjustly disposse'd. But then it was no less right to recall out of Hungary Prince Edward, Son of Edmund Ironside, and place him on the Throne preferably to his Uncle, who was one degree farther remov'd. On the other hand, the uninterrupted Succession of four Danish Kings, who had possess'd the Throne for the Space of twenty-eight years (15), with the consent of the English, bred another difficulty, seeing Sweyn, Son of Canute the Great, was still alive. It is true, he was reckon'd by some as a Bastard. But besides that the King his Father had not treated him as such in the partition of his Dominions, it might be said in his favour, he ought to have the same privilege with his Brother Harold, to whom his being born of the same Mother was no obstacle to his mounting the Throne. It was therefore no easy thing to settle the Succession to the satisfaction of all Parties. On the contrary, it was to be feared that, on this occasion, the old Animosities between the two Nations would be re-

1041. view'd, and the Kingdom plunged into its former Calamities. Edward, Son of Ethelred II, having spent most part of his days in Normandy, was little known in England. Besides, his Merit, which was not very conspicuous, was incapable of adding any thing to his Right. However, a fortunate advice, which necessity constrain'd him to follow, procur'd him a Support, by which alone he was enabled to maintain his pretensions: I mean, Earl Godwin. Though it was but a few Months since, that Edward had prosecuted this Lord as the murderer of his Brother, he was advis'd to court his Protection, which he obtained with greater ease than he durst have expected. Godwin was so powerful, and of so superior a Genius to the rest of the Nobility, that it would have been almost impossible for Edward to succeed in his designs, if he had not gained him to his Interest. He was already distinguished as well by his Merit, as Birth, when Canute the Great entrusted him with the command of the English Troops, in the War against the Danes. After that expedition, wherein he gloriously signalized himself, Canute made him Earl of Kent, Suffex, and Surrey, and gave him in Marriage Thyra, Sister of Earl Ulphos, to whom Canute had given his own Sister Efrith, Widow of the Duke of Normandy (1). Godwin had by this Wife a Son, drown'd in the Thames by an unruly Horse. His second Wife was Gith, Sister of Swegn, who was King of Denmark after the death of Hardicanute. By this Wife he had seven Sons, Harold, Tofton, Swane, Ulnoth, Gurth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a Daughter nam'd Editha. His Credit with Canute the Great; the superiority of his Genius; his noble Alliances; his Dignities of Earl of Kent, Duke of Wessex, and High-Treasurer, conferred on him by King Harold; and lastly the Government of the Counties of Oxford and Hereford, in the hands of his eldest Son, had rais'd his Fortune to such a degree, that it would hardly admit of any addition. His interest was somewhat eclips'd in the Reign of Hardicanute; but he had the Address to divert the Danger he was threaten'd with. How great a grudge forever the late King bore Godwin, he was such an Enemy to Business, that he could not resolve to undergo the necessary fatigue of governing a large Kingdom, but left all to his management, as knowing him to be the most able of his Subjects. Godwin knew so well how to improve these favorable Junctures to ingratiate himself with the Nobles and People, that his Power far exceeded that of all the other English Lords. From what has been said, it plainly appears how necessary Godwin's assistance was, in order to Edward's mounting the Throne, though his pretensions had been still better grounded. However, Godwin was not one that neglected his own, in promoting the Interest of others. Before he engaged in Edward's Cause, he required certain conditions, and made him swear to marry his Daughter Editha. The Prince complied with these Terms, notwithstanding his inward reluctance to espouse the Daughter of a Man, whom he looked upon as the murderer of his Brother Alfred.

As soon as Godwin had received from Edward the Assurances he demanded, he conven'd a General-Assembly (2), where, by his management, that Prince was acknowledged (3) and proclaim'd King (4), with unanimous consent (5). It was happy for the English, there was then in the Kingdom never a Prince of the Family of Canute the Great, whom the Danes might have set up in opposition to Edward. If Swegn King of Norway had been on the spot to head the Danes, it may reasonably be presum'd, either that his Pretensions would have caus'd a Civil War, or England been once more divided into two Kingdoms. Without doubt, the Danes would never have suffer'd the Rights of the Royal Family of Denmark, four Princes whereof had successively sat on the Throne, to be thus destroy'd. On the other hand, the English were so averse to a Danish Government, that probably they would have ventured all to free themselves from that yoke. But the present juncture proving favorable to the English, they not only place on the Prince of their own Nation, but also deliver'd them from the fear of falling again under the Domination of the Foreigners.

In the General-Assembly above-mention'd, to which in all likelihood, the Danes being then without a Leader, were not call'd, Godwin strenuously harangu'd, to demonstrate to the English, "that a favorable opportunity now offered to free themselves from the Oppressions under which they had groan'd for so many years. He describ'd with his natural Eloquence, the Calamities their Country was overwhelmed with, and in subjection to Foreigners. He display'd the extreme Poverty of the Danes, who, not content with sharing the Kingdom with the English, treated them like so many Slaves. He call'd to their remembrance the sad times, when an Englishman and a Dane meeting on a Bridge, the former durst not stir a step till the latter was pass'd over. That if an Englishman did not make a low Reverence to a Dane, he was sure to be soundly cudgell'd. To all these miseries he added that of the excessive Taxes they had been oblig'd to pay, particularly Domesday (6), which was impos'd for no other end but to satisfy the insatiable Avarice of their greedy Masters." In fine, he omitted nothing that could inflame the rage of the English. This harangue wrought so upon the hearers, that it was resolv'd, no Dane for the future should ever sit on the Throne of England. Some add, the enumeration of the Calamities they had so long groan'd under, made such an Impression on their Minds, that with one Consent, they came to a Resolution to drive all the Danes out of the Kingdom, and accordingly put it in execution forthwith.

This is one of the most difficult passages in the whole English History; which way soever it is view'd, insurmountable difficulties occur. In the first place it is hard to conceive, how in a General Assembly of the Kingdom, it was possible to come to a Resolution to destroy all the Danes, and much more, how it came to be in the power of the English to put it in practice. The Danes alone were in a manner possess'd of all the eastern and northern Counties, and in Mercia, that is, in the heart of the Kingdom, were as numerous as the English. Four Kings of their Nation had successively reign'd, who far from humbling them, had no doubt, shown them great favour, and given them the Superiority. And yet, without any extraordinary Event, except the death of Hardicanute, a Prince of little Merit and Reputation, the English are said to become on a sudden superior. But this is not all, 'tis affirm'd, this Superiority was so great as to enable them to expell all the Danes out of the Kingdom. How is it possible to believe, the Danes should suffer themselves to be thus master'd, without making the least Resistance? For it does not appear, there was any War or Commotion in the Kingdom on this occasion. The Danish Historians make the matter still more improbable. They say, all the Danes in England were massacred in one Night, by the treachery of Harold Son of Godwin, who order'd all the Danish Soldiers to march out of the Garrisons, under pretence of solemnizing the Funeral of the late King (7). But this account has not the least appearance of Truth: for, in the first place, Harold, who was then very young, had no share in the Government, and consequently could give no such Orders to the Danish Officers. In the next place, how was it possible that all the English Historians, Brumpton only excepted, who however says much less of the matter, should agree to pass over in silence so remarkable an Event? Nay, how could they write their Histories without ever making the least Allusion to it. If 'tis objected, they were silent, as afraid of their Nation for so barbarous an Action, what is the reason they had not the same scruple with regard to the massacre in the reign of Ethelred? These are difficulties that are not easily to be clear'd. There seems, at first sight, to be a plausible way

(5) Brumpton and some others relate this Matter otherwise: Upon Hardicanute's Death, Alfred, (whom some affirm to be slain in Harold's, some in Hardicanute's Reign) being invited into England, Godwin represented to the Lords that he was coming with great Numbers of Normans, to whom he had promis'd to give Estates. Upon which Godwin was sent to meet him at Southampton, where, in order to make Way to the Crown for his own Son by Canute's Daughter, he serv'd him in the barbarous Manner before relat'd in the Reign of Harold. The English Nobles, who had not approv'd of the Treachery of Godwin, vow'd Revenge, which Godwin being inform'd of, fled into Denmark, and his Estate in England was confiscat'd. After this, the English sent over to Edward, to desire him to come and take Possession of the Crown. Shortly after his Coronation, Godwin hearing of King Edward's generous Temper, returned into England, to petition for his Pardon and Estate again, and was receiv'd by the King before an Assembly held at London, of his Brother Alfred's Murder. But with much ado, by the Intercession of Leofric and other Peers, the Matter was mad up, and he was re-need to all his Lands. Brumpton Chron. p. 934. Et. Hoveden agrees in the main with this Relation, but say that Godwin murder'd Alfred, because he thought him too high a Spirit to marry his Daughter, whom he aimed to make Queen of England, by marrying her to Edward, an easy and simple Prince. But this, Malmsh. observes, is contrary to Records.

(6) The Tax amount'd to forty thousand Pounds a Year. King Edward releas'd the Nation of this heavy Burden in the Year 1051. The occasion of his doing, though relat'd by Leg-philus, will scarce be credit'd. As the King was one Day brought to see his heap of Money collect'd by this Tax, he threw back as in a goat Fight, and being asked the Reason, protell'd he saw the Devil capering and dancing over the Money. Upon which he resolv'd it to be all paid back to the People, and Domesday to be abolish'd for ever, after it had been paid a thirty eight Years. Leg-phil. p. 63. Edit. Gale.

Counted from coming to this resolution. For want of this assistance, Swane was dejected, but retired to his Kingdom, after the death of his Enemy.

The Danish Pirates did not entirely restore peace to the Kingdom, the Coasts being that same year infested by a new Enemy. Swane, Son of Godwin, having deflowered an Abbess (1), with whom he was in love, and not daring to stay in England after such an act, retired into Danmark, where he in vain expected his pardon, by the Mediation of the Earl his Father. But when Godwin was willing he should be chastised, on finding the King inexorable, Swane was not able to procure a Pardon so soon as he imagin'd. When he saw, contrary to his expectation, he was made to wait for it a long while, he mann'd eight Ships, and made open War upon the English, plundering the Merchants, and committing such barbarities on the Inhabitants of the Sea-coasts, as exceeded those of the most cruel Enemies. His insolence gave Godwin's Enemies a great advantage, who took occasion from thence to exasperate the King more and more against the Earl and his Family. He himself was in great perplexity about this Affair. He was not willing to appear openly for his Son, lest he should be charged with abetting his Rebellion. On the other hand, he could not but be extremely concerned at Swane's being considered as an enemy to the public. To free himself from this Situation, he desired Earl Bern, Son of Ulphon and Estrith, Sister of Canute the Great, to use his Interest with the King in behalf of his rebellious Son. Though Bern had openly declared against Swane, he was prevailed with by Godwin to speak to the King, who complied with his request upon certain Conditions. The Matter being thus in a fair way, Bern went to Swane, to persuade him to submit to the King's mercy; but Bern was ill rewarded for his pains. Swane imagining the Earl was come to betray him, slew him with his own Hand, and ordered his Body to be thrown into the Sea (2). This brutal action prevented a Reconciliation for the present. But the King forgave him afterwards, notwithstanding the complication of his Crimes: So much did this weak Prince stand in fear of Godwin's revenging himself, in case he continued inflexible. Thus Godwin, though hated by the King, obtained as many favours as if he had been really beloved by him. But these Favours, instead of producing a mutual affection, served only to foment their Disunion. The Earl did not think himself at all obliged to the King for Benefits proceeding from the sole motive of Fear; and the King increased his Hatred, in proportion as he was forc'd to conceal it.

Besides the private resentment of the King towards Godwin, the Earl had also to deal with other enemies, who were continually stirring up that Prince against him. I mean the Normans, who were very numerous at Court, and in great Credit there. They looked upon Godwin as a profest Enemy, because he loudly complained of the great regard the King had for them, and made no scruple to say, they would soon become as troublesome as the Danes. His Complaints were not altogether groundless. Edward, who was educated among the Normans, went into all their manners, and express'd such an affection for them, as raised the jealousy of the English. The Norman Language was more generally spoken at Court than the Saxon. The King's Favour to the Normans rendering them insolent, they would have all the World cringe to them. They who could not bring themselves to this, seldom fail'd of feeling the effects of their Resentment. Godwin was of this number. He believed he was powerful enough to support himself without their assistance. Instead of seeking their protection, he affected by his continual raileries to show, he thought it not in their power to hurt him. Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury, of all the Normans, was in greatest credit at Court. The King had taken him from a Monastery in Normandy (3) to promote him to the Bishoprick of London, and afterwards to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, to the great regret of several English Bishops, who aspired to that Dignity. This Prelate, who was naturally haughty, and whom the Royal Favour made still more arrogant, kept no measures with Godwin, who, on his part, showed the utmost contempt to him. The Archbishop, mean'd to free himself thus treated, made use of all his address to have a wrong interpretation put on all the Earl's Actions, and to impute the King's hatred to him to a higher degree.

Meantime, standing thus at Court, an accident happened when least expected, which brought Earl Godwin to the brink of Destruction, and gave the King room at last to discover his Enmity to him. Eustace, Earl of Boulogne (4), being come to visit the King his Brother-in-law, was honourably and kindly received, Edward having a particular Affection for him. Some time after, as he was on the Road, in his return to France, one of his People, who was sent before to provide Lodgings at Dover, pick'd a quarrel with a Townsman and killed him (5). This Accident making a great noise among the Inhabitants, they ran to Arms, to seize the murderer, who stood upon his defence, with some of the Earl's domestics that were with him. Eustace, entering the Town in the midst of this Tumult, and seeing his People attacked, was obliged to take their part, without having time to enquire into the occasion of the quarrel. But being overpowered with numbers, twenty of his Retinue were killed on the spot, and himself narrowly escap'd with his Life. Irrag'd at this Affront, he returned to the King at Gloucester, where the Court then resided, and loudly demanded satisfaction. Edward, willing to do him Justice, ordered Godwin to march immediately with some Forces, and chastise the Rioters that were under his Government. But instead of obeying the King's order, the Earl warmly replied, "It was not the Custom in England to punish People un- heard, and the Rights and Privileges of the Subjects ought not to be violated; that the accused should be summoned, and make satisfaction with their Bodies or Estates if guilty, or if innocent, should be discharged. Adding, in a very haughty Tone, that being Earl of Kent, 'twas his Business to protect those that were under his Government, against the Insults of Foreigners." Some say, he even charg'd the King to deliver up the Earl of Boulogne into his hands, that he might be punished upon the place, if found guilty of this Riot. Edward was extremely provok'd with this bold Answer, which was not only a refusal to obey his Commands, but also a stinging Reproach for his partiality to Foreigners. The Archbishop and the rest of the Normans eagerly improv'd this occasion to exasperate him against the Earl, and to blow up a flame, which was already but too much kindled.

How angry soever the King might be, he was forc'd to conceal it, not being in condition to punish on the spot, a Lord who rival'd him in Power. Syward and Leofric being absent, there was no appearance of succeeding, should he attempt any thing against Godwin, without being first assur'd of their Concurrence. Mean while, as he was in the utmost Impatience to be reveng'd, he dispatch'd trusty Messengers to these two Lords, to inform them of his Resolution to chastise Godwin, and to order, or rather desire them, to repair to him out of hand. How privately soever this matter was transacted, Godwin had notice of his design, and took his measures accordingly. As he was very sensible he should be infallibly ruin'd, as he not beforehand with his Enemies, he drew together some Troops which were soon reinforced with others from his Son's Government (6). An Incursion of the Welsh at the same time into Hersfordshire, furnish'd him with a pretence to levy his Army. He pretended these Forces were designed to drive the Enemy out of the Kingdom, though he had received no orders to that purpose. In the interim, the King causing him to be summoned before a General Assembly conven'd at Gloucester (7), he came with his Sons, but so well attended, that he had nothing to fear. Thus guarded as he was, it would have been so dangerous

(5) He was taken to the famous Godfrey of Boulogne, who won Jerusalem from the Saracens.

(6) Leofric was oblig'd up on having Lodgings in the Dover-man's House, in spite of his Teeth, and wound 3 him in the Shoulder; whereupon the Normans march'd the other upon the spot. In this fray were nineteen Dover-people slain, and twenty one of English, many others being wounded.

(7) He drew together some Troops out of Kent, Essex, and Wessex; as his eldest Son Swane did out of his Essex, i. e. out of Oxford, Gloucester, Hertford, Northampton, and Bedfordshire; and Harold out of his, i. e. out of Essex, Essex, Anglia, Cambridge, and Herefordshire. All the Forces met at Gloucester, where King Edward having of Godwin's great Preparations, sent Orders to Syward and Leofric to march with all their Armies, which they did, and arriv'd at Gloucester on the 10th of August.

(8) But on the 10th only with Twelve Persons, but he refused to appear. In the mean time finding his Army had decer'd, he fled, and the King's Army, who had been sent to Gloucester, with his Son Swane, Harold and Leofric came to Gloucester, and finding them a Ship, got ready by Swane, they went over to Ireland. to call him to an account, that the King was advised by the most prudent to hide his Remittances. They represented to him, if the Earl stood on his Defence, as he seem'd resolved, it was to be feared, he would draw to his Side the majority of the People, whose Interests he seem'd to espouse, and therefore the affording him a pretence to carry his Audaciousness any farther, could not be done without danger. In pursuance of this Advice, such a Peace was patch'd up as Goodwin desired, that is, he was cleared for some excuses which related more to his manner of acting, than the thing in question.

This Reconciliation was of no long continuance. Edward, who could not digest the Affront he had received, took new measures against Goodwin, in gaining some of his principal Friends by presents and promises. As soon as matters were ordered to his mind, he conven'd a General Assembly, where Goodwin and his Sons were summoned to appear. But being informed a design was laid to apprehend them, they refused to come, without a Safe-conduct and Hostages for their Security. Upon which, they were banish'd the Kingdom, and the Combination against them was so strong, that they saw themselves abandon'd on a sudden by their principal Adherents, and forced to submit to the Sentence pass'd upon them. Edward not content with being thus freed from Goodwin, shut up the Queen in the Nunnery of Warrul (1), with design, in all appearance, never to take to her again. Goodwin retired to the Earl of Flanders, Father-in-law of his Son Tyng, and Harold failed for Ireland, where he hoped to meet with Assistance. To deprive the Earl and his Sons of all hopes of returning, the King dispos'd of all their Posses, the chief whereof were conferr'd on Alfiss Son of Loefric.

In the mean time, Goodwin, who thought himself unjustly oppressed, took measures to right himself by Arms, these being no other remedy, as matters stood between the King and him. The Earl of Flanders furnishing him with some Ships, he infected the eastern Coasts of England, whilst Harold his eldest Son did the same to the western. But these faint Attempts were to little purpose, seeing their Forces were not very considerable. Wherefore Goodwin return'd to Flanders, where for two years together, he left no stone unturn'd to persuade the Earl his Protector, it was for his Interest to lend him a powerful Assistance, and to have such a Friend as he in England. Baldwin being at length prevail'd with, granted him an Aid capable of rendering him formidable, whilst, on the other hand, Harold equip'd a good number of Ships in Ireland. Edward having Intelligence of these Proceedings, fitted out a Fleet with all expedition, the command of which was given to Randolph of Mantes his Nephew (2), and another Lord named Odda. These two Admirals hearing Goodwin had been seen off Rumsey Point, resolv'd to go and attack him, but he had time to retire elsewhere. His measures being thus broken by the King's Expedition, he steer'd his Course again for Flanders, and sent back Harold into Ireland. His view was to make the King believe, he gave over his undertaking, by reason of the obstacles he met with. Mean while, he kept his Fleet always ready, that he might improve any occasions that should offer. Shortly after one presented itself, which he did not fail to make Advantage of. Whether the two Admirals were wanting in point of Duty or Conduct, or thro' Court-Intrigues, which History has not taken care to discover, Edward on a sudden removed these two Lords from the command of the Fleet. This alteration, and the breaking some of the inferior Officers, rais'd such discontents among the Sailors, that they deserted in crowds. Thus the King's Ships not being in condition to keep the Sea, were brought up the Thames in order to be new-mann'd. Goodwin by his Spies being informed of this disorder, puts to Sea immediately, and makes a descent on the Isle of Wight, where he extorted great Sum from the Inhabitants, whilst he waited for his Son Harold to join him. After their junction, they sail'd up the Thames, and advanc'd towards London, where the King's Fleet lay. Edward giving way to his Passion, would have gone himself with such Ships as were ready (3), and tried the fortune of a Battle; but his Council oppos'd it. They represented to him, that instead of hazarding his Person in an Action, the consequences whereof might prove very fatal, it would be more for his own and the Kingdom's Advantage, to try to make Goodwin return to his obedience, by gentler methods. This was whollom advice; but the King would hardly have followed it, had not Goodwin, who was informed of what was transacting at Court, smooth'd the way, by saving him the shame of making the first Advances. He sent the King word, that he was not come to fight against his Sovereign, but most humbly to intreat him to hear his Justification: That his coming thus arm'd was only to defend himself against the Insults of his Enemies, and he should always glory in being the most faithful of his Subjects. How respectful soever this message might be, Edward, looking upon it as a sort of Banter, flatly refus'd to hearken to any Accommodation; affirming, he could not resolve to pardon his Brother's murderer. His obstinacy had like to have produced a fatal effect. Goodwin's Army, entirely consisting of Foreigners, who were in hopes of enriching themselves with the plunder of London, they were for engaging the King's Fleet without delay. But the Earl, who was perfectly informed how the Council stood dispos'd, check'd the ardour of his Soldiers, and behaved in a very submissive manner with regard to the King. His moderation was attended at last with the Success he expected. Edward was prevail'd with by the principal Lords, and especially Sigand Bishop of Winchester, a great Friend of Goodwin's, to receive the Earl into favour again, at least, as to outward appearance. He even agreed, he should be acquitted, by the General Assembly of the Kingdom, of the murder of Prince Alfred, which he was charg'd with at first, but on the condition he should give Hostages for his good Behaviour for the future (4). Goodwin submitting to the King's Terms, put into his hands his Son Unoth, and his Grandson Hocme, who were immediately sent into Normandy. Edward not thinking he could secure them in England, Goodwin and his Sons were reformed to their Estate and Dignities, and the King honourably took again the Queen his Wife, whom he thought he had been rid of for Life.

Upon the first news of the agreement between the King and the Earl, the Archbishop of Canterbury retired to the Monastery of Juniville in Normandy. Shortly after his departure, he was banish'd the Kingdom by an Assembly General, as an incendiary and fomenter of Divisions between the King and his Subjects (5). Sigand was made Archbishop in his room, on supposition, the see was become vacant by his Banishment, a supposition that the Court of Rome would by no means allow. This ended the affair of Goodwin. This Lord seemingly was very like to have been undone for ever; but, contrary to the expectation of his Enemies, his Dignity tended only to render him more powerful and formidable. This same year he lost his third Son Swane, who going in pilgrimage to Jerusalem, died on the Road in some place in Syria, where he fell into the hands of Robbers (6).

The Court of England enjoying a profound quiet after Goodwin's Return, William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy, took this opportunity to pay a visit to Edward (7). Some say, Edward sent him word by Archbishop Rupert, that he design'd to make him his Heir, and that his aim in this Visit was to get a Confirmation of this promise. But this is only conjecture. However that be, during William's stay in England, the King took a pleasure in showing his Gratitude for all the civilities he had received both from him and the Duke's Father. It is pretended, after having thus publicly testified his gratitude, he privately gave him a more substantial mark of his affection, by making his Will, and nominating him his Heir and Successor (8). If it be true that Edward made such a Will, which however no body ever saw, it is more probable he did it at this time, than when he was in Normandy. Whilst the Throne of England was fill'd by the Danes; whilst Alfred his eldest Brother, and also the Children of Edmund Ironside were alive; how could Edward foresee he should ever be King of England? But at the time William the Bastard was in England, Edward, bearing still a mortal Hatred to Goodwin in his Heart, notwithstanding their feigned reconciliation, might suspect the Earl of aspiring to the Crown, and hope by this settlement to break his measures. But after all, it is much more probable he made no Will, but contented himself with giving the Duke of Normandy some verbal Promise.

he would still find in him an Enemy, who wanted neither Money, nor Arms, nor Friends to support a right he was resolved to defend to the last drop of his Blood. In short, he represented to him, that if he was bent to pursue his first Project, instead of securing, as it was in his power, a Greatness, second to none but the supreme, he hazarded a certain good, for a very uncertain Prospect.

Harold was too wise not to see, that, on this occasion, he had but one course to take; which was, to pretend to be convinced by the reasons the Duke had alleged. He returned him therefore in answer, That indeed, before the arrival of Prince Edward, he had believed if the King died without Heirs, he was as worthy to ascend the Throne as any other Nobleman of the Kingdom. He even owned, he had begun to take some measures, which inspired him with hopes of success, but had dropt his design since the coming of Edward, being sensible there was no room to pretend to the Crown, as long as there were Princes of the Royal Family in England. He added, since he was acquainted with his pretensions, and the King's pleasure, which till then he had been ignorant of, he had much rather the Kingdom should be governed by so great a Prince as the Duke, than by Edgar Atheling, who scarce knew how to govern himself. To convince him the more of his Sincerity, he required certain conditions, and among others, demanded one of his Daughters in Marriage, as a reward for his future Service. Whatever Harold required was immediately and gladly complied with. But as the Princess, the Duke designed for him, was too young, the intended Marriage was deferred till a more convenient time. Mean while, Duke William not trusting wholly to Harold's bare word, made him swear on the Gospels, that he would punctually perform his Promises, especially, that he would never attempt to mount the Throne of England. This agreement being made, they parted both of them extremely well satisfied in outward appearance, and Harold returned into England (1).

He was no sooner at liberty, but he looked upon his Oath as extorted, and consequently not binding. He could not understand upon what foundation the Duke of Normandy pretended to the Crown of England, or by what right Edward could transfer it to a Foreigner. And therefore, so far was he from any Thoughts of standing to his Engagements, that he resolved to take advantage of the Duke's Confidence, and contrive just measures to frustrate his Designs. From thence-forward he used a double diligence to strengthen his Party in such a manner, as should put it out of the power of the King or Duke to lay any obstacle in his way. If hitherto he had entertained any scruple with regard to Prince Edgar, it entirely vanished upon consideration that in mounting the Throne himself he should do no Injury to that Prince, since the Crown would be otherwise disposed of even by his Uncle the King. He laboured therefore more and more to secure an interest in all the great Lords of the Kingdom, to which he found the way very open. The Duke of Normandy was absent, and but little known in England, where moreover the Normans were extremely odious. Prince Edgar, by reason of his youth, was in no condition to oppose designs so detrimental to him. As for the King, he was so unreserved in the affair of the Succession, that he promoted the Interest neither of the Prince his Nephew, nor of the Duke. He was no doubt at a loss how to reconcile his promise to the Duke of Normandy, with his recalling his Nephew from Hungary. He thought only of passing his days in Peace, without troubling himself about what should happen after his death. Thus every thing concurring to favour Harold's designs, he neglected nothing that might serve to confirm the good opinion conceived of him by the English. Two opportunities that offered themselves presently after, were extremely favorable to him.

The Welsh renewing their Incursions under the Conduct of Griffin their King, Harold and his Brother Tostig joined their Forces to repulse them. They were so fortunate in their expedition, that, after several Advantages gained upon the Welsh, they compelled them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. Griffin being afterwards restored, and renewing the War with the English, Harold marched to the Frontiers, and struck such a Terror into the Welsh, that they sent him the head of their King (2). This event, which showed how formidable Harold was to the enemies of the State, confirmed the English in their opinion, that he, who knew so well how to defend it, deserved to wear the Crown.

Harold had another opportunity to add new Luster to his Glory, as it enabled him to give proofs of his moderation and equity, as he had lately done of his valour and conduct. Tostig his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, treated the Northumbrians with such Severity, and committed so many acts of Injustice, that at last, the People not being able to bear his oppressions any longer, took up Arms against him, and expelled him Northumberland. This Action being of a dangerous consequence, Harold was ordered to chastise them, and restore his Brother. As soon as he approached the Borders, the Northumbrians sent Deputies to inform him of the Reasons of their Insurrection. They told him, they had no design of withdrawing their Obedience from the King, but only from an unjust and cruel Governor, who exercised over them a tyrannical Power, to which neither they nor their Forefathers had ever been subject. Intimating Malice, which they were resolved to hazard their Lives, rather than submit to the like power again. However, they solemnly protested, provided the King would set over them one that would govern them according to the Laws and Customs of their Country, nothing should be able to shake their Fidelity. To these Remonstrances they added a long List of the Grievances they had suffered under Tostig, intreating Harold to prefer the good of the publick before the interests of his own Family. Harold finding this affair related chiefly to Tostig, and that the King was not directly concerned in it, sent an impartial Account of the whole matter to the Court. At the same time he interceded for the Northumbrians, and, not content with obtaining their Pardon, procured them Harold, Son of Algar Duke of Mercia, for their Governor (3). By this equitable Proceeding he entirely gained the affection of the northern People, and contracted a stricter Friendship with Algar than before. This Union was absolutely necessary for the execution of his Projects.

But if this Action strengthened the People's Esteem and Affection for him, it exasperated to the last degree his Brother Tostig, who never forgave him. But as it was not in his power to vent his fury on Harold's person, he turned his rage upon some of his domesticks (4), whom he caused to be cut in pieces, barrell'd up, and sent to his Brother for a present. After so barbarous a Deed, not daring to stay any longer in England, he retired into Flanders to Earl Baldwin his Father-in-law (5).

Whilst Harold was thus paving his way to the Crown, Edward never concerned himself about the Succession, which he had exceedingly embroiled by his engagement with the Duke of Normandy. His Thoughts were wholly employed about the Structure of the Church and Monastery of Westminster, on which he laid out the Money he had vowed to expend on a Journey to Rome, which was dispensed with by the Pope upon that condition. There was formerly in the same place, called Thorney by the Saxons, a famous Temple sacred to Apollo, converted this Pagan Temple into a Christian Church, which was destroyed by the Danes. This Church having been long buried in its Ruins, Edward undertook to rebuild it, with an adjoining Monastery, which from its lying West of London, was called Westminster (6). In process of time a City was built here by degrees, which almost rivals London itself, and keeps the name of the Monastery. These two Cities separated only by a Gate, have distinct Magistracies and Privileges, though they are often confounded under the name of London. The Church and Monastery being finished about the latter end of the year 1063,

(2) He was taken Aug. 7, 1064. This was the End of Griffin of Wales, to whom the Welsh Clergy gave the Character of a valiant and generous Prince, and for the most part victorious, till now he perished by the Treachery of his own People. He had sent the Head with the golden Stern of Griffin's Ship, which the Welsh had brought with the Head, to the King at Gloucester. Florence of Worcester adds, that the Butchers of Griffin swore Fealty to him as well as to the King.

(3) When they themselves seemed disposed to have. The occasion of their Insurrection at this time was this: One Gilpatrick, a great Officer in Northumbria, having been murdered at Court by Queen Edith's Order, (though this seems contrary to her meek and pious Temper, in an act of a Queen between her son and her Brother Tostig, and he likewise killing in his own Lodgings two of Gilpatrick's Friends, and besides having laid under the Impression, or Tribute, on all Northumbrians, he People incensed at it, and at his other Grievances above-mentioned, rose to a Mob, and were not disposed till he was sent to the Lord. (5) Harold (who had heard many Tales about the Hatred of Godwin's Son to one another, tells us another Story of this Matter. The King had some reason to desire Harold to serve him with the O.P. Tostig was so enraged at his being preferred before him, that he flew in his Face in the King's Presence, and pulled him down to the Ground by his Hair. But the Soldiers coming in and putting them in a Room, and the King, and going to his Brother's Country House, drove his Domesticks as is above related. Upon which the King commanded him to be banished, and the Northumbrians expelled from their Country. But this does not seem probable; for what Occasion had the Northumbrians to rise against him, seeing he was banished before he was King?

(6) It was dedicated to St. Peter. This Church of Edward's was demolished by Henry III. about one hundred and forty Years after, who erected a new one, which was fifty Years in building. The Abbey very much enlarged it on the West-side, and Henry VII. added to the East a Chapel, which Edward calls the Shrine of the World. Edward was buried the next Day after his Death, in his newly dedicated Church.

Edward

Edward was desirous the Dedication should be performed in a very solemn manner (1.). To this end he summoned to meet at London a General Assembly, at which were present all the Bishops and great Men of the Kingdom, to be witnesses of this Ceremony. At this very time it was, that the King was seized with a sudden illness, of which he died in a few days. As soon as he found the time of his dissolution approaching, his principal care was to finish the Ceremony for which the great Men were assembled (2.). As for the Succession, he would not meddle with it, surrounded as it was with so many difficulties. In his own mind he was for the Duke of Normandy: The Right was manifestly in Prince Edgar his Nephew: but Harold had the hearts and hands of the English. So many difficulties, upon which he could never determine whilst in health, becoming insurmountable in his present condition, he resolved to leave the decision to God alone.

Mean while, Harold was not idle. Almost all the Lords of the Kingdom, both Spiritual and Temporal, being then assembled at London, he found means to induce them to act in his favour, and come to a Resolution of sending Deputies to the dying King to entreat him to name a Successor. But whilst, these deputies had Orders to intimate to the King, that in case he nominated any but Harold, he would infallibly involve the Kingdom in endless troubles, which would be inconsistent with his wisdom, and the affection he had all along express'd for his People. Edward, not being then in a condition to examine a Proposal of this nature, replied, That since they were met in a body, he left it to them to chuse the Person they judged most worthy to rule over them. He died a few moments after (3), leaving the Succession as unsettled at his death as it was during his life.

This Prince, who was born at Gifford (4) near Oxford, reigned twenty-four years, without ever suffering any misfortune from foreign Enemies. However, he cannot be said to have reigned happily, since he lived in continual Fears, occasioned by the overgrown Power of Earl Godwin and his Family. His mild and peaceable Temper were a great means however to procure him some Tranquillity. Had he attempted to humble Godwin's Pride, and lessen Harold's Power, he would certainly have been involved in troubles, from whence he would have found it difficult to extricate himself. But by shutting his eyes at their secret Practices, and feigning to know nothing of their designs, he prevented them from acting more openly, caused them to lay more distant Schemes, and thereby gained time to arrive at the end of his days. He was remarkable neither for his Virtues nor Vices; and his natural Parts were but mean. His Piety has been exceedingly cried up, and has acquired him the glorious Title of Confessor; and yet, we do not find he was any sufferer on account of Religion, unless we consider as a sort of Martyrdom, the mortifications he privately laid upon himself from a religious Motive. It is certain, he was very charitable, and expended in Alms the Sums vainly lavished away by other Princes upon their Pleasures. This joined to his Good-nature, of which he gave from time to time uncommon Instances, made him pass for a Saint among the People, and particularly among the Monks, who reaped great Advantages from his liberal disposition. They have not been satisfied with extolling his Virtues to the Skies, but have even, if I may so say, canoniz'd his very faults, and endeavoured to represent them as so many proofs of his Sanctity. Of this we need no other witness but his own Historian or rather Panegyrist, who attributes his voluntary Chastity to a Vow made before his Marriage. This Writer assures us, Edward espoused Editha, Daughter of Godwin, purely to exercise his Virtue by a continual Temptation. But it is easy to see he acted from a very different motive, since he parted with his Wife the moment he thought he could do it with Safety. However, the opinion of his Sanctity taking by degrees deep root in the minds of the People, he was canonized by Pope Alexander III, under the name of Edward the Confessor (5).

It was not thought sufficient to allow this Prince all the Virtue necessary to carry him to Heaven, unless he had a place given him also among the Saints of the first Class. We are told he was favoured with several Revelations, with the gift of Prophecy, and many other miraculous Powers, in proof of which such weak and trifling Instances are produced, as are not worth mentioning. However, I can't pass over in silence one special Privilege he is said to receive from Heaven, of curing the King's Evil. Nay, it is affirm'd, this Privilege has descended to the Kings of England his Successors. Hence the Custom in England of the King's Touching for the Evil at a certain time of the year (6). But the late King William III. of glorious Memory, was so persuaded he should do no Injury to Persons afflicted with this Distemper, by not touching them, that he refrained from it all his reign. The Kings of France also have claimed the same Privilege ever since the time of Clovis, the first Christian King of that Kingdom (7).

What has been most commended in King Edward, was his good nature, the excessiveness whereof has been carefully insinuated by several circumstances of his Life, of which I shall content my self with producing two as a Specimen of the rest. One day being laid down upon the bed, one of his domesticks, who did not know he was in the room, stole some Money out of a Chest he found open, which the King let him carry off without saying a word. Quickly after, the Boy returning to make a second attempt, the King call'd to him without the least Passion, Sirrah, you'd best be satisfied with what you've got, for if my Chamberlain comes and catches you, he'll not only take away all you have stol'n, but whip you severely (8). Another time, as he was hunting, a Countryman maliciously spoiling his Sport, he gallop'd up to him, and said to him in anger, By our Lady, I would be revenged on thee if it was in my power. These are the incontestable Proofs of his extraordinary good Nature, which, according to his Panegyrist, advanc'd him so far above all other Men.

Edward was the last King of Egbert's race, though not the last Saxon King, as some have affirm'd, since his Successor was of that Nation. Had not this weak Prince preposterously abstain'd from conversing with his Queen, a very beautiful and virtuous Lady, he might perhaps have had Children, and thereby prevented a Revolution, which involv'd the English in Slavery.

Before the reign of Edward, the West-Saxon, Mercian Union of three sorts of Laws was observed in England, namely, the first in Wessex, the second in Mercia, and the last in Northumberland. This Prince reduced them all into one Body; and from that time they became common to all England, under the name of the Laws of Edward, to distinguish them from those of the Normans, introduced afterwards (9).

(6) It will not be amiss to relate the first Instance of this Hereditary Miracle, as Mr. Coller calls it. A young married Woman having the Misfortune to be barren, and troubled at the same Time with the Distemper since called the King's Evil, was, after all human Means had been tried in vain, admonish'd by a Vision to go to the King, by whose Merits she should be cured upon his Touching, Tending, and Signing with the Cross, the Parts affected. The Woman runs to Court next Morning overjoyed, and tells the King the whole Matter; who thereupon directs her to Wesley, Touch and Cross her purified Sores, which immediately breaking, and Corruption and Worms bursting out, the Parts were in a few Days healed without the least Scar remaining; and moreover, her Barrenness was removed, and the soon became the joyful Mother of Children. This is the first Act, as it is given us by Alfred in his History of the Life and Miracles of Edward the Confessor, of that Supernatural Power, enjoyed by the Kings of England ever since. But though Mr. Coller lays, to dispute this Matter it is to go to the Excesses of Septuagint, yet there are some, who doubt of it on the following Accounts.

I. This Power is generally fixed to the Lineal Succession; whereas it is plain; there was no such thing in those Days, neither was Edward himself the next Heir.

II. It is plain from Alfred, that this Privilege was given him not as a King, but as a Saint; and Malmshury says, they are to be blamed that attribute it to his Royalty and not to his Sanctity. Consequently there is no Reason his Successors, who were certainly no Saints, should be to highly favoured of Heaven.

III. Alfred reckons up many other Miracles which he performed; as the restoring to their Sight six or seven blind Men, &c. but does not say a Word of his Power of curing the Evil descended to his Successors, any more than his Power of restoring the Blind to their Sight, or of his removing Barrenness, which one would think should be joined to the other, since they were cured both by the same Touch.

IV. As there is no evident Reason why the Kings of England should have this Privilege above any other Christian Prince, so if Heaven had granted such a Power to our Kings, one would think they should have it in such a Degree as to render it visible to all, and that the Cure should immediately follow the Touch: Whereas Multitudes are not cured at all, and those that are pretended to be so, not till a considerable Time after they have been Touched.

(7) This Miracle is appropriated by Lawrence, Physician to Henry IV, to the Crown of France; but Dr. Tucker is even with him, for he makes the King's of France to do it by virtue of their Alliance to the Royal Family of England. And Mr. Coller will have the Antiquity of this Power to be on the side of England, since he says, Leavis the Gully was the first that Touch'd for the Evil two hundred Years after our Edward. Ecl. Hist.

IF the great Men assembled to appoint a Successor to Edward, had been swayed only by Justice, Equity, and the ancient Customs of the Kingdom, they would not have long debated, to know to whom the Crown was devolved. Edgar Atheling was the only Prince of the Family of their ancient Kings, and consequently, the only Person who had a right to lay claim to the Crown. But Harold had so well laid his measures, that he was unanimously elected, without any regard to the right of the lawful Heir. As for the Duke of Normandy, his pretensions grounded on the late King's promise, do not seem to have been considered at all. It is certain this Prince had never publicly declared his design of aspiring to the Crown of England. Accordingly, the English Lords might be ignorant of the matter, or at least pretend to be so. But supposing they had been informed of his pretensions, it would have served only to furnish them with a fresh Motive, to place on the Throne a King more capable than Edgar Atheling, of defending the Kingdom against the attacks of a foreign Prince.

The manner of Harold's succeeding to the Crown is variously related by Historians: Several affirm (1), he was elected with one common voice, and without any constraint, by the Witten-Gemot then assembled, and crown'd the day after his election by the Archbishop of York. Others say, he usurped the Crown by compelling the great Council to elect him, after extorting his nomination from the late King just as he was dying (2). There are some, who look upon this election as a fiction, affirming, Harold, without troubling himself about the consent of the Nobles or People, put the Crown on his head himself with: any Formality (3). The reason of this diversity among the Historians proceeds from their espousing either the right of Harold, or of the Duke of Normandy, as if Prince Edward's claim was to be reckoned as nothing; whereas in truth he alone had a right to succeed to the Crown. But as among this variety of opinions, a Man is in danger of being swayed by the passions and prejudices of the Historians, rather than by justice and equity, it will not be amiss to explain this matter, by laying before the reader, what might be alleged for and against each of the three Competitors.

Edgar's Title.

As for Prince Edgar, it suffices to say for him, he was the sole Prince of the Royal Race. It is true, his being born out of the Kingdom might be objected against him. But as Prince Edward his Father was not legally banished, his being forced by Canute to live in exile, ought not to have prejudice'd his Son's Right.

As for the Duke of Normandy, he can hardly be imagined to aspire to the Crown of England without some Foundation, and yet it cannot be conceived upon what Title he supported his pretension; so great is the diversity of opinions upon this Subject. Some tell us, he was invited over by the English to free them from the Tyranny of Harold (4). Others say, Edward, when in Normandy, promised him, if ever he came to the Crown, to make him his Heir. In fine, several affirm, that Edward appointed him his Successor by his last Will; and some even assure us, this Will was confirmed in Edward's life-time by the general Assembly of the Nation: But this pretended Will was never produced. Neither does it appear that Duke William ever founded his claim upon any such thing, as if it were known, or he had it in his Hands. In all probability therefore the Foundation he went upon, was some verbal promise made him by Edward, when he was in England. It was doubtless in consequence of this promise, that he required Harold not to rise up in competition against him. Had the English done Edgar Justice, and placed him on the Throne, it is not likely Duke William would have attempted, upon so trifling a pretension, to wrest the Crown from a Prince to whom of right it belonged. But he had to deal with Harold, who, being only a private Man, had procured himself the Crown by indirect practices, and without any manner of Right. Accordingly, setting aside Prince Edgar, he compared his right only with that of the reigning King. His Interest induced him to think, that Edward's promise was equivalent to an election, since it was thought proper to exclude the lawful Heir. To this may be added, that he looked upon the Crown of England as what he could not miss of, especially after binding Harold by an Oath. And therefore, the Indignation at being deceived, the desire of revenge, and chiefly his Ambition the root of the quarrel, all concurred to inspire him with a resolution to make an attempt upon the English Crown, in spite of all Opposition. Persuaded as he was, that he had no less right than Harold, he thought he might use force to wrest the Crown from a Prince, who had naturally no title to it. These, in all appearance, were the motives that engaged Duke William in so great an Undertaking, the success whereof seemed however very doubtful.

As for Harold's right it ought also to be considered under a double view, with regard to the Duke of Normandy, and with regard to Prince Edgar. If we examine the election of this King, in opposition to the Duke, we find nothing but what was regular and according to form, and against which the Duke could have any just reason to object. It is certain, supposing Edward had nominated Duke William his successor, either by will, or otherwise, the nomination would have been of no force, unless confirmed by the Assembly of States (5). Accordingly this is what some affirm, being sensible the Duke's title without this approbation was little worth. And in truth, where is the Nation, that, without being forced to it, would suffer their King, by his own bare nomination, to subject them to a Foreigner, in exclusion of the Princes of the Royal Blood, or even of the most worthy Lords of the Kingdom? If this were ever the case, it was done by surprise, before the People had time to oppose it. The election therefore of Harold was very lawful, at least with regard to the Duke of Normandy, since it was made by the Assembly-General, whose power Duke William had no right to dispute.

But in comparing Harold's Title with Prince Edward's, it is hard to give it so favorable a Construction. It may indeed be supported by the opinion of those who maintain, that during the Saxon Government, the Crown was elective, and the Nobles and People had a power of giving it to whom they pleased. But besides the difficulties attending this opinion, supposing that were so, this argument would not be sufficient to justify Harold's election. How extensive soever some would make the privileges of the Assembly-General in the time of the Saxon Kings, yet no one, I believe, will affirm they had a Power of bestowing the Crown on a private Person, in prejudice of the Princes of the Royal Family. At least it would be exceeding difficult to produce any instances from the History of the Anglo-Saxons to establish this Opinion. The question then amounts to this, whether the Nation had a right to elect Harold on exclusion of Edgar, or whether, on this occasion, they did not stretch their power beyond its natural Bounds. As I design to treat of this matter in another place (6), I shall not undertake to decide the question at present, but only remark, that supposing the Nation had such a power, yet it must be owned it was abused at this juncture, and that Edgar had great injustice done him. But notwithstanding all its defects, this election gave Harold an incomparable better title than the bare nomination of King Edward gave Duke William, granting the forementioned Will was as real, as it appears to be imaginary. From what has been said, it is easy to see, the Duke of Normandy's claim was built on a weak Foundation. But to return to our History.

After Harold was crown'd, there was not a person in the Kingdom but what owned him for Sovereign, and paid him Obedience. But tho' he found no opposition at home, it was otherwise abroad. Not to mention the Duke of Normandy, who, before he discovered, put himself in a condition to execute his designs, Earl Godwin was preparing to disturb the King his Brother in the possession of his new Dignity. He could not forgive him his impartial Proceedings, when in favour of the Northumbrians, he dispossest him of his Government. Though Harold's Accession to the Crown should have rendered him more formidable to him, this consideration serv'd only to inflame his hatred the more, and put him upon devising all possible means to dethrone him. As he was not ignorant of the Duke of Normandy's Intentions, with whom he had contracted a strict Friendship, on account of their marrying two Sisters, Daughters of the Earl of Flanders, he went to him to take measures with him against the King his Brother. There is no doubt but Duke William encouraged him to execute his designs (1). But it does not appear that he furnished him with any Money, Troops, or Ships, of all which he had himself so great need against his intended Invasion. Probably therefore it was the Earl of Flanders, his Father-in-law, that supplied Tostig with Ships, by means of which he infested the English Coasts, and plundered the Isle of Wight. After which, he landed some Troops at Sandwich. But being informed the King was marching towards him, he set sail for the North, and entering the Humber with his little Fleet (2), made a descent on Yorkshire, and committed ravages as if he had been in an Enemy's Country. Harold, not thinking it advisable to leave the southern Parts, commissioned Earl Morcar to go against his Brother; who, having been made Governor of Northumberland in the room of Tostig, was particularly concerned to put a stop to his Incurfions. As for the King, he remained at London, that he might have an Eye to Edgar's Party, and prevent them from exciting any troubles upon that young Prince's account. This seem'd to him, at that time, to be what he had most to fear; being sensible, the injustice done Edgar fat heavy upon the Minds of those who were well-affect'd to the ancient Royal Family. Accordingly, to prevent their discontents from breaking out into Action, he caus'd the Prince as well as those of his Party. He even infam'd from time to time, that he had accepted the Crown purely on account of Edgar's Youth, willing they should understand, as if he meant to restore it to the Prince when he was of Age to govern. With this view, he created him Earl of Oxford, and seem'd to take a very particular care of his Education, as it were to qualify him for the Government of the Kingdom.

Mean while, Morcar, accompanied with his Brother Edwin, Earl of Chester, march'd with all Expedition against Tostig, who was now on the South Side of the Humber. He came upon him unawares in Lincolnshire, and put his little Army to flight, compelling him to betake himself to his Ships. Tostig finding he could do nothing considerable with so small a number of Forces, steer'd towards Scotland, in expectation of assistance from thence (3). But perceiving the King of Scotland was not dispos'd to support him, he puts to Sea again, with design to make another descent on England. Prevented by contrary winds, he was driven on the Coast of Norway, where he accidentally stumbled upon what he had been seeking so industriously.

Harold Harfager King of Norway, had lately taken some of the Oracles (4), which belonged to Scotland, and was fitting out a more numerous Fleet in order to carry on his Conquests. Tostig being inform'd of this Prince's designs, went directly to him, pretending he was come on purpose to propose to him a more noble undertaking. He represent'd to him, that a favorable opportunity offer'd to conquer England, if he would but turn his Arms that way. The better to persuade him, he told him, there were in the Kingdom two powerful Factions, both Enemies to the King, the one for Prince Edgar, the other for the Duke of Normandy, and therefore, the English being thus divided, it would not be difficult to subdue them. Adding, that he himself had a strong Party in Northumberland, which would very much promote the execution of this design. In fine, he made him believe the King his Brother was extremely odious to the English, and would be certainly deferted by them, as soon as there appear'd in England a foreign Army strong enough to support his Enemies. Harfager, greedy of fame, and already devouring in his Imagination so noble a Prize, wanted not much Solicitation to engage in this Project. Preposess'd by Tostig of the practicableness of the thing, he resolv'd to employ all his Forces in making so glorious a Conquest.

Whilst the King of Norway was making his preparations, the Duke of Normandy was not less seriously thinking of means to wrest from Harold a Crown, he had fo-long been in expectation of, and which he could not see on his Head without extreme Regret. Though his Rival, in all appearance, was firmly seated in his Throne, the Duke imagin'd he was able to pull him down, the way by Arms was still open, when all other methods fail'd. However, to proceed regularly, he sent Ambassadors to Harold, to require him to deliver him up the Crown, and in case of refusal, to charge him with the breach of his Oath, and declare War against him. Harold told the Ambassadors, "Their Master had no manner of right to the Crown of England: That supposing the late King had dispos'd of it in his Favour, a thing the English knew nothing of, it was contrary to the Laws of the Land, which allow not the King to give away the Crown: according to his fancy, much less to a Foreigner. As for his part, he had been elect'd by those, who had the power of placing the Kings on the Throne, and therefore could not resign it, without the breach of that Trust reposit in him by the English. As for the Oath, the Violation whereof he was charg'd with, it having been extorted from him at a time when he had not the Power to help himself, it was null and void, by the Laws of all the Nations in the World. In fine, he added, that he knew how to defend his Right against any Person that dur'd dispute it with him". This Quarrel being of too great consequence to be decided without coming to blows, each Party took such measures as he judg'd most likely to prove successful (5).

The Duke's Vexation to be deceived, the desire of Revenge, the shame of renouncing his Pretensions, and the pleasing hopes of being Master of England, hurried him on to use all possible endeavours to succeed in his Designs. On the other side, Harold finding he was like to have so formidable an Adversary, thought nothing of more service to him, than gaining the People's Affection to his Interests. To this purpose, he made himself more popular than ever. He lessen'd the Taxes, and caus'd Justice to be duly and impartially administred. In fine, he forgot nothing that might serve to confirm his Subjects in the esteem and affection they already had for him. His labour was not in vain. The English, charm'd with his first Proceedings, which afforded them so pleasant a prospect, resolv'd to sacrifice their Lives and Fortunes to support him on the Throne to which they had rais'd him. Duke William, for his part, not being ignorant of the Resolution of the English, perceiv'd he had no other way to attain his ends, but by setting on foot Forces proportionable to those of the Enemies he was resolv'd to attack.

The main difficulty was, to raise a sum of Money sufficient for the Charge of so great an Undertaking. His first method was, to convene an Assembly of the States of Normandy, to obtain their concurrence. But he found them very backward to comply with his Desires. They told him, that "Normandy having been drained of Men and Money by the late War, they were so far from being in a condition to think of making new Conquests, that they were hardly able to defend their own Territories against the attacks of a powerful Invader. Besides, how just soever the Duke's Claim to England might be, they could not see that any advantage would accrue to their Country from this Expedition. In fine, that they were not oblig'd by their Allegiance to serve in foreign Wars, wherein the State had no concern". This stout answer destroying the Duke's hopes of raising Money in a publick way, he bethought himself of an Expedient, which succeeded to his Wish. This was to borrow Money of private persons, and gaining some of the chief Men: The rest were inspir'd with an emulation who should be most zealous in assisting their Prince. William Fitz-osbern undertook to fit out forty Ships at his own expence. The most wealthy, every one according to his ability, subscribed very large Sums: So that the Duke by this Method rais'd more Money than he could have done by a publick Tax. But as this was not sufficient, he engaged several of the neighbouring Princes to furnish him with Troops and Transports, on condition of their having Lands assigned them in England after the Conquest. He even demanded the assistance of France; but it was not the interest of that Crown that the Duke of Normandy should become more powerful. Very fortunately, King Philip, who was then a Minor under the care of the Earl of Flanders, obstructed not his Proceedings, which a Prince that had been old enough to have known his own Interest, would infallibly have done. It is true indeed, the Court of France endeavoured to dissuade the Duke from this enterprise, but to no purpose (1).

Mean time Duke William, who was too wise not to be sensible of the weakness of his Title, omitted nothing that might serve to give it some colour of Justice. With this view he bethought himself of an expedient very proper to blind the eyes of the World; which was, to procure the Pope's Approbation of his undertaking, to whom, it is said, he made a promise of holding the Kingdom of England of the Apostolick See. However this be, the Pope very heartily espoused his cause, and sent him a consecrated Banner (3), as a mark of his Approbation. Moreover, willing that all Christians should know that Religion was concerned in this affair, he solemnly excommunicated all that should dare oppose the Duke in the execution of this Project. This Approbation was of great service to the Duke, as it furnished him with means to justify his intended expedition, and at the same time removed the scruples of such, as he was endeavouring to engage in his Quarrel. But it had not the same effect in England. Whether the English knew nothing of the Pope's Excommunication, or looked upon it as a great piece of Partiality, it prevented not Harold from equipping a large Fleet, and raising a numerous Army, with which he resolutely expected his Enemy.

The charge of keeping so considerable an Armament, could not but be very burthenfome to the People, a thing the King would have been glad to avoid. After he had in vain expected some months the Arrival of Duke William, finding he did not appear, and the autumnal Equinox approached, he imagined, pursuant to some false informations he had received, that the Duke had deferred his Expedition till the Spring. Accordingly, he thought he might safely lay up his Ships for the Winter, and disband his Troops (4), to save an unnecessary expence.

But as he was returning to London out of Kent, where he had given his last orders for disbanding the Army, News was brought him that the King of Norway, accompanied with Earl Tostig, was entered the Tyne, with a Fleet of five hundred sail (5). Surpriz'd at this unexpected Invasion, he hastily drew his Army together again, which were dispersing themselves. But before they were ready to march, the Norwegians had made a great progress. Having sack'd the Counties on both sides the Tyne, they put to Sea, and entering the Humber, landed their Forces on the North Side (6), and ravag'd the Country with inexorable Cruelties. Morcar and Edwin, who were upon the spot, endeavour'd to stop their Career, with some Troops levied in haste; but were so beaten that their whole Army was destroyed (7). Flucht with this Success, the Norwegians advanc'd towards York, and laid Siege to the City, which they quickly became masters of; the Inhabitants, who were unprovided with all things necessary for their defence, choosing rather to surrender upon Terms, than expose themselves to certain ruin. Mean while, Harold having drawn his Army together, advanc'd with all expedition, to give the Norwegians Battle, who having left their Fleet in the Humber, were marching towards the North, to compleat the Reduction of Northumberland, before they proceeded to other Conquests. As they marched but slowly, and as Harold made all possible haste, he came up with them at Stamford Bridge, on the River Derwent, a little below York (8). The Norwegians, upon his approach, intrench'd themselves in so advantageous a Post, that it seem'd impossible to force them. They were posted on the other side of the River, where there was no attacking them but by the Bridge, of which they were Masters. Notwithstanding this, Harold, who was very sensible how much it behoved him to come to an engagement, ordered the Bridge to be attacked without delay. The Norwegians stoutly defended it, but could not withstand the Efforts of the English, though animated by the astonishing valour of one of their own Men, who defended the Bridge alone against the English Army for a considerable time. At length, the brave Norwegian being slain (9), Harold became Master of the Bridge, and pass'd his Army over. Then furiously falling upon the Enemy, after an obstinate Fight, entirely routed them. There had never been seen in England an engagement between two so numerous Armies, each having no less than threecore thousand Men. The Battle, which was very bloody, lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon. Harfager and Tostig were both slain, and Harold obtained a complete Victory. Of the whole Army that came from Norway in five hundred Ships, the remains were carried off by Olaf, Son of Harfager, in twenty Vessels, with the Conqueror's leave. The Booty which was taken upon this occasion was very great, since there was found in the Camp all that the Norwegians had brought from home, and all they had plundered in the Kingdom (10). But Harold having been so impolitic as to retain the spoil to himself, raising such discontents in his Army, as prov'd of very ill consequence to him afterwards (11). One would think this Prince, who was naturally generous, should have secur'd the hearts of his Soldiers by a Liberality which would have cost him nothing, especially at a time when he stood in so great need of their Service. But he consider'd, the expending this Booty in the war against the Duke of Normandy, would very much ease the People, whose Affection he was desirous to preserve at any rate. Nevertheless, he should have consider'd the gaining the hearts of his Soldiers was no less necessary. Doubtless it would have been better for him to cultivate their Affection, as he too plainly discover'd to his cost on another occasion. It has been often observ'd, that Soldiers are never so little regard'd, as when by their Bravery they have procur'd their masters some signal Advantages, because their own Victories serve to render them useless. But 'tis no less certain, that sooner or later a discontented Army give their Prince or their General cause to repent of using them ill.

Whilst Harold was busied in the North, in redressing the disorders occasioned by the Norwegian Invasion, the Duke of Normandy, who had long waited for a Wind at St. Valry, last set sail about the end of September, and had a speedy passage to Pevensey (12) in Sussex. 'Tis affirm'd, that in leaping ashore, he fell all along on his Face; at which one of the Malin Soldiers said merrily, See, our Duke is taking possession of England; which the Duke took as a good Omen. No body appearing to oppose his landing, his first care was to run up a Fort near the place where he disembark'd (13), to favour his retreat in case of necessity. Some however will have it, that he sent his Ships back to Normandy, to let his Army see they had nothing to trust to but their Valour (14). After some days stay at Pevensey, he march'd along the Shore as far as Hastings (15), where he built a stronger Fort than the former, relying there to expect his Enemy of whom he had no Intelligence. 'Twas here he published a Manifesto, showing the reasons of his coming into England; namely, first, to revenge the death of Prince Alfred, Brother of King Edward. This, if ever any was a frivolous pretence, since Earl Godwin, the contriver of that Murder, was dead, and Harold never charg'd with it. Secondly, To restore Robert Archbishop of Canterbury to his Sec. This was no better reason than the first, for Robert was banish'd by the General Assembly in Edward's Reign, and consequently the present King could not be blamed for it. 'Tis very likely this Article was insert'd in the Manifesto on the Pope's Account, to serve as a cover for his partiality to the Duke. Thirdly, and principally, to offer the English his assistance to punish Harold for pre-fuming to seize the Crown, without any right, and directly contrary to his Oath. It is to be observed, he made no mention either of Edward's Will, or verbal promise, and that his Silence on that head renders this third motive very trifling. For indeed, without such a Will or Promise, what pretence could the Duke of Normandy have to concern himself with the affairs of England? Some affirm he founded his right on his Kindred to Edward; but he was no way related to the late King only by Emma of Normandy, who had never any title to the Crown; and besides, he was himself a Bastard. But he did not so much build his hopes on his Manifesto, as on the strength of his Army. He was very sensible, as on the strength of the Victory, his reasons would be readily admitted. Mean while, not to terrify the English, he charged his Army to injure none, but such as were actually in Arms against him. But neither this precaution, nor his Manifesto gained him any Friends. The English could not conceive upon what Foundation he had entered the Kingdom with an Army, or what advantage any one could have by taking his Part.

The news of the descent of the Normans was quickly brought to Harold, who was still in the North, little expecting this Invasion till the Spring. As soon as he was informed of it, he march'd to give these new Enemies Battle, whom he did not think more formidable than the Norwegians. By hasty marches, he came to London, where, upon a Review, he found his Army very much diminished, not only by the Battle of Stanford, but by unusual defections, occasioned by the discontent of his Troops. However, all the Nobility of the Kingdom repaired to him, and offered their Assistance on an occasion where it was no less their Interest than his to repel the Foreigners. Whilst he expected at London some of his Troops that were behind, Duke William sent Ambassadors to require him to resign the Crown, and to charge him with breach of Oath. He was so mov'd at the haughtiness wherewith the Ambassadors address'd him, that he could hardly refrain from using them ill. However he governed his Passion; but was even with his Enemy, by sending him a menacing and insulting Message. The Duke patiently heard what Harold ordered to be said to him, and dismissed the Ambassadors without any answer.

Mean time, Harold having drawn all his Forces together, encamped about seven Miles (1) from the Norman Army, with a resolution to give them Battle. Whilst the two Armies lay thus near one another, Spies were continually sent out on both sides, each Leader being equally desirous to know the strength and posture of his Enemies. But the English Spies magnified in such a manner the numbers and discipline of the Normans, that the principal Officers began to doubt of the success of the War (2). Gurth, Brother of Harold, took occasion from these reports, to persuade the King to defer the Battle. He represented to him, "That by prolonging the time, he would find his Army to increase continually, whereas the Enemy's Forces would daily be diminished. That nothing could annoy the Normans more than wintering in an Enemy's Country, where they had not yet so much as one fortified Town, and from whence, in all probability, the want of necessaries would compel them to retire. That, as he was accused of breach of Oath, he had reason to fear, in case he was guilty of the Charge, Heaven would not prosper his Arms: Nevertheless, if he was absolutely bent to come to an Engagement without any farther delay, it would be most prudent for him, not to be present himself in the Battle, that he might discourage the Enemies with the dread of having a fresh Army to deal with, though they were so fortunate as to obtain the Victory. In a word, if he would trust him with the Command of his Forces, he would promise him, not indeed, the Victory, which was in the hand of God alone, but to dye in the defence of his Country." The King was deaf to all his Brother's reasons, replying, "That by his former Actions he had gain'd the esteem of the English, and therefore could not think of losing it again by an inglorious Flight. That he had rather run the hazard of a Battle, the Success whereof was yet uncertain, than forfeit his Reputation, as he should most assuredly do, if after so near an approach to the Enemy, he should be known to withdraw. That after all, the Normans were not more formidable than the Norwegians; and if he was to fight, he could not do it at a better time, than whilst his Army was fresh'd with their late Success. In short, that he was resolv'd to let his Subjects see he was not unworthy of the Crown he wore."

Duke William perceiving by all Harold's Motions, that he was bent to give him Battle, advanc'd a little, to seize an advantageous Post, where he could conveniently draw up his Army.

Whilst they were preparing for a Battle, which was to decide the fate of both Princes, Duke William seem'd to abate something of his haughtiness. 'Tis to be presum'd, the thoughts of a Battle in an Enemy's Country, where his loss would be irretrievable, inspir'd him with some dread of the Issue. On the other hand, he could not well forbear reflecting beforehand on the blood that was going to be spilt in a quarrel, the Justice whereof he could not be thoroughly convinced of, how much soever he seem'd to be so. Be this as it will, before they engag'd, he sent the King by the hands of a certain Monk these four Proposals for him to take his choice. The first was, to resign the Crown, as he was bound by Oath. By the second, he offer'd to return into Normandy, provided Harold would do him Homage for the Kingdom of England. By the third, he was ready to refer their differences to the Judgment of the Apostolic See. Lastly, he propos'd the deciding of their quarrel by single Combat. 'Tis no wonder, Harold reject'd these four Proposals, seeing they were all so advantageous to the Duke. As for the two first, 'tis visible, how detrimental they were to Harold. The third seem'd at first light something fairer; but the Pope having already declared in favour of the Duke, what Justice could Harold expect from him? As for the fourth, the advantage plainly lay on the Duke's side, since in a single Combat, he hazarded only his Person, whereas Harold ventured his Crown with his Life. The Victory would have procur'd the Duke of Normandy a noble Kingdom, whereas it would have only acquir'd the King the bare glory of conquering. Besides, Harold was of opinion, the decision of an Affair, where the whole Nation was concerned, ought not to depend on the strength and skill of a single Arm. His answer therefore was, God should determine on the morrow the Justice of their Rights.

The English spent the whole night in carousing and singing, as if they were sure of the Victory. The Normans, on the contrary, were employ'd in preparing for the Battle, and offering up Prayers to God for Success. At length, on the 14th of October, Harold's Birth-day, but much more memorable for one of the greatest Events that ever happened in England, the two Armies engaged. In the Front of the English stood the Kenish Men, a Privilege they had enjoy'd ever since the time of the Heptarchy. Harold plac'd himself in the Center, and would fight on foot, that his Men might be the more encouraged by seeing their King expos'd to equal danger with the meanest Soldier. The Normans were drawn up in three Bodies. Montgomery and Fitz-osborn conducted the first, Geffrey Martel commanded the second, and the Duke himself headed the Body of Reserve, to succour those who should most want it (3). The Normans began the fight with a Volley of Arrows, which being shot upward were like a thick Cloud over the heads of the foremost Body of the English. As their Ranks were very close, the Arrows did great execution. The English not being us'd to this way of fighting, were at first put into some little disorder. The Normans willing to take advantage of it, vigorously attack'd them. But the English immediately falling into good order again, gave them so warm a reception, that they were obliged to draw back and take breath. Quickly after, they renew'd the attack, but met with as brave a resistance as before, neither was it in their power to break their Enemy's Ranks. The English chusing rather to die than give way, and the Normans aham'd to retreat, both sides fought stoutly for a considerable time, without either gaining ground. The preference of their Leaders animating the Soldiers, they every where fought with equal Bravery, without the least signs of advantage on either side. We may judge of the valour of the Troops in both Armies by the length of the fight, which began at seven in the Morning, and lasted till Night.

I shall not take upon me, fully to describe this bloody Battle. I find so much confusion in the accounts of the Historians, that I dare not flatter my self with being able to give a clear and distinct notion of the Thing. I shall content my self therefore with the mention of two Circumstances, which, all Historians unanimously agree, gave the Normans the Victory. The Fight had lasted all day, and the Success was yet very uncertain; when Duke William bethought himself of a Stratagem, which made Victory incline to his Side. This Prince, who was very experienc'd, perceiving there was no breaking the rank of the English, ordered his Troops to retreat as they fought, as if they were discouraged, but withal, to be very careful to keep their Ranks. This order being executed, the English looked upon the Enemies Retreat as the beginning of their Victory. Possess'd with this notion, they encouraged one another by reiterated shouts, to press the retreating Enemies. Their eagerness made them break their Ranks, that they might push them with the greater Impetuosity, imagining they were upon the point of taking to flight. Then it was, that the Normans, finding their Stratagem had taken effect, stood their ground, and by a Discipline, they had long been us'd to, clos'd their Ranks, and falling on the disordered English, made a terrible slaughter of them. Harold, enraged to see the Victory, which a moment before he thought himself sure of, snatched out of his hands, us'd his utmost endeavours to rally his Troops that were in extreme Disorder. His labour was not altogether in vain, for at last he drew up, on a rising ground at a little distance from the field of Battle, a good body of Foot, which became at length very considerable, by being continually joined by the flying Troops. The Duke of Normandy's Victory being yet far from compleat, whilst so strong a Body of the English kept together, he ordered them to be attacked with great Fury. But the English received them with that Bravery, and the Normans lost such numbers of their Men, that the fortune of the day seem'd still very doubtful. The approach of the night, and the resolution of the English, making the Duke despair of penetrating their Ranks, he began to think himself conquer'd since he was not entirely victorious. Probably, the English Army might have retreated in good order, by favour of the Night, if Harold could have resolv'd to leave his Enemy in possession of the field of Battle, at a time when the loss on both Sides was pretty equal. But apprehending his retreat might be prejudicial to his Affairs, and derogatory to his Reputation, he would maintain his Post, and not give the enemy that advantage. Besides, he was in hopes of rallying his whole Army during the Night, and renewing the fight the next Morning.

He could not think of retreating.

Harold's fall, and the English entirely routed. Malmsh. Huntingd.

S. Dunelm.

Mean time, the Duke perceiving the Night was like to rob him of the glory of a compleat Victory, made one effort more to drive the English from their Post. In this last onset, Harold was slain by an Arrow shot into his Brains (1). His Troops, dishearten'd at this fatal accident, began to give ground, and betake themselves to flight. Thus Harold's death was the second thing that procur'd the Normans the Victory, and put the English entirely to rout. They were pursued as long as day lasted; and in this Pursuit it was, that a terrible slaughter was made of the Fugitives, the Conquerors killing without mercy all they could overtake, to save the trouble of guarding the Prisoners. The darkness of the Night however sav'd a good part of the English Army, who retreated under the Conduct of Morcard and Edwin. These two Lords, who had all along firmly adhered to Harold, seeing he was slain, as well as Gurth and Lewin his Brothers, submitted at length to Providence, having given, the whole day, visible marks of their Valour. This long and bloody Battle cost the Duke of Normandy six thousand Men (2); but the English lost a much greater Number (3).

Duke William, at the height of his Wishes, gave orders for the whole Army to fall on their Knees, and return God Thanks for so signal a Victory. After discharging his just duty, he caus'd his Tent to be pitched in the Field of Battle, and spent the residue of the Night among the slain. On the morrow, he order'd his own dead to be buried, and gave the English Peasants leave to do the same office for the others. The Bodies of the King and his Brothers being found, he sent them to Gith their Mother, who gave them as honourable a burial as the circumstance of the time would permit, in Walham-Abby, founded by the King her Son (4).

Harold's Grave, &c.

Thus fell Harold, with his Sword in his Hand, in defence not only of his own, but of his Country's Cause; against the ambition of the Duke of Normandy. The Historians, who wrote in the Reigns of the Conqueror and his Sons, have endeavour'd to blacken the memory of Harold, thereby to justify, in some measure, the ambition of the Duke. But all they have said against this last Saxon King, tends only to the imputation of breach of Oath, on which we have seen what he alledged in his own vindication. He might have been much more justly blamed for his secret practices, in procuring Prince Edgar to be excluded from the Throne, who alone had a Right to aspire to it. But the Sticklers for the Duke took care not to dwell on that head, since their Reproaches against Harold would have touch'd the Duke no less than his Adversaries. However this be, Harold may be said to have been more worthy of the Crown, had he been less forward to obtain it. He gain'd the love and esteem of the English whilst he was but a private Man, and acted nothing during his short Reign (5), which tended to lessen their affection. He fought within the space of a few days, two great Battles, with very different Success. In the first, his conduct and valour procur'd him a signal Victory over the King of Norway; and his unhappy Success in the last must be wholly ascribed to his ill Fortune. As for his other personal Qualities, he was Honest, Obliging, Affable, exceeding Generous, in a word, he was endow'd with all the Virtues which form a great Prince.

Harold was twice married. By his first Wife, whose name is unknown, he had three Sons, Edmund, Godwin, and Magnus, who retir'd into Ireland after the death of their Father. By his second Wife, Alitha, Sister of Morcard and Edwin, he had a Son called Wolf; who was but a Child at the time of the Battle of Hastings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus. By this second Marriage, he had also two Daughters; of whom Gunilda, the eldest, falling blind, pass'd her days in a Nunnery. The youngest was married to Waldemar King of Russia, by whom she had a Daughter, who was Wife to Waldemar King of Denmark (6).

Thus ended in England the Empire of the Anglo-Saxons, which began above six hundred years before in the Person of Hengist the first King of Kent. We shall see in the following Book how England fell under the dominion of the Normans.

(1) R. de Diceto (p. 480.) and Huntingd. (p. 369.) say, that Harold was not killed outright, but the Multitude rushing on made an end of him.

(2) He had three Horses killed that Day under him, without losing one drop of his Blood. Malmsh. p. 101.

(3) This Battle was fought near Hastfield in Suffex, in the Place where the Town of Battle now stands, so called from this Day's Action, wherein our modern Historians say were slain above three or four Thousand English Men.

(4) An ancient Manuscript in the Cottonian Library relates, that the King's Body was hard to be known by reason of its being covered with Wounds, but was at last discovered by one who had seen his Mistress, by the means of certain private Marks known only to herself. The Duke sent the Body to his Mother as her only Reward, though she is said to have offered him its weight in Gold. But though it, where agree to it Harold tell in this Battle, yet Knighton from Goscelin Cambrayensis asserts he was not slain, but escaping retired to a Cell near St. Judo's Church in Geoffrey, and died there an Anchorite, as was owned by himself in his last Confession when he lay a dying. In memory whereof they thence his Tomb when Knighton wrote.

THE STATE of the CHURCH,

FROM THE

Reign of ETHELRED II, to the Norman Conquest; that is, from 979, to 1066.

State of the Church.

AFTER seeing what passed in England from the beginning of the Reign of Ethelred II. to the end of the Empire of the Saxons, it is not to be expected that this period should afford much matter for an Ecclesiastical History: In general, this Century may be termed the Age of ignorance, with respect to all Europe, but more especially with regard to England. If there was occasion, it would not be very difficult to assign the causes of this universal ignorance, not only in this Kingdom, but in all the other Christian States. But it will suffice to alledge one, peculiar to England; I mean the Wars, the Kingdom was incessantly troubled with. The Arms of the Pagans, which triumphed throughout the whole Kingdom, scarce left the English the liberty of professing their religion, and consequently, our knowledge of the affairs of the Church in those days must be very imperfect. Accordingly, I shall confine what I have to say on this subject, to a few heads, concerning the Doctrines, Councils, some Particulars relating to certain Bishops, and the Persons that were most distinguished among the Clergy.

The State of the Church of England relating to the Eucharist

What attempts soever have been made at sundry times to prove the antiquity of Transubstantiation, it could never be shown to be the Doctrine of the Church of England, before the time I am speaking of. On the contrary, it evidently appears from the Homilies or Sermons which were read in Churches for the instruction of the People, that the Church in those days was very far from believing any such Thing. There is still extant a Translation of these Homilies (1), attributed to Elfric, who lived under Ethelred II. from whence any Man may be convinced, that the Church of England was then of a quite contrary Opinion. But that the Reader may judge for himself, it will not be amiss to lay before him an extract of one of these Homilies relating to this Subject.

Extract of the Sermon Homily on this subject.

"There is a great difference between the invisible virtue of this Sacrament, and what it appears to us in the qualities of its own Nature. In its own Nature 'tis corruptible Bread and Wine, but by virtue of the divine institution, 'tis truly the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ after consecration, not in a Corporal but Spiritual Manner. The Body in which Jesus Christ suffered, and the Eucharistical Body are widely different. The first was born of the Blessed Virgin, and consisted of Blood, Bones, Nerves, Limbs, animated with a rational Soul. But the Body which we call Eucharistical, is made up of several grains of Wheat. It has neither Blood, Bone, Nerve, Limb, nor Soul in it. We are therefore not to form any Corporal Idea of it, but to understand it wholly in a spiritual Sense. In the Eucharist, whatever repairs our Nature, and forms us to a better Life, proceeds entirely from a mystick virtue, and a Spiritual Operation. For this reason the Eucharist is called a Sacrament, because one thing appears to our Senses, and another to our Understanding. What in the Sacrament is the object of Sight, has a corporeal Figure: But what is represented to our Understanding has a spiritual force and efficacy. Moreover the Body of Christ, which suffered and rose from the dead, is eternal and impassible, and no more subject to decay or death; whereas the Eucharist is not eternal but corruptible, subject to the force of time, and divisible into many Parts. 'Tis ground by the Teeth, and passes through the common Channels of the Body; but notwithstanding the spiritual efficacy of it remains in every Part. A great many Persons receive this Holy Body or Eucharist, and yet the multitude of receivers weakens not the force of the Operation, the virtue of the Sacrament being lodged in every part of what is consecrated, the least part having as much Efficacy as the greatest. The reason is, because the virtue does not operate in proportion to the corporeal magnitude, but by means of the Divine Institution.

"The Sacrament is a Type and a Pledge, but the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ is the Truth and Reality of the representation. God has vouchsafed to give us this Pledge or Earnest, till we come to the Truth itself, and then the Pledge will disappear. For, as hath been observed, the Holy Eucharist is the Body of Jesus Christ not corporally but spiritually (2). The Apostle St. Paul, speaking of the Israelites, has these Words: I would I could say that you should be ignorant, how that all our Fathers were under the Cloud, and passed through the Sea; and were all baptized unto Moses, in the Cloud and in the Sea; and did all eat the same spiritual Meat; and did all drink the same spiritual Drink: For they drank of the spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ. That Rock, from whence the water flow'd, was not Christ in reality, but a type and representation of Jesus Christ, who made this gracious Declaration to all the faithful; If any Man thirst, let him come to John viii. me and drink; and out of his Belly shall flow Rivers of living Water. By this he understood the Holy Ghost, which those that believ'd on him should receive. The Apostle declares, that the Children of Israel, who were in the Wilderness, eat the same spiritual Meat, and drank the same spiritual Drink, because the Manna, with which they were supported forty years together, and the water which flow'd from the Rock, were types of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which are daily offered in the Church. That Manna and that Water were the same, which we now offer, not corporally but spiritually. To understand this, observe that our Lord Jesus Christ, before his Passion, consecrated the Bread and Wine into the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and said, This is my Body; This is my Blood. Although his Passion was not over when he pronounced these words, yet by a mystick Operation, he changed the Bread into his Body, and the Wine into his Blood, just as he had done in the Wilderness before his Incarnation, when he turn'd the Manna into his Flesh, and the water that flow'd from the Rock, into his own Blood".

As this Explanation is a clear evidence, that at the time this Homily was pen'd, the Church of England believed not Transubstantiation, so it is no less manifest, that Elfric, who translated it into Latin, was of the same opinion with the Author. 'Tis true, there is some dispute about the Person of the Translator. Some believe him to be Elfric Archbishop of Canterbury. Others say it was Elfric the Grammarian, surnam'd Puta, who was Archbishop of York. But which ever of the two it was, they both liv'd in the reign of Ethelred II, and neither of them was ever accus'd of Heterodoxy. But as it might be objected, that Elfric was not of the same opinion with the Author, whom he translated, though that is not very likely, the contrary is evident from the following words of the same Elfric, in one of his Letters to the Clergy. The Sacrifice of the Eucharist is not the Body in which our Saviour suffered for us, nor the Blood he shed for our sakes, but 'tis the same Body and the same Blood spiritually, just as the Manna was which fell from Heaven, and the Water which flow'd from the Rock. 'Tis therefore most certain, from the Testimony of a Prelate, who was at the head of the Church of Eng-

See I. that the Doctrine of Transubstantiation was not introduced into that Church in the time of Ethelred II., who ascended the Throne in 979. There is no way to evade the force of this proof, but by asserting the Homily before-mentioned to be spurious. But this is much easier said than prov'd.

It is not the same with regard to the Invocation of the blessed Virgin, and of the Saints in Glory, since, on the contrary, we find it was practised in England in this very Century. This is manifest from Canute the Great's Charter to the Abby of Glaffenbury, where there is mention of the blessed Virgin, and all the other Saints. But as the Authority of the Charters of those days is not equally admitted by all, the same thing may be proved from a publick Litany then read in the Church. Here we see that after the Invocation of the holy Trinity, these words are thrice repeated, O Holy Mary, pray for us: After which the Angels and Saints were addressed to [by name.] It is to be observed, when this practice was first introduced, the Application to the blessed Virgin and Saints was not so direct; May the Holy Virgin, the Mother of God, and all the Saints intercede for us. These are the words in the publick Office of canonical hours used by the Anglo-Saxons (1).

This Office, which is in Latin, affords this remark, that although the Lessons, Prayers, Psalms, Lord's Prayer and Creed, are in the same Tongue, yet at the end of each Article or Verse, there follows a Saxon Translation in a paraphrastic way, that the people might understand what was said.

Among the Canons, which go under the name of Elfric, of whom I have already spoken, and who lived in the reign of Ethelred II., the XXXIII^d obliges Priests to have by them two sorts of consecrated Oil, one for Children, and another for the sick, and enjoins that the sick should be always anointed upon their beds, and should confess themselves before the Ceremony of anointing passed upon them, which no Priest was to presume to perform till defired by the sick person. Whence it may be inferred, they did not stay till the sick were in their last Agonies, before they administered the extreme Unction (2).

In the XXXIII^d Canon, the four first General Councils (3) are put upon the same foot with the four Gospels; but those of later Ages are not of so great Authority. Hence 'tis evident that the Author of these Canons did not think all the General Councils were infallible. Had he been of this opinion, he would not have given a greater Authority to the four first than to the other Councils (4).

From the beginning of the reign of Ethelred II., to the Norman Conquest, we find in the Ecclesiastical History of England but two Councils. In all appearance, the wars with the Danes prevented the Bishops from assembling more frequently, or rather were the reason that the acts of these Conventions are lost. Both these Councils (5), one at Engbam, and the other at Haba, were held, whilst Elphegus was Archbishop. The most remarkable Canons are as follows.

The Synod of Engbam.
Spelman.
Conc.
Tom. I.
p. 513.

In the Council of Engbam, the II^d Canon enjoins the Celibacy of the Clergy.

The IXth forbids all Persons to do any wrong to the Church, or eject a Clergyman out of his Benefice without the consent of the Bishop.

By the XVIth every Friday was to be a Fast, unless it fell upon a Holiday (6).

The XXth enjoins frequent Confessions, and the People are ordered to receive the Sacrament three times at least, in a Year (7).

Synod of Haba.

The Council of Haba has but one Canon worth Notice. By the second, every Christian was obliged to fast three days with Bread and Water, before the Feast of St. Michael, and to distribute among the poor what he should have eaten in these three Days.

This is all worth remarking in these two Synods. But to supply the want of Councils, we have the Ecclesiastical Laws of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor, some of which I shall insert, to show the great regard these two Princes had for the Clergy. The following ones are Canute's (8).

The IVth enjoins all Christians to pay great respect to the Clergy, because their Sacerdotal Functions are extremely beneficial to the People.

By the Vth, if a Priest was accused of any crime, he had the liberty of purging himself by faying Mals, and receiving the Eucharist.

The XIIth recommends Celibacy to the Clergy, and ranks them among the Thanes of the second Class, that is, among the Gentry (9).

The XXth ordains, that at Funerals the Dues shall be paid upon the breaking up of the ground; and that the Dues shall be paid to the Parish the deceased belonged to, tho' he was buried elsewhere.

The XXII^d enjoins the observance of Sunday from Saturday three a-clock in the afternoon, till Monday break of Day.

The XXIII^d determines the times of Fasting, and places the Vigils of the Festivals of the Blessed Virgin and of the Apostles among the Fasts.

There are several others, relating to the payment of Tythes and Peter-Pence, the Violators of the Privileges of the Clergy, and the like, in favour of the Church.

It is likewise decreed by these Laws, That every Christian should learn the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles Creed, otherwise, they were allowed neither to stand Godfather, nor receive the Communion, nor have Christian Burial.

The Ecclesiastical Laws of Edward the Confessor run chiefly upon the protection of the Church and Clergy.

Ecclesiastical Laws of Edward the Confessor.
Spelman.
p. 615.

The Ist forbids the molesting a Clergyman, contrary to the tenour of the Privileges of the Church.

The II^d appoints certain Days, whereon all proceedings in the Courts of Justice were to cease.

By the III^d the Church's Causes are to be tried first.

The IVth firmly establishes the immunities of those who in any wise depend on the Church, and ordains that they shall not be obliged to answer any Plea, &c. except in the Ecclesiastical Court.

The Vth confirms the Privilege of Sanctuary to Churches, and extends it even to Priests Houses.

By the VIth, if any Person broke in upon the Privileges of the Church, he had no way to get off, but by submitting to the sentence of the Bishop.

The VIIth orders the punctual payment of Tythes, and sets forth what is to be paid.

The IXth determines the circumstances relating to the Ordeal Trial.

The XIIth settles the fine of Manbote, or the sum to be paid to the Lord for killing any of his Vassals or Slaves: The King's and the Archbishop's Manbote is fixed at the same Sum.

By the XIIIth all found treasure belongs to the King, unless it is found in a Church or Church-yard; then the Gold is the King's, and the Silver the Church's (10).

It is visible throughout these Laws, that the Clergy took care of themselves, when they met with devout and easy Princes, or such as stood in need of their Interest.

But notwithstanding the great condescension of the Saxon Kings for the Clergy, they could not retain the privilege of chusing their Bishops and Abbots. Whilst the Prelates confined themselves within the bounds of their pastoral Functions, and meddled not with civil Matters, the power of Electing was freely left to the Chapters. But when the Bishops were become rich and popular, and began to interpose in State-Affairs, by reason of the Fiefs they were possessed of, it was of great consequence to the Kings, to have such Bishops and Abbots as were in their Interest, or at least, were obliged to them for their Preferences. Accordingly, the Kings began to interpose in Elections, by way of canvassing, or recommendation, and very often by refusing to put in possession of the Fiefs belonging to the Church or Abby, such Prelates and Abbots Electors of Bishops and Abbots.

This Office is translated by Mr. Elfric. Immediate Address, as far as we can discover, did not prevail in England till the tenth Century: At which time in the Homily of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, there is a direct Prayer to the Blessed Virgin to intercede for them. *Col. as they did not like. In fine, the authority of the Court by degrees prevailed so, that in the time of Ethelred II. the Monks had entirely lost the privilege of chusing their Abbots, as appears from Inglulphus. In those days, says he, the Monks and Abbots seldom resorted to Court. But ever since the Kings have disposed of the Abbots, the Monks have made interest with the Courtiers, which sometimes costs them very dear. This Historian loudly complains of this abuse, though he himself was installed in the Abbey of Croyland by the same method, that is, by the sole will and pleasure of William the Conqueror.

There were but two removals of Bishops Sees within the Period I am going over. The See of Kinton in Wessex (1) was removed to Exeter (2), and the See of Lindisfarne in Northumberland (3), and the See of Lindisfarne, being disturbed in that little Island by the Incursions of the Danes, resided at Durham, carrying with him the Relics of St. Cuthbert. He built a Cathedral, and fixed his See there, where it has remained to this day (3).

In 981, the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury acquired a new Jurisdiction in Wales. Guan, a Welsh Priest, being chosen Bishop of Llandaff and consecrated by Archbishop Dunstan, this Precedent was followed by his Successors, who like him owned the Archbishop of Canterbury for their Metropolitan. Some infer from hence, that all the British Bishops at the same time owned the Superiority of the Church of Rome. But this consequence cannot be admitted. It is certain, the Bishops of St. David's still along exercised the Archiepiscopal Functions in Wales, till the time of Henry I. and that without the ornament of the Pall, the mark of subordination to the Pope (4).

As the Archbishops of Canterbury and York made the greatest figure among the English Prelates, during the last Period of the Saxon Monarchy, it will not be amiss briefly to carry down the Succession of each of these Sees. This will be of service towards clearing what has been already, or shall be hereafter, related of the Affairs of the Church.

Ethelgar, Dunstan's Successor, was Archbishop but one year and three months, and was succeeded by Siricius. This Prelate is blamed by all the Historians, for advising Ethelred to give Money to the Danes, which served only to allure them hither, instead of keeping them away. But perhaps they who exclaim against him most, would have given the same advice, had they been in his place. Elfric, Translator of the Saxon Homilies, whom I mentioned elsewhere, succeeded him in 995, and was followed in 1006, by Elphegus, who was murdered by the hands of the Danes. Langfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury in the Conqueror's time, very much questioned whether Elphegus might properly be called a Martyr, since he was not massacred on account of Religion, but only because he would not consent the people of his Diocese should be taxed to pay his Ransom. Anselm, Abbot of Bet, whom he consulted on this occasion, told him, he who chose to die rather than to do an unjust thing, received by his death the Crown of Martyrdom. Livingus succeeded Elphegus in 1013. He was kept Prisoner some time by the Danes, and after the recovery of his Liberty, retired into France, till the Storm was over. Afterwards, he returned to his See, and died in 1020. Egelnoth, called the Good, was his Successor. In the time of these two Archbishops, St. Augustin's Monastery was much degenerated, by the licentious Lives of the Monks, who indeed wore the religious Habit, but with little observance of the rule. The cause of this alteration was, the massacring all the Monks, except four, when Canterbury was taken by the Danes. The secular Clergy, who afterwards supplied the place of the dead Monks, were willing to enjoy the Revenues and Privileges of the Monastery, but not to be ty'd to the rule observed there before. They took greater Liberties than the old Monks, and gave the Title of Dean to their superior, instead of that of Abbot, which remained till the time of Archbishop Langfranc, who changed it into Prior. But to return to Egelnoth: This Prelate raised the See of Canterbury to its former Lustre, being supported by Canute the Great, with whom he was much in favour (5). He was succeeded by Edfus, who had been King Harold's Chaplain (6). He governed the Church till the year 1050, either by himself, whilst his Health permitted, or by a Chorepiscopus, when disabled by sickness. This Chorepiscopus, who exercised all the Archiepiscopal Functions, resided at St. Martins in the Fields (7). Robert, a Norman Monk, made Bishop of London by Edward the Confessor, was by the same Prince, promoted to the See of Canterbury after Edfus. He was driven from thence, in the manner before related, and banish'd the Kingdom by an Assembly General, and Stigand Bishop of Winchester plac'd in his room. Robert appealed to the Pope against these Proceedings; but Stigand, notwithstanding the Appeal, and without staying for the Pope's determination, who for that reason suspended him, got himself consecrated. But, notwithstanding his Suspension, and tho' he had never applied to Rome for the Pall, he exercised all the Metropolitane Functions, till he was depos'd in William the Conqueror's time (8). Very probably, in those days, the English were not of opinion, that the Archbishops elect could not exercise their Functions till the Pope was plac'd to empower them, or that the Pope's bare suspension was sufficient to put a stop to their acting as Primates.

The Succession of the Archbishops of York was as follows. After the death of Osuald (9), mentioned in the foregoing Book, Adulf succeeded him in 993, and governed this Church till 1002, when by his death he made room for Wulfstan II. who, after twenty one years, was succeeded by Elfric Puta, surnamed the Grammarian, thought by some to be the Author of the Translation of the Saxon Homilies. To him succeeded Kinfrus (10), in 1050, after whom came Alred, who was alive at the Conquest.

Among the Bishops of note in those days, Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester was a Person of an extraordinary Character in some Men's opinion, tho' Langfranc thought him unqualified for the Office of a Bishop, for his stupidity and want of Learning. But this is not the first time that weak Men have been made to pass for Saints. This Prelate being consecrated by Alred Archbishop of York, made his profession of canonical obedience to Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, though suspended by the Pope. To Croft, account for this disregard of the Pope's suspension, 'tis pretended, the Submission was made to the See of Canterbury, and not to the person of Stigand: But when such like Assertions are advanced, they should be supported with some Authorities, whereas this here is destitute of all.

Edmund Bishop of Durham was remarkable for the manner of his Election. The Chapter of Durham being met to elect a Bishop, and not being able to agree upon their Mary, Edmund, a Priest of that Church, said jestingly, that since they were at a loss who to choose, they had as good take him and make him Bishop. As Miracles were then much in vogue, the Chapter looked upon this motion as a divine impulse, and so unanimously agreed to elect him. Edmund became famous for his courage and boldness in reprimanding Vice, even in persons of the highest birth and stations.

We must also reckon in the number of illustrious Persons of that Age, certain English Ecclesiastics, who flourish'd in Sweden and Norway. Olaus Scot-Kunning, King of Sweden, desirous to turn Christian, desired Ethelred to send him some Missionaries to instruct him in the Gospel. Sigefrid, Archdeacon of York, (and not Archbishop, as a Swedish writer will have it,) Estil, Gumchild, Rudolf, and Bernard, or David, undertook this Mission. Sigefrid was made Bishop of Wexia, a City in the Province of Smaland in Sweden, and baptiz'd Olaus. Some say however, he received Baptism at the hands of Bernard; but this is not very material. The greatest part of these Missionaries were martyred by the Pagani, to whom they preached (1).

I have spoken elsewhere, though in a very general manner, of the division of the Kingdom into Parishes. But seeing I am arrived at the end of the Saxon Empire, it will not be foreign to the purpose to conclude what I have to say of the Anglo-Saxon Church, with a more particular account of this matter.

Augustin, the first Bishop of the Saxons, receiving from the King of Kent some Lands, for the maintenance of himself and the Monks he brought with him, disposed of the Profits of these Lands, and the offerings of Christians as he thought fit. But because he wanted Instructions in this matter, he consulted Gregory I., who told him, it was the custom in the Church of Rome, to divide the Offerings into four Portions, and distribute one of them for the maintenance of the inferior Clergy. However, as Augustin and his Companions were Monks of the same Order, the Pope exhorted them to live together as Brethren. Thus also lived Aidan and Finan Bishops of the Northumbrians, who were Monks as well as Austin, though of a different Order. But it cannot be inferred from hence, that in all the Churches, the Bishop and his Clergy lived in common, as some pretend. On the contrary, it seems to follow, from the Bishop's being obliged to distribute the fourth part of the Church's Revenues among the Clergy, that they did not live in common. Be this as it will, the Bishop and Clergy were maintained as well out of the profits of the Lands given to the Church, as by the daily offerings of the People.

The number of Christians encreasing every day, and there being at first in each Diocese, which contained a whole Kingdom, but one Church, it could not but be very inconvenient to many of the new Converts to resort thither. It was necessary therefore that others should be built, and Priests sent to officiate in them. These Priests were not however fixed upon any particular Church, but kept with the Bishop, who sent out sometimes one, sometimes another, to minister in the remote Churches, after which they returned to him. In proportion therefore as Christians encreased, new Churches were erected for the convenience of those who lived at a distance from the Cathedral. These Churches were no more than Chapels of ease to the principal Church, to which belonged all the Offerings that were made in the others. Accordingly the Priests at their return, put the Offerings they had received into the Bishop's hands, which served for the maintenance of the Bishops, and the Clergy that were about him. The Priests then at first had no other Titles, but that of belonging to a certain Diocese: for these first rural Churches are not to be considered as distinct Parishes, but as Chapels belonging to the Cathedral.

These rural Churches were not at first very numerous. The reason is, because the Lords who had large Estates, were the only Persons that founded them, and generally were contented with building one Church for the use of their Vassals. These men of Condition have exceedingly encreased, it was becoming necessary to provide for the constant residence of a Priest in each of these Churches. But as the great Men, as well as the People, did not care to have a new Priest at every time, the Bishops were willing to continue the same to them, and from this time, Parishes may properly be said to commence. However, till the Priests, thus fixed to one Church, should be unmindful of their dependence on the Cathedral, the Bishops reserved in their own hands the Revenue, and Oblations these Churches were endowed with. This gave the Founders some uneasiness. They could not bear to see the Priest, who did all the duty, have so small a share of their Donations. Wherefore, the zeal of erecting new Churches beginning to cool, at a time when there was most need of them, the Bishops thought fit to yield a little. To this purpose, they compounded with those who had a mind to build Churches, and were satisfied with reserving to the Cathedral, a third or fourth part of the Income, with the right of Baptism and Burial. This obstacle being removed, these private Oratories became very numerous, almost every great Man building one for the convenience of himself and Vassals. Moreover, when any Lord alienated part of his Estate, the Purchaser seldom failed of erecting a Church in his new Purchase. On the other hand, the Bishops being greatly enriched by the Grants made to their Churches, built likewise Churches on their Lands, as well for the convenience of their Tenants, as to imitate the Nobles, among whom they themselves began to be ranked. By all these means the rural Churches abounding every where, there was no necessity of sending Priests from place to place, since each Church, as was before observed, had one of its own. And thus by degrees the Parochial Division was settled. However, the Bishops were long in possession of the Titles and Oblations, till at length, in order to quicken more and more the zeal of Christians, they removed this difficulty which obstructed the building and endowing of Churches. They not only left to the Parochial Priests the Revenue, the Founders were pleased to assign, or at least, to grant greater part, but also granted them the power of administering the Sacraments in their respective Churches. This is the rise and progress of the Parochial Division, which was almost quite settled in the Reign of Edgar, or perhaps of Canute the Great. Between that time and the Reign of Edward the Confessor, there were some farther Subdivisions; but, in all appearance, there were few new Parishes after the Norman Conquest. At least, we find by several Charters of the latter Saxon King, that the Parishes of Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire and Lincolnshire, were the same as at present. Whence it may be presumed the Parishes of the other Counties agreed with our modern Division (2).

(1) Through the Laziness or Ignorance of the Monks, the only Writers in those Days, we have but few Histories from Aldo to the Norman Conquest. Next to Aldo was Einhard, who wrote in the Reign of Edgar, and lived till 1000, though he did not continue his Chronicle. He was (as he himself says) assisted of the Blood Royal. His Works consist of four Books, which were published by Sir H. Savile. Bishop Aldo says, the whole is an imperfect Translation of the Saxon Annals. His Style is tedious and obscure, and in some Places hardly Sene; and therefore but of little use, unless in settling the Reigns and Deaths of some of our Saxon Kings, who I've about his Time, concerning which in Cope the Saxon Annals differ. From him to the Conquest we meet with no Histories, except Oswin, who has wrote the Life of St. Dunstan and St. Alphege, which are published in the first Volume of Anglia Sacra; and the Author of a Treatise called Monachum Ennece, being a short Account of the Times immediately preceding the Reign of Edward the Confessor.

(2) As may be farther seen from Domes-Day Book, where the Parishes are very near the same as at this Day.

ANGLO-SAXONS.

The original Part of the Laws
as they came

Saxons.

THE Revolution that happened in Europe, about the beginning of the fifth Century, is one of the most remarkable events in History. The Roman Empire, which was almost of equal extent with the known World, was then divided into two Empires, one containing the eastern, the other the western Provinces.

The western Empire was so harassed by the continual Invasions of the northern Nations, that losing by degrees all its Provinces, it was reduced to nothing, and the very name of Emperor of the West, vanished with that Empire. This great Revolution quite altered the State of Europe, by introducing new Inhabitants, who raising new Kingdoms upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, brought at the same time new Laws and Customs into the conquered Countries. Spain was peopled with Colonies of Wifigoths, Catti, Alani, and Suevi. Gallia was overwhelmed with a deluge of Wifigoths, Burgundians, and Franks. Italy was so exposed to the successive Invasions of the Heruli, Ostrogoths, and Lombards, that the ancient Inhabitants, instead of preserving the superiority of Number, made no Figure at all. The Saxons, Suevi, and Barbarians, spread themselves over all Germany, and became Masters of that vast tract of Land. In a word, Great-Britain was so over-run with Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, that hardly could any remains of the ancient Britons be discovered. It was very natural for these Conquerors to establish in their new erected Kingdoms their own Country-Customs. And therefore it may be advanced for certain, that the Laws now in force, throughout the greatest part of Europe, are derived from the Laws these ancient Conquerors brought with them from the North. This might be easily proved with respect to all the Countries concerned in this great Revolution. But at present I shall confine my self to England alone. By what I am going to say, whoever has any knowledge of the English Constitution, will easily be convinced, that the Customs now practised in that Kingdom, are, for the most part, the same the Anglo-Saxons brought with them from the northern Countries, and lastly from Germany.

In the second Book of this History we have seen how the Saxons were no sooner arrived in Great-Britain, but they formed a design of settling there, and at length succeeded after a War of 150 years. This long War bred such Enmity between them and the Britons, that there is no probability the Saxons, who in the end proved victorious, should borrow from the vanquished the Form of Government, established in their Conquests. If therefore we would trace the Origin of the Laws and Customs of the Anglo-Saxons, we must search for it in Germany and the northern Countries, rather than among the ancient Britons. And indeed, such is the resemblance between the Laws of the Saxons, Franks, Suevi, Lombards, and the other northern Nations, that it must necessarily be concluded, they had all the same origin of an older date than the separation of these People. This resemblance is still much stronger between the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons in Great-Britain, and those of the Saxons in Germany, since they were both the same Nation, part whereof settled in England. An English Historian, by comparing the Laws and Customs of the Germans with those of the English, has plainly shown, the English introduced into Great-Britain the same Laws that were in use in their own Country. Nay, he affirms, that till the Norman conquest, there was not so much as one Law in England but what, in the main, the Germans had the same. 'Tis true, as the Anglo-Saxons consisted of three several Nations, who had also their separate quarters in England, there might be some difference, upon that account, between the seven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. But this difference could not be very great, since the three Nations were united in Germany, before their coming into England, and made but one and the same People under the general Name of Saxons. All that can be inferred from hence, is, that the Laws established by the Anglo-Saxons in England, were composed of those of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes. But to look for the Origin of the English Constitution among the ancient Britons, would be without Foundation, though 'tis not impossible the Women only. Afterwards, coming to have a more restrained signification, it was used only to denote the Companion of the King, or the Queen. But it must be observed, this appellation is common to all Queens, whether they hold their Dignity of their Husbands, or of their own Right.

The King's Sons and the Princes of the Royal Family held the third rank. They were distinguished by the Title of Clyto, taken from a Greek word signifying, Illustrious. 'Tis something difficult to know the reason why the Saxon Princes affected a Greek Title. One would be apt to think the word Clyto came from some old Saxon Term, if Edgar's Title of Totius Anglie Bafilens (1), were not a demonstration that he had a view to the Greek. As this Title was peculiar to the Princes, the word Clyto alone came by degrees to denote a Prince of the Royal Blood. Accordingly, nothing is more common with the ancient English Historians than to use the Terms Clytones, Clytoni, for the King's Sons. In process of time, the Saxon Term Atheling, from Athel, that is, Noble, was substituted in its place. As for the termination Ing, it denotes the extraction or descent, as Malmibury informs us. The Sons of the Kings of England, says he, were wont to assume Names which shew'd their Extraction. Thus, the Son of Edgar named himself Edgaring, the Son of Edmund, Edmunding, and so of the others. But they had all one common Title, namely, that of Atheling. As the French, which settled in Gaul, came from Germany, probably the termination Ing, in the words, Mervingi, and Carolingians, that is, the descendants of Mervius and Charles, is derived from the same origin.

Next to the Princes, the first degree of the Nobility was that of Ealdorman (2). This word, which in its primary Signification means only an aged Man, came by degrees to stand for Persons of the greatest Distinction; apparently because such were chosen to discharge the highest Offices, whose long experience had rendered them most capable. 'Tis not only among the Saxons that this word is used in these two different Senses. We find in Scripture that the Elders of Israel, of Moab and of Midian were taken for the chief Men of their respective Nations. The word, Senator, Senbr, Signor, Seigneur, in Latin, Spanish, Italian, and French, signify the same thing. The Ealdormen therefore in England were the most considerable of the Nobility, discharged the highest Offices, and consequently had the largest Estates. As they were generally intrusted with the Government of the Counties, instead of saying the Governor, it was said, the Ealdorman of such a County. Hence by degrees this word came to signify the Governour of a County or even a single City. Whilst the Heptharchy lasted, these Offices were only during the King's Pleasure, who turn'd out the Ealdormen when he thought proper, and placed others in their room. At length, they became during Life, at least for the most part. But however, this did not hinder the Ealdormen from being displaced upon several accounts. We have seen Instances of this in the Reigns of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor. After the Danes were settled in England, the Title of Ealdorman was by degrees changed into that of Earl, a Danish word of the same import (3). Afterwards, the Normans introduced that of Count, which, though different in its original Signification, meant however the same Dignity. But for reasons too long to be explained, the Danish Term Earl, is still used to denote the same Person, expressed by the word Count in other Countries.

There were several sorts of Ealdormen. Some were properly only Governours of a Province or County. Others were Owners of their Province, holding it as a Fee of the Crown, so that it was always considered as Parcel of the State. The History of Alfred the Great, affords an Instance of this last sort of Ealdormen, which were very rare in England. We find this Prince gave the Property of Mercia to Earl Ethelred, and that Elfeda his Widow kept possession in the reign of Edward the Elder. Nay, it was by force that Edward dispossessed his Niece Alfwina after the death of Elfeda. Malmibury, speaking of Edward the Elder, expresses himself thus; He united the two Kingdoms of Mercia and Wessex; but as to the first, he was only titular King, because it was given to a Lord named Ethelred. And to show in what manner this Lord held Mercia, the same Historian speaking of Alfred the Great, says, He gave London, the Capital of Mercia, to a Lord called Ethelred, who had married Elfeda his Daughter, is hold it of him by Fealty and Homage. Hence 'tis plain, Ethelred held Mercia as a Fee, in the same manner that Otha and Eufsa had formerly held Northumberland of the Crown of Kent, as this Historian assures us. Thus also in France, about the beginning of the third Race of their Kings, the Dukedoms and Earldoms, which before were only bare Governments, were made Hereditary, on condition of Homage. These Ealdormen or Earls were honoured with the Titles of Reguli, Subreguli, Principes, Patricii. Nay, there are Instances of their having the Title of Rex (4). As for the others, who were only Governors, they had the Title of Ealdorman of such a County, expressed sometimes in Latin by the Term Consul. The first administered Justice in their own name, and appropriated to their own use all the Profits and Revenues of their respective Counties. The last administered Justice in the King's Name, and had only a certain share of the Profits assigned them. Earl Gosdwin, how great a Lord soever he might be in other respects, was of this Rank. To these may be added a third order of Ealdormen, who had the Title, though without a Government, on account of their high Birth, and out of these the Governors were usually chosen. Thus the Title of Ealdorman denoted sometimes only a Person of Quality.

There were also inferior Ealdormen in Cities and Boroughs. But these were only subordinate Magistrates, who administered Justice in the King's Name, and were dependent on the great Ealdormen or Earls. The name of Ealdorman or Alderman is still given to these inferior Officers, whilst the others have the Title of Earl or Count.

The Office of an Ealdorman was wholly Civil, and had nothing to do with Military Affairs. There was in each Province a Duke, who commanded the Militia. The name of Duke, taken from the Latin Dux, is a modern Term. The Saxons called this Officer Heretog (5). He had no right to meddle with civil Matters. His business was of a quite different nature from that of an Earl, as he was also independent of him. Hengist and Horsa are called in the Saxon Annals, Heretogan, or Dukes, because they were sent into Great-Britain, not to govern the Country, but command in the War. On the contrary, Otha and Eufsa have always in the same Annals the title of Ealdormen, because they were Governors of Northumberland, under the Kings of Kent. It is true, they might also be styled Dukes, as they had the command of the Army. Accordingly we find in our Histories, sometimes the title of Duke, sometimes of Earl, given to the same Person, when these two Offices were united in one, as they frequently were about the end of the Heptharchy. Thus the Governors of Wessex, Mercia, and East-Anglia, are indifferently called Dukes or Earls. But I don't know the reason why Historians never give the title of Duke to the Governor of Northumberland. And yet some of these Governors had the command of the Armies, as is plain from the example of Sitard, to whom Edward the Confessor committed the management of the War with Cumberland (6).

There were moreover among the Saxons three very considerable Offices, two whereof were Civil, and the third Military. The first, which very few Subjects were ever invested with, was that of Ealdorman of all England. This Office answers to that of Chief Judiciary of England, the King's Lieutenant, Viceroy, or Guardian of the Realm. This was so high a Dignity, that the Person invested with it was honoured with the title of Half-Kyning, or Demi-King. We find in the History of the Anglo-Saxons, but two Lords who were raised to this Post, namely, Athelstan Earl of East-Anglia, and Athwin his Son, who were styled Totius Anglie Aldermannus (7).

The second great Office was that of Chancellor (8). He finally determined all Causes that were brought to the King's Court, and from him lay no Appeal. It was his Seldom, Titles of Honour

(1) King Edgar styles himself thus in his Charter to Glasbury-Abbey, as it stands in Malmibury's Antiquities of that Monastery.

(2) Our Authors call them Ealdormen; but I cannot find the Word is so used in any Writer. The Saxon Annals, &c. style them Ealdorman.

(3) Patrum or seniorum, i. e. Elders, and senex or senior, Honorable. In the Danish Language to this Day erling, signifies Noble or Honorable, as Erling radna for Nobles Deacons in St. Mark, cap. xiv. v. 43. Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 638.

(4) Ethelred, Ealdorman of Mercia under King Alfred, is so called by Ethelward, and his Earldom is, in Florence of Worcester, called Regnum and Rex, (which is the same) in the Saxon Annals. See Ethelred, l. 4. c. 3.

(6) The Union of these two Offices in one Person was no more than what was practised among the Romans in the Person of their Consul. The Art of War in the Saxon Time was not arrived to that Degree of Nicety as it is at present. You have at large the Duty of the Heretog, and the manner of his being elected by the County-Assembly at a full Tide, in the Laws of Edward the Confessor. See Dr. Hutton, p. 305. De Heretogibus.

true they were called Freolatan, that is, free men; but it was only to distinguish them from those that were Free-born, who however had no peculiar Privilege. Among the Anglo-Saxons, the Lords had not the power of Life and Death over their Slaves. Nay, the Laws provided, they should not cripple or maim them without incurring a Penalty. They who made such Laws, imitated in some measure the Law of God, without knowing it (1).

Freeholders.

All the King's Subjects, except Slaves and Villains, were Freeholders and Freeholders. But though Earls and Barons, or Thanes might be included under this general Appellation, yet by Freeholders is commonly meant the Thanes of the second and third Clauses, with the Ceorls.

Burgbers and Aldermen.

The Inhabitants of Towns, who were called Burgh-witan or Burgbers, had the Privilege of being governed by Magistrates chosen out of their own Body, to whom was given the Title of Aldermen, and of forming a Society, from whence is derived what is called in England a Corporation (2). This Privilege was granted them for the Encouragement of Arts, and especially of Trade and Commerce, which was justly deem'd of very great advantage to the State. For the farther encouragement of Trade, it was also enacted by Law, that if a Merchant cross'd the wide Sea three times, he should be honoured with the Title of Thane, and admitted to all the Privileges of that Order. I don't know what is meant here by the wide Sea, unless it be the German Ocean, since in those days, America was not discovered. From the time of the Saxons, Merchants have been in great Repute in England, since we find such as distinguish themselves in Trade, are frequently honoured with Knighthood by the King.

Having now gone through the several Orders and Degrees of Men among the Anglo-Saxons, I shall in the next place, consider how they were governed, and chiefly the method of administering Justice. To this end it will be necessary to speak of the different Courts they erected in England, whereby will be seen the origin of the several Courts of Justice now in that Kingdom.

The COURTS of JUSTICE.

I Have already observed in the Life of Alfred the Great, that this Prince divided England into Shires, the Shires into Trythings, Laths, or Wapentakes, these into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tithings. However it must not be imagined that in this division, he introduced something entirely new to the English. He only settled the bounds of the former divisions, making some alterations for convenience sake. At least, as to the division of the Kingdom into Shires, 'tis certain he only proportioned it in a better manner than before. This is evident from there being Earls of Somersetshire and Devonshire in the reign of Ethelwulf, as Alfred relates, who lived about that time. But Alfred uniting all England into one Monarchy, made a more exact and extensive division of his dominions. The Shires contained a whole Province subject to the jurisdiction of an Earl or Count, and therefore were also called Counties. Some of these Shires being divided into Trythings, others into Laths, and others into Wapentakes, each of these divisions, which were the same thing under different names (3), consisted of three or four hundreds of Families, and each hundred was subdivided into Tithings. The Courts of Justice were formed with respect to these several divisions, that is, there was a Court for each Tithing, Hundred, &c. to the end Justice might be administered with less charge, greater dispatch, and more exactness.

The lowest of these Courts was the Tything Court. It consisted of ten heads of Families, who were mutual Sureties for one another, as each of them in particular was for all that were under him (4). Every Subject in the Kingdom was registred in some Tything. Only Persons of the first rank had the Privilege that their single Family should compose a Tything, in which they were estimable. Each Tything had a President, call'd Tything Aelm, or Burgh-bilder, who took care to hold a Court when occasion required. The method of proceeding was as follows.

If any Person accus'd of a Crime, refused to appear, the other nine Sureties were bound to see him forth-coming to Justice. If he ran away, he was not suffered to settle in any other Town, Borough or Village; because no one could change Habitation, without a Testimonial from his Tything, for want of which they that received him were punished. By the Laws of King Edward, the Tything had thirty days (5), allowed them to search for the Criminal. If he was not to be found, the Tything Aelm, taking with him two of his own, and nine of the three next Tythings (6), these twelve purged themselves by Oath of the offence and flight of the Malefactor. If they refused to swear, the Tything, the offender belonged to, was obliged to make satisfaction in his stead.

This Court frequently met, as well to decide the differences among the Members of the Tything, as to concert measures against such, whose behaviour created a suspicion of their committing some crime, for which the rest might be in danger of incurring the Penalty. In this case, the suspected Person was obliged to find particular security for his good Behaviour, without which he was confined. This Court was a terror to People of mean Condition, as they saw they could not commit any offence with impunity. Before this Order was established, the manner sort of People might easily find their quittance by reason of their obscurity, which prevented them from being taken notice of. But it was impossible for them to change their Habitation, after they were obliged to bring a Testimonial from their Tything, to enable them to settle or be registred in another.

These ten heads of Families, of whom the Tything consisted, were call'd Free-Burghs, that is, Free-Pledges, Burgh signifying, Surety or Pledge. Hence the word Neighbour, which originally signifies a near Pledge. In all appearance Burghs, which signifies a Neighbour among the Dutch, is derived from the same source, I mean, from the same custom which was observed in Germany and served for model to King Alfred. We find in the History of the Customs of China, written in Spanish by John Gonzalez de Mendoza an Augustin Monk, that the like Custom is now in use in that Empire. The likeness is so perfect between what is practised by the Chinese and the Anglo-Saxons, with respect to these Tythings or mutual Pledges, that it is wonderful, how two Nations so remote from each other, and between whom there was never any communication, could thus have the same Thoughts.

The next Court was that of the Hundred. It was held once a Month, and had for President one of the most noted Aldermen of the Hundred. The Bishop or Archdeacon was obliged to fit with him, to determine with the other Judges, all matters Ecclesiastical and Civil relating to the Hundred.

The third Court was that of the Trythings (7), Laths or Wapentakes, according to the Name given these divisions in the several Counties. Here were decided the Causes between private Persons, belonging to different Hundreds of the same Trything or Lath. Besides this Court, each Thane or the first Rank, or Baron, held one like it, wherein he determined the Controversies between his Vassals. From whence the present Court-Baron takes its Original.

But when a Suit commenced between Persons of different Tythings, it was brought to the County-Court, call'd in Saxon, Shire-gemot or Folcmot, which was held twice a year, or oftner, upon occasion. Herein presided

(1) There were in England two Sorts of Villains, a Villain in Grave, who was immediately bound to the Person of his Lord, and his Heir. The other, a Villain reuerend to a Manor, that is, belonging and being annexed to a Manor. There are not truly any Villains or a reuerend Villain in any Country, yet they retain one Mark of their original Servitude. For as to the reuerend Villains, who are not reckoned as Men, but as Cattle, they are without any Rights, or voice at Elections, by virtue of their Copy-holds.

(2) After Lands were appropriated and became Manors, the Manors were divided into Manors, and Manors were divided into Manors. This was the Foundation of the many Cities or Boroughs which were formed throughout Europe, which formerly in other Kingdoms as well as in England by being necessary and useful became considerable. See Annals p. 32.

(3) The Wapentakes are the same as the Hundreds, and not as the Laths or Tythings, as Mr. Rapin forms, to shew here an oversight. This word is first in the Norman of the Ten.

(4) By Ten Families we are not to understand Ten House keepers, but Ten Lords of Manors, with all their Vills, Tenants, Loungers, and Slaves, who, though they do not all live near their Lord's Residence, are all counted part of his Family. As there were no more Five Manors in the early Times, nor for long after, Ten such Families must occupy a large Space of Ground, and might well contain a great Tything. In all counties the Town Tythings or Burghs consisted not of Ten Ship-keepers or Traders, but of Ten Companies or Fraternities, called in Saxon, Gilds. Perhaps some more eminent than the rest might employ great Numbers of Artificers, Hewers or Slaves; and if we understand by Ten Families, Ten such, we may well conceive they constituted 700 or 800 Burghs. Every Tything was as it were a little Republick, which exercised a judicial Power within the Fre Assembly of every County, so that was one Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants. For as the Fre presided in the general Assembly of every County, so there was one Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants. For as the Fre presided in the general Assembly of every County, so there was one Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants. For as the Fre presided in the general Assembly of every County, so there was one Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants.

(5) One and Thirty Days.

(6) The Tything was a third Part of the County, some Footpicks or which ancient Division still remains in the Ridings of Yorkshire for East-Riding, West-Riding, and North-Riding, are manifest Corruptions of East-Tything, West-Tything, and North-Tything.

the Bishop, and the Earl or Ealdorman; but in the absence of the Earl, the High Sheriff, or Viscount supplied his place. In this Court were registred all the Tythings of the County, with the Names of the Members. Ecclesiastical Causes were tried generally in the first place; next those the King was concerned in; and lastly, such as related to private Persons. William the Conqueror dispensed with the Bishops sitting in this Court, and granted them the Privilege of holding Courts of their own for the determining Ecclesiastical Matters. Appeals lay from the Tything, Hundred, or Trything Courts, to the Shire-gaol. Here also all Persons of what rank soever were to take the Oath of Allegiance to the King.

The King's Court.

How great soever the Power of this Court was, there was one above it, which they called the King's Court, because the King himself presided there in Person, or in his absence, the High-Chancellor. In this Court were examined the Judgments of the inferior Courts; and it was apparently this Court that condemned the four and forty Judges put to death by Alfred's Order, as has been related in his Life. From this Court the Common-Pleas and King's-Bench derive their Original.

The Witten-Gemot.

I come now to the Great Court, or Assembly General of the Kingdom, called in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel Synod. As there are great disputes about the Existence, Origin, Nature and Authority of this Assembly-General, it will be proper in this place, to set forth the various Sentiments concerning these Matters, with the Reasons and Answers of each as maintain the contrary Opinions. For my part, as I am wholly unconcerned in the decision of the Questions formed upon this Subject, I shall content myself with stating fairly and impartially the reasons alledged on both Sides. To proceed regularly, I shall divide this matter into four heads, which will comprize whatever has been said of moment on this point. First, the Origin of the Wittena-Gemot. Secondly, Who were the Members of this great Council. Thirdly, Their Authority, and the Affairs there debated and concluded. Fourthly, Their Power in Ecclesiastical Matters.

I. The ORIGIN of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

I. Opinion of the Witten-Gemot.

THERE are who believe the Wittena-Gemot or Parliament, to be of later date in England than the Royal Power, and to owe its origin to the condescension of the Kings. They pretend, the Sovereign having, from time to time, freely summoned the chief Men of the Nation, to consult with them about important Affairs, this at last was turned into Custom: That in process of time, the People improving some favorable Junctures, claimed, as their Privilege, the right of having a Parliament; though at first it depended entirely on the King's Pleasure, whether he would consult it or not. The main reason they ground their Assertion upon, is, that till Edward the Confessor, England was hardly ever, or but for a little while, united into one State. During the Heptarchy, it was divided into several Kingdoms, which made so many distinct States. Of these Kingdoms, Egbert united but four, whilst the other three remained separate. Afterwards, the Danes became Masters of Northumberland, Mercia, and East-Anglia, and shared the Lands amongst them. So that from the Saxon Conquest to the second Danish Invasion, we do not find, England was united into one Body, but during the short Reigns of Edwy, Edgar and Edward the Martyr. However the Government did not long continue in this Posture. The Danes renewing their ravages in the Reign of Ethelred II., England was quickly divided into two Parts, whereof one was subject to the Danes, the other to the English. It is true indeed, after the Death of Edmund Ironside, the Kingdom was re-united under Canute the Great; but this Union ended with his Reign, and the Kingdom was once more divided among his Sons. In a word, it is maintained, that England was never thoroughly united into one Kingdom till the time of Edward the Confessor. It is moreover pretended to be shown, from the several sorts of Laws, namely, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish, that this Heptarchical Government could take its rise from an Assembly-General of all England, which never had a being during the dominion of the Saxon Kings.

To this it is answered, they who talk thus confound two things which ought carefully to be distinguished, namely, the Wittena-Gemot or particular Parliament of each of the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and that of the seven Kingdoms together, as making but one Body and one State. Though this last never existed, yet might the present Parliament derive its Original from the other. On supposition that each Kingdom had its own Wittena-Gemot, those of Suffex and Wessex became one, when these two Kingdoms were united under Ina. Afterwards, when Egbert annexed to his own Kingdom those of Kent and Essex, the four Kingdoms of Wessex, Suffex, Kent and Essex, made but one State, and consequently had but one Parliament. In proportion as this Kingdom was enlarged by the Conquests of Alfred the Great, Edward and Athelstan, the Wittena-Gemot increased in its Members, and at length, comprised all England in the Reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. Indeed, in the Reign of Ethelred II. the Wars with the Danes broke in upon this Regulation, and England was divided into two Parts. But under Canute the Great the Kingdom was once more united, and consequently there was but one and the same Wittena-Gemot, which was again divided into two, though but for a short Space, under Harold and Hardicanute. In fine, after Harold, by the interest of Earl Godwin, was put in possession of the Kingdom of Wessex, there was but one Wittena-Gemot in all England till the Norman Conquest.

To prove therefore that the present Parliament derives not its Origin from the Wittena-Gemot of the Saxons, either the time must be assigned when Parliaments first began after the Conquest, or it must be denied, there was ever any such thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each of the seven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. The former of these is hardly possible, unless bare Conjectures are allowed instead of solid Arguments. As for the latter, the Assertors of the antiquity of Parliaments produce, against such as deny the being of the Saxon Wittena-Gemot, several proofs which they look upon as demonstrative. The first is taken from the Title of the Laws of Ina King of Wessex, wherein are these Words: I Ina, by the Grace of God, King of the West-Saxons, with the Advice of Centred my Father, Hedda my Bishop, with all my Ealdormen, Seniors, and wise Men of my Nation, willing to establish good order in the State, have ordained, &c. Hence it is plain, that Ina in making his Laws had the advice of the Assembly-General of Wessex. That the same method was established in Mercia, is shown from Bertrulph's Charter to the Abby of Croyland, wherein are these Words, with the unanimous Consent of the present Council assembled at Kingsbury, to debate on the Affairs of the Nation.

In this Charter, after the Bishops and Lords had set their Hands, the King subscribed in this Manner: I Bertrulph, in the Presence of all the Bishops and great Men of my Kingdom. This is a clear evidence that the Charter was granted in the Assembly-General or Wittena-Gemot of Mercia. The same might be shown, with regard to each of the other Kingdoms: but, say they, the Case is so evident, as not to admit of Dispute.

They pretend likewise to prove, there was a general Wittena-Gemot of the seven Kingdoms, from the very name of Heptarchy, which implies that the seven Kingdoms had something in common, and consequently, there was an Assembly, where their common Affairs were considered. For Instance, how could the Monarchs or Generals of the seven Kingdoms be elected, if there was not an Assembly for that Purpose? Moreover, they pretend to have more direct proofs of the holding from time to time such Assemblies for the common affairs of the seven Kingdoms. Several Historians assure us, there was a general Assembly held in Gloucestershire, where Ina King of Wessex was chosen Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, by the Interest of Sebbia King of Essex, who was present with all the other Kings. They produce also from Ingulphus, Witgolph King of Mercia's Charter, where are these Words: In the Presence of Egbert King of the West-Saxons, of Ethelwulph his Son, and of the Bishops and great Lords of England, assembled at London. Hence it is plain, this Assembly convened at London, and composed of all the Bishops and great Men of England, was a general Wittena-Gemot of the Nation.

In answer to the objection taken from the diversity of the Laws then in England, it is said, it is not at all strange, that Mercia and Wessex, being two distinct States, should have different Laws; much less, that the Danes should establish their own Laws in their Conquests (1). But it is maintained, it cannot be reasonably inferred, from this Diversity, that there was no such thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each Kingdom, or a general one for all the Seven. This Inference would be as absurd, as if a Man, from the different Laws and Customs in the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, should conclude there was neither a Convention of the States in each Province, nor an Assembly of the States-General.

1. See Note in the Reign of Canute the Great, concerning this threelord Division of the Laws.

To strengthen all these Proofs, moreover is urged the Conformity in this respect between England and the other European Kingdoms. The Saxons had the like Assemblies in Germany; the Ostrogoths, and after them, the Lombards in Italy: The Franks had their Fields of Mars or of May (1), their Sanes, their Parliaments, and the Spaniards, their Cortes.

This Conformity plainly shews, there was no other form of Government then in Europe. It is further added, that to deny with any Foundation these Assemblies to be as ancient as kingly Power, it must be shewn who are the Sovereigns that first established them in each Kingdom. But how came it to pass, that all the Kings in Europe should agree together at the same time, to become so very gracious and condescending to their Subjects? There is doubtless more reason to suppose they would have all joined in abolishing, rather than in granting a Privilege of this Nature.

II. The Constituent Parts or Members of the WITTENA-GE MOT.

ALL agree, the greater Nobility were Members of the Wittena-Ge mot. By the greater Nobility I mean the Ealdormen and Thanes of the first Rank, afterwards still'd Earls and Barons. But the difficulty is to know, whether the Thanes of the second and third Class, and the Georles, of whom the House of Commons at present consists, had a right to sit there by their Representatives or not. Tho' this Inquiry seems to be of little Moment, at a time when the Commons incontestably enjoy this Privilege, yet it is not entirely needless to know, whether they usurp'd it, whether it was given them by the concession of the Kings, or whether it is of the same standing with the Monarchy. How undeniable soever the Right of the Commons may be at present, there are some who are persuaded 'twould be of dangerous consequence to acknowledge it to flow from the Condescension of the Sovereigns, lest the same Power that is supposed to have granted it, should think of revoking it when a favourable opportunity offered (2). And indeed this is the true motive of all the attempts to prove, the Commons have not been all along in possession of this Privilege. 'Tis but too apparent, this question has been started only to gratify such of the Kings as have endeavour'd to stretch the Royal Prerogative beyond its due bounds.

Be this as it will, they who maintain the Commons had no right to sit in the Wittena-Ge mot, in the time of the Saxon Kings, alledge for their first reason, that the under Thanes and Georles were not Proprietors of Lands. From whence they infer, it would have been of no use to the Commons to have a place in these Assemblies, whose sole Business was to regulate the Affairs of a Country which properly belonged to the King and the Nobility. They add, 'tis incredible that the Nobles of the first rank, should agree to make their Vassals their Companions: That since in the distribution of their Lands they were at Liberty to give them on what Conditions they pleas'd, 'tis not at all probable they should place the Tenants in the same Rank with the Lords. To render this opinion more probable, they say further, it is not to be imagin'd, that in those days the People were upon the same foot as at present; that although they were free, their Freedom was confin'd within narrow bounds; that the Superiority of the Nobles over them was vastly greater than at this day, and for that reason the People were little regarded: They serv'd in the wars for foot Soldiers, who were look'd upon as Servants. Accordingly they had the name of Knechten [that is Servants] given them.

To this the Assertors of the rights of the Commons reply, That since the Nobles, who held their Lands of the King, had a right to a place in the Wittena-Ge mot, the Commons, who held their Lands of the Nobles, might very well have the same Privilege too. The reason alledged in the Objection not holding good against the Lords, ought not to be of more force against the Commons. They add, that the main Business of the general Council was the making Laws as well for the People as for the Nobility; the settling the rights of the Subjects, the preserving Peace in the State, and the raising Taxes, whereof the People paid the largest share. Hence they infer, it was very natural, and extremely consonant to the Custom of the Saxons, that the People should give their consent to all those things that concern'd them no less than the Nobles. In a word, they say, if the People assist'd not at the Debates of the great Council, 'tis not to be conceiv'd whence should proceed the great care of securing their Rights and Liberties, and preventing their being oppress'd by the Great. 'Tis well known that Men, especially the Great, are not wont to labour so heartily to lessen their Power, but rather to endeavour increase their Authority as much as possible.

But as this point, being a matter of fact and not of right, can't be decided by bare Reasonings, both Parties endeavour to support their Opinions with more suitable Proofs, namely, Authorities. To this End, each side lays great stress upon certain Terms in the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, and upon certain Expressions in the Historians who speak of the Government of those days. 'Twill be necessary therefore to produce some of these Proofs, for the Reader's better understanding the Question, and to enable him the better to judge of the Reasons alledged on both sides. I shall begin with what is urged against the Commons, or their Representatives, being Members of the General Assembly.

In the first place it is said, the very name of Wittena-Ge mot plainly implies that the great Council consisted only of such as were stiled Wittan. Now 'tis pretended, the precise meaning of that word is Majores Natu, Seniores, Ealdormen, by which are understood only the Earls and Barons, or in the Language of the Saxons, the Ealdormen and King's Thanes, Spiritual and Temporal. To make this appear, a Passage is cited out of Bede's Ecclesiastical History as translated by King Alfred. Bede says, King Osuald applied to the Majores Natu of Scotland for a Bishop; and Alfred has rendered the Terms, Majores Natu by Ealdormen. The same Historian saying in the same place, that Osuald made use of Suis Ducibus & Ministris for Interpreters, Alfred has translated these words by, his Ealdormen and Thanes. Hence it is infer'd, that the Term Wittan is to be understood only of Ealdormen and Barons, or in general, of the chief Men of the Nation. And accordingly it is concluded, the Wittena-Ge mot, or Assembly of wise Men, consist'd only of such. This Explanation of the word Wittan is farther confirm'd by the Historians rendering it in Latin by Principes, Optimates, Proceres, Magnates, Ducis, Comites, Præpositi, Ministri Regis, Nobiles, Milites, which can by no means be understood of the People, or their Representatives.

They who are of the contrary opinion, alledge, in their turn, the same Authorities to prove the greater Nobility were not alone summon'd to the national Council. They pretend, these very Expressions, on which their Adversaries ground their Opinion, are not to be so restrained to the Nobility, as to be applicable to the Magistrates and chief Men among the People. To prove what they advance, they cite numberless Passages from the Latin Authors, where the Words Principes, Nobiles, Milites, are to be taken in that Sense.

To this the others reply, the word People may be understood in two different Senses; first, as it signifies a Nation in general, in which sense they own that by Magnates, Proceres, Nobiles, &c. may be meant the chief Men of the People, or of the whole Nation. The other sense of the word People is more restrained, and signifies only a part of the People, as separate or different from the Nobility, as when one says, the Nobles and People. This is the meaning in question, to which it should be proved that the cited Passages can be applied. Now this is what they think impossible, affirming, there is no such thing to be met with in the Latin Authors, as Optimates Plebis but always Populi, that is, of the People in general. But supposing it were true, that these Expressions did sometimes denote the chief Men among the People, as distinguish'd from the Nobles, it would still remain to prove, that, in the alledged Passages, the word People must be taken in that Sense, unless the very thing in dispute be supposed.

But to this the Assertors of the Rights of the Commons answer, They readily agree these Expressions are principally to be understood of Noble Persons; but affirm withal, their meaning is not to be confin'd to the Nobles of the first rank. They say, that although in England, the greater Nobility, or Peers of the Realm, are a distinct Order from the lesser, who are rank'd with the Commons, it does not follow that the Latin Terms are to be explain'd by a distinction no where else to be found. For Instance, in France, the lowest Gentilhomme belongs as much to the Nobility, as the highest Lord; the greater and lesser Nobility making but one and the same Body.

It is a sad thing, to see an Inquiry of this Nature reduced to a Grammatical Dispute. But since I have undertaken to relate the Arguments of both sides, I thought myself oblig'd not to pass over in silence those taken from the fore-mentioned Terms. However, in what has been said, the one side seems to me plainly to prove that the great Lords had a right to sit in the Witena-Gemot, which no body ever denied. But I can't say it necessarily follows from what they alleged, that the Commons were excluded, which is the point in question. On the other hand, what is urged on the other side tends rather to shew that the Reasons for the Exclusion of the Commons are not satisfactory, than to prove directly, they had a Place in the Witena-Gemot. Let us therefore proceed to another sort of Arguments, alleg'd in favour of the Commons.

The first is taken from Henry of Huntingdon the Historian, who, speaking of the depoling of Sigebert King of Wessex, expresses himself thus: King Sigebert growing incorrigible, the great Men and People of Wessex assembled together in the beginning of the second Year of his Reign, and depos'd him with unanimous Consent. In this Passage it is pretended, the People being put in opposition with the great Men, can mean only the Commons, and consequently they gave their Votes in the General Assembly.

This Explanation is supported by a passage of another Historian, who says: In the Reign of Edward the Elder, were assembled the Bishops, Abbots, the faithful Subjects or Vassals, the great Men and People, in the Kingdom of Wessex. It is maintained, that by the Fidels, or faithful Subjects, which may be explained by Vassals or Liege-Men, are to be understood the People, as distinct from the Nobles, since in this place the Fidels and the People are distinguished from the great Men.

To these Authorities they add another from Ethelwulf's Charter of Tythes, where it is said, These things were granted by the King, Barons and People.

These Proofs are confirmed by two Charters; the first whereof is King Ethelred's, in favour of the Abbey of Wolvenhampton, which concludes with these words: These are the Decrees of Sigier Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Court held before King Ethelred, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops, Abbots, Senators, the Chiefs and People of the whole Country.

The other, granted by Edward the Confessor to the Abbey of Westminster, runs thus: I have ordered therefore this Charter of my Donation to be read on the day of the Dedication of the said Church, in the presence of the Bishops, Abbots, Earls and great Men of England, and in the Sight and Hearing of all the People.

Another Argument for the Commons.

But the Opposers of the Commons pretend to invalidate the force of all the Arguments drawn from Passages of Historians and Charters several ways. In the first place, they observe, the greatest part of these Historians lived when the Commons sat in Parliament, and therefore it is no wonder when they speak of the Anglo-Saxon Affairs, they should represent things as they were in their own Times. In the second place, they say, nothing can be inferred from any expressions in these Charters, because they were not originally writ in Latin but in Saxon. Consequently, the Latin Quotations from thence are only Translations, the faithfulness whereof cannot be judged of, without confronting them with the Originals, which is impossible, seeing they are all lost. For Instance, it is certain, the Saxons never made use of the term Baron, which was brought in by the Normans, and yet we find it in one of the abovementioned Charters. In the third place, they say, some of the Passages alleg'd do but shew at most, that the Resolutions of the Witena-Gemot were taken in the sight of the People, who perhaps expressed their satisfaction by Shouts and Acclamations. But they maintain this to be no proof of the People's giving their Votes, or that their Consent was necessary, since they were present only as Witnesses. This manifestly appears, say they, in the forementioned Charter of Ethelwulf, which runs thus: There were present the Archbishops and Bishops of England, Buthred King of Mercia, Edmund King of East-Anglia, and of Abbots, Abbesses, Dukes, Earls, and great Men of the whole Kingdom, and other faithful Subjects, a great multitude, who all approved of this royal Act, to which the dignified Persons subscribed their Names. It is pretended, since the great Men only signed the Charter, their approbation alone was necessary. Besides, what can be the meaning of a great multitude of faithful Subjects? Was it the whole Body of the People? This they won't say, who maintain that the Commons sat in the Witena-Gemot by their Representatives, as they do at this day. And indeed, this great multitude cannot well be applied to a very limited number of Representatives, but may very aptly be used to denote Crowds of People, got together to make acclamations. In fine, it is observed, that in all the forecited Passages, a forced meaning is given to the Term, Fidels, to make it signify the Representatives of the Commons, since that word is applicable to all Subjects in general, as well to the Body of the Nobles as of the People.

To come therefore to more direct Proofs, the favourers of the Commons allege other Passages, where they pretend the meaning of these Terms is fixed to the Representatives of the People, by the word Procuratores. In a Charter (1) dated 811, it is said, Cenulph King of Mercia assembled, for the Dedication of the Monastery of Winchester, the great Men of the Kingdom, the Bishops, Procuratores, &c.

To this it is answered, That the dedication of a Church and Monastery was the only business in hand, for which purpose Cenulph had assembled a multitude of People, and particularly such as were distinguished by their Birth or Offices. But supposing it to have been a real Witena-Gemot, the Term, Procuratores, is too undeterminate to denote the Representatives of the Commons, unless it be joined with some other word that fixes its Signification.

To refute this Objection, a Charter is produced by the other Side, where they maintain, The Term Procuratores, must be understood of the Representatives of the People. This Charter, granted by King Albustan (2), concludes thus: Granted at the Royal Will at Welewe, in the Presence of the Bishops, Abbots, Dukes, Earls, and Patrie Procuratores. Now, say they, who can these Patrie Procuratores be, but the Representatives of the People? But they, who are of the contrary Opinion, say, this is only a bare conjecture, which can be of no force, unless this Expression be shewn to be common at that time.

Lastly, a Proof is alleg'd in favour of the Commons, that seems to be stronger than any of the former. It is said, there are now several Hamlets (3), that send Representatives to Parliament, which Right must have been received in the time of the Saxon Kings, when they were considerable Cities or Burroughs. Indeed, it is very improbable this Privilege should be granted them after they made so deplorable a figure in the Kingdom.

To evade this Argument, it is replied, It cannot take place, unless it be proved that these Burroughs, now become Hamlets, were gone to decay before the Conquest. They add, that even this would not be sufficient, because very possibly they might have been rebuilt and destroyed again during the Civil Wars England was so often troubled with, after the Commons were in possession of the right of sending Representatives to Parliament.

To all these Arguments alleg'd in behalf of the Commons, it is added as a favourable Precedent, that in all the other States in Europe, the People were summoned to the General Assemblies. Though hitherto I have only related the Reasons of both Parties, I can't help remarking upon this last, that it is groundlessly alleg'd, without pretending however thereby to weaken the rest. And this I shall plainly shew, at least with regard to France, by the Authority of three Writers, who are looked upon as thoroughly vers'd in the customs of that Kingdom.

The first is Mazari, who discoursing of this Subject, says, "I meet with three sorts of Assemblies in those days; the General Courts of the Provinces; the Champs de Mai, at which were present the Seniores and Majores of the People, where military Affairs were chiefly debated; and the Conventus, Colloquia, Parliaments, where the Bishops, Abbots, and other great Men met to make Laws, and regulate matters relating to the administration of Justice, the Civil Government, and the Publick Revenues, &c. These two last Assemblies were confounded in one." In the opinion therefore of this Historian, none but the great Men were members of the Parliaments. But since, it may be objected, that by the Seniores and Majores Natu that assisted at the Champs de Mai, are to be understood the Representatives of the People; let us see what President Fauchet says upon this head.

This learned Historian mentions a certain Speech, shewn him as made by Boniface Archbishop of Mayence, where that Prelate told Pepin, that the Gauls, omnium Ordinum, of all Orders and Degrees, had given him the Crown. "This Speech, says the Author, is most certainly spurious. First, because the Franks never called themselves Gauls. Secondly and principally, because of the words omnium Ordinum; for at that time there was no talk either of Orders or Degrees, none but Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Nobles, having a place in the Senatus, General Courts, or Parliaments, and the Earls, Commissioners or Church-advocates, to report the Complaints of the People of their respective Territories."

Paquier, the third Writer, whose Authority I would alleg'd, expresses himself still more plainly and fully in this matter. His words are: "Although some who pretend to be well vers'd in the History of France, believe the Assembly of the States-General is of a very long standing, may found the Liberties of the People upon it, yet is neither the one nor the other true. I am sensible, and ready to own, that formerly in Gaul, before the Conquest of Julius Cæsar, there were General Assemblies, which were continued by him under a pretence, familiar to the Romans, of leaving us in possession of our ancient Rights and Liberties. But in all these Assemblies, you'll find none of the common People, whom they looked upon as so many Cyphers. In like manner, you'll find, under the first and second Race of our Kings, solemn Conventions, which were called Parliaments, the principal Sinec of our Monarchy. But to these were summoned only the Princes, Great Lords, Nobles and Dignified Churchmen. Now in our Assemblies of the three Estates, not only the common People have a place with the Clergy and Nobility, but what is more, make the greatest and best Part. Whence is it then, that within some Centuries of Years the Commons have had a right to sit in our Conventions, where are debated the Affairs relating to the good of the Nation in general? This is what I shall account for." Then he shews the Reasons of the Common People or Third Estate, being first called to their Parliaments, and fixes the Original of it to the time of Philip le Bel, who began his Reign in 1286. These are the Testimonies of three very judicious Writers, thoroughly vers'd in the History of France. So far therefore is the ancient practice of France from being a proof of the Antiquity of the right of the Commons of England, that it rather serves to weaken the same.

After seeing the Arguments made use of For and Against the Antiquity of the Commons Right to sit in Parliament, it is doubtless very surprising that both Sides should be forc'd to dispute upon bare Conjectures, and the meaning of certain Terms in the Translations of Charters. One would think in a matter of this nature, each side should produce more substantial Arguments. However this be, the Reader may now form his Judgment upon what has been said, wherein I believe nothing material is omitted, of what has been alleged Pro and Con, tho' I have done it very compendiously.

But as the greatest part of the Arguments used by both Parties, are taken from the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, I shall make one remark, which ought to be considered before Judgment is given upon this dispute. And that is, the Authority of all these Charters is questioned by such as are most vers'd in the English History. The reason they allege for it, is, that in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, the use of Charters was unknown in England. When the King made a Grant to the Church, or to any private Person, he put them in possession by the delivery of a Green Turf, Bough, or the like. Formerly, says Ingulphus, Possession of Lands was given by bare Words without any Charters or other Writings. They only delivered to the Donor or Purchaser, a Helmet, Sword, Horn, Cup, sometimes a Spur, Bow, Arrow, &c. From this Custom it is inferred, that the Charters, alleged as granted by the Anglo-Saxon Kings, were all forg'd long after their Time. But as it may seem strange, there should be now so many Charters bearing date before there was any such thing in use, a matter of Fact is advanc'd, which, if true, shews the reason of such numbers being forg'd. 'Tis affirm'd, William the Conqueror finding great part of the Crown Lands to be alienated, particularly to the Monasteries, summoned the Abbots to appear at his Court, and produce the Titles by which they held their Estates. Some, who had nothing to plead but long possession, being dispossessed, because the King would allow no Title good, but what was in form, great numbers of Monks set about forging Charters, to which they gave all the appearance of Truth that was possible. In this manner they deceived that Prince, and his Norman Council, who were unacquainted with the History, Language, and Customs of the Saxons. Some produced their Charters in Latin, but these were rejected, on account of the improbability, the Saxon Kings should make use of a Language, little understood, and fill much less used in their Time. But whether this be true or not, 'tis however certain, several of those Charters, which are by some thought authentick, were forg'd, and that long after their date. At least it is very difficult to be convinc'd by good Arguments, that those from whence the Testimonies to decide the present question are taken, are so ancient as the time of the Anglo-Saxons.

From what has been said, this appears to be a very intricate case. Neither is there any likelihood of its being ever set in a clearer light. Almost all the ancient Monuments which might serve to unfold the Difficulties, were buried in the Ruins of the Monasteries, either before, or after the Norman Conquest (1).

(1) As there are no Saxon Monuments older than the Establishment of Christianity, and but little Light to be had from those that are after, records must be had to Inference from these few Truths that are known, in order to discover who were the Members of the Saxon Legislature. Now the most probable Hypothesis seems to be this. Power rolls from the Crown, and is the natural Consequence of Property or Estates, and in all Places where Tyranny does not prevail, the Persons who compose the Legislature, derive that Power from the Interest they have in some Lands, or else from some Diffusion of Rank and Order, which discriminate the Members of a Society. As therefore our Saxon Ancestors, in their own Country, did all personally meet for the enacting Laws; so after their coming into England, all to whom the Land was apportioned, personally assisted in the Saxon Parliaments, which were held at first during the Hierarchy in open Places, and the whole of meeting all the Commons were at a Right to give their Assent. Free-holders in those early Days. By the Feudal Law all Land-holders were obliged to attend at the Feudal Courts, and had a Right to give their Assent or Dissent to any Laws or Orders there proposed: Whence we yet retain the Exception of the Convention of the Estates. After the Union of the Kingdoms, when the Exercise of the Legislative Power in the Person of every Individual became impracticable, by Reason of their Remoteness and Number, some Change in the outward form was necessary in order to preserve the same Principles on the same Principles it was at first established; and as the whole Kingdom was divided into so many little Republics or Tythings, some Person out of every Tything or Burrough came to the Wittens-Gemot, to take care of the Concerns of the Society he belonged to: These were called Wittes, or Wittens, and were no other than the presiding Judge or Graf of every Tything, who was annually chosen, both in the Rural and Town Tythings. As therefore the Wittes, Bishops, and Abbots (who were the presiding Judges in the Communities both Ecclesiastical and Civil, that is the Wittens), were undoubtedly Members of the Wittens-Gemot, so it is reasonable to think, that the Wittes (who were the presiding Judges in the latter Community that were afterwards made) were so too. For it was but natural, when every Individual could not appear in Person, that the Delegate or Representative of each Community should be the Person, to whom they had by their own free Choice given the Precedency among themselves. Hence it is plain, that the Commons or Land-holders were ever a Part of the Legislature; because though the Wittes perhaps might not be Elective or annual Officers, after the Dissolution of the Hierarchy, as they were before, yet the Graf of the Tythings, who were Elective, being Members of the Saxon Wittens-Gemot, the Commons remained a constituent Part of the Saxon Legislature. Hence the Wittes (who were the same as our Farmers, only paying their Rent in Corn, Hay, &c. instead of Money) and also the Wittes (who had Lands assigned them by the King or great Men in recompense for their Service, and in lieu of Wages, and consequently were no more than Part of the Family of him they had their Lands of) were not Members of the Wittens-Gemot, except such Wittes who held their Lands of the Crown for their Service, which related to the Publick. (See p. 159, 171, note 6.) A Wittens-Gemot then was no other than an Assembly of all the presiding Judges of the Nation, Earls, Bishops, and Wittes, or the annual Magistrates of the Tythings and Burroughs, who represented all the Proprietors of Land in their respective Tythings. Thus Matters stood till the Conquest. King William I. having assumed the regal State as his own by Right, treated all that had opposed him as Rebels, and dispossessing them of their Lands, distributed them amongst his own Confederates, who held them of the Crown, by the Service of a determined Number of Soldiers, in Case of an Invasion or a Rebellion, and they inherited their own immediate Followers with some Portions of what was assigned to them, under reservation of such Service. These Lands were called Knight's Fee, (each Fee was about twenty pounds a Year then, which is equal to four or five hundred Pounds now.) As the Normans were much inferior to the English in Numbers, Power was to be the same as the Saxon Gemot, with this Difference, that it was to be Hereditary. Their Chiefs were called Barons, and their Estates Barons or Honours. The Conqueror, to undermine the Power of the Saxon Earls, which he could not safely destroy, diminished the Barons Estates in a manner from the Counties, and made them recognize no Superior but the Crown. By which means there was no difference between an Earl and a Baron, but only in Extent, the Power of both (which was exceeding great) being the same over their Vassals. As for the Burroughs, they were left in the same Condition as in the Saxon Times, and governed by annual Magistrates of their own choosing. The Conformity then between the Saxon Wittens-Gemot and Norman Parliaments stood thus: The Ecclesiasticks and Earls were the same in both; the Burroughs were represented in both by one of their own choosing, who was called Burgess instead of Wittes, probably because the Magistrate was not always chosen Representative; and as the Saxon Wittes or presiding Judges of the Tythings were Members of the Legislature, so were the Norman Chiefs or Barons, with this Difference only, that as the first had their Right by Election and for a Time, the others had theirs in Succession. And as the Saxon Wittes served for their Tything, so the Barons were intended by Law to serve for the Tenants of their Barons, which is the Reason why they were exempted from contributing to the Wages of the Knights of the Shire. Thus every Spot of Land was full represented; for as every Part was within some Tything in the Saxon Time, so in the Norman every Part of the whole Kingdom was within some Barony or some Burrough. Things continued upon this solid Foundation during the Reign of William Rufus and Henry I. But the Barons, who were so many petty Princes, being divided in the Civil War between Stephen, Matilda and Henry II. each Party treated those of the other side as Rebels, which brought the Possession of much Land to the contending Princes. And as each side had experienced the Power of the Barons over their Vassals, and having besides many Friends to remunerate, they split the Barons into smaller Tenancies in which all held immediately of the Crown. Hence arose the Diffusion of Fees of the old Feoffments and Fees of the New, and also of the great-Clief, who all held immediately of the Crown. These fees, being divided in the Civil War between Stephen, Matilda and Henry II. were so multiplied, that a very unequal Representation of the Kingdom arose, these lesser Barons having an equal Share in the Legislature with the most Potent. This Grievance being grown to the greatest Height, when King John was reduc'd to Reason, there was a Clause inserted in his Magna Charta, whereby all the greater Barons were to be jointly summoned to Parliament, and the lesser in general, by which means their last were excluded from sitting in Parliament singly and in Persons; but however the being summoned in General, gave them a Right to do this as a Community and by Representation; and as these lesser Barons were co-ordinate in Rank, the Right of representing them naturally devolved on such of their Body as the rest conferred it on. The Persons so chosen, were called from the Tenure of their Lands, and from their representing the respective Counties for which they served, Knights of the Shire. These were to be chosen at the County Courts, where none but the immediate Tenants of the Crown (the lesser Barons) came, and none other had Voice, till by the eighth of Henry VI. all Free-holders of forty Shillings per annum had a Right to Vote at the Election of Knights of the Shire. Thus we find both before and after the Conquest all Proprietors of Land had a Share in the Legislature. The Reader may see their Things more at large in St. Amand's Essay on the Legislative Power, &c.

III. The Authority of the WITTENAGEMOT, and the Affairs there debated.

THERE is no treating this Subject with any clearness, without examining three Questions, which are as warmly controverted as the former.

I. In whom was lodged the Legislative Power? Whether in the King, in the great Council, or in both together?

II. Whether the King had a Power to tax the People without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot?

III. Whether the General Assembly had a right to elect and depose the Kings?

I. In whom was lodged the Legislative Power.

They who most stretch the Prerogative Royal, pretend, the Legislative Power was wholly lodg'd in the King. In proof whereof, they urge the Terms made use of by the Saxon Kings in their Laws, by which they seem to declare themselves the sole Enactors, without giving room to believe, the General Assembly had any hand in the matter. To this it is answered, Though there is no mention in these Laws of the Consent of the great Council it does not follow, that their Concurrence was not necessary; no more than it can be inferred at this day from our saying the Statutes of King Charles I, or of King Charles II, that these Statutes were enacted without the Consent and Authority of Parliament. If we were literally to understand all the Expressions used in speaking of and to the King, we should doubtless ascribe greater Power to him than he is actually invested with. But to give more direct Proof, that the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot was necessary in making new Laws, several Testimonies are produced, shewing that the Kings acted nothing in this respect without the Consent of the Estates. Among the many that are alleged, I shall only chuse a few, and insert the substance of them.

In the title of the West-Saxon Laws published by King Ina, it is said, They were made with the Advice and Consent of the Bishops, Great Men, Earls, Wife-men, Seniors and People of the whole Kingdom.

Egbert says in one of his Charters; I Egbert, King of the West-Saxons, with the Permission and Consent (1) of our whole Nation, and unanimous Advice of all the Great Men, &c.

But seeing it may be objected, that this is a Charter and not a Law, the testimony of King Alfred is alleged, who, in the Title of his Laws, speaking as if he acted by his sole Authority, concludes with these Words; I Alfred, King of the West-Saxons, shewed these Laws to my Wife-men, and they said, they all lik'd, or, were pleas'd, they should be observed.

At the end of Athelstan's Laws we have these words: All these things were confirmed and ordained by a General-Assembly, or Synod, held at Grately, at which was present Archbishop Elfin, with all the great Men King Athelstan could assemble.

The Title of some other Laws made by this King runs in this manner: These are the Laws that were instituted by the Wife-men at Exeter.

Much the same Expression is prefixed before the Laws of Edgar and Ethelred II.

In a Charter of Canute the Great, we have these words: I Canute, King of the whole Island of Albion, and many other Nations, by the Advice and Decree of the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, and all my other faithful Subjects, have ordain'd, &c. This Authority is of the greater force, as Canute, ascending the Throne by right of Conquest, would not probably have sought the Concurrence of the Estates, had he not found it customary so to do.

In a word, it is pretended, if some of the Kings express themselves in such a manner as would induce one to believe they acted by their sole Authority in the Promulgation of the Laws, their Words are not to be taken in the literal Sense. The Reason is, these Expressions are explained and limited by those of some other Kings, who own'd, they acted in Concert with the Wittena-Gemot. Now there is no likelihood, Sovereign Princes would ever acknowledge their Power to be limited, if it was not so in reality.

If any one will insist upon this sort of Expressions, which seem to imply that the Kings make Laws without the Consent and Approbation of Parliament, it may by the same method be proved, that the King at this very day is invested with an absolute Power in this respect. And indeed, in some certain Acts, which are preferred to him by the Parliament, he says, that he wills and requires, though it is well known, his Will would be of no force, unless preceded by the Consent of the two Houses.

The same Reasonings and Reflections occur with regard to the second Question, or the Imposition of Taxes. If to the Saxon Kings seem in some Passages to levy Taxes by their own Authority, we are to understand it was not till after the previous Consent of the Estates, as we find upon others Occasions.

I shall not insist here on the third Question, concerning the electing and deposing of the Kings, because I intend to treat of these Points under the Article of the Succession.

IV. The Authority of the WITTENAGEMOT in Ecclesiastical Matters.

BEFORE the Anglo-Saxons embraced the Christian Religion, one of their fundamental Maxims (ascribed also by Tacitus to the ancient Germans) was, that all important affairs relating to the whole Nation, were brought to the General Assembly, where they were debated in common, that they might be settled with the unanimous consent of all that had a right to vote. 'Tis no wonder therefore that Religious Affairs were regulated in the Wittena-Gemot, as I have elsewhere observed, since they are of the greatest importance to Mankind. Accordingly, Edwin King of Northumberland, being desirous, after his conversion, to establish the Christian Religion in his Dominions, did not undertake it till he had consulted his Wife-men, that is, his Wittena-Gemot, as Bede relates it. The Maxim, that no Laws are binding, but what the whole Nation has consented to, has all along been looked upon in England as the Foundation of Liberty, and the Basis of Government.

Ecclesiastical Affairs may be ranked in two Classes. First, such as relate to the Clergy alone, as making a distinct Body from the Laity. These were left, as they now are, to the sole management of the Ecclesiastics, who held their Councils or Synods, where the Laity had nothing to do. Secondly, such as concerned the Body of the People, as Christians. These were regulated in the mixt Councils, consisting of the chief Men of the Clergy and the Nobility. Herein, the Rules of Equity were perfectly followed. It was not thought just to enact civil Laws, that were obligatory to the Clergy as Members of the State, without their Concurrence. On the other hand, it was deemed unreasonable that the Clergy should have a power of making Ecclesiastical Laws that were binding to the Laity, as Christians, without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot, or Representative of the Nation. Thus, in both these respects, the same Principles were followed, namely, that no Man was bound by any Laws, to which he had not given his Consent, either by himself or his Representative. Hence it is, that the Wittena-Gemots were for the most part Mixt Assemblies, where all important affairs, as well Ecclesiastical as Civil, were treated, and that these Assemblies had no less Authority in Spirituals than in Temporals.

To be convinced of this, we need only cast an Eye on the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons, where we find a perpetual mixture of Ecclesiastical and Civil Matters. I shall produce a few instances, which seem to be incontestable. In the Year 673 a Council was convened, where Theodore Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and ten Canons of the ancient general Councils were affirmed to, as hath been related in the History of the Church of that time. But this Assembly was not purely an Ecclesiastical Synod; for besides the Bishops, all the Kings and great Men of England were present, as an Historian relates it. And therefore 'twas a mixt Council, a mycel Synod, a real Wittena-Gemot. We must take care not to be led into Error by the words Council or Synod, which at present denote an Assembly of Ecclesiastics; whereas in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, these Terms were not understood in so limited a sense, but served to express all sorts of great Assemblies. Whoever carefully examines the nature of these ancient Assemblies, which, by Historians, are called Councils, he will find, they were mixt Conventions; since they were subscribed, approved and affirmed to, by the Kings, Princes, and great Men there present. In the reign of Edward the Elder, an Assembly was held, where the Articles of a Treaty were settled between that Prince and Guthrum, to whom Alfred had given East-Anglia, a State Affair, if ever there was any. And yet, in this very Assembly were enacted several Ecclesiastical Laws, which in the preamble are called Senatus-Consultis, because made by the Witan, that is, by the great Men of Wessex and East-Anglia. Among these Laws, besides several that were purely political, there are some with these titles, Of Apostates, Of the Punishment of rich as are in Orders, Of Incest, Of Fasts, &c. From whence it is manifest, these Political Assemblies made Laws concerning Religion. An Historian says, King Aethelstan convened a Council, in which many Laws both Ecclesiastical and Civil were enacted: Consequently this was not an Assembly of Churchmen, since it was never pretended, the Clergy had a power to make Secular Laws.

(1) Com Lawia & Consilio. Great Register of Alfred, before-mentioned.

(2) To the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, now in the Office of the King's Remembrancer of the Exchequer.

But this is not all. It is shown by several instances, that the Wittena-Gemot elected and deprived the Bishops. Wilfrid Bishop of York, whom I have had frequent occasion to mention, was elected by the two Kings of Northumberland, and the General Council of that Kingdom, as the Author of his Life relates. Erkenwald Bishop of London was elected with the Consent of King Sibba and the Advice of all the People. Wulfstan was made Bishop of Worcester in Curia, that is, in the great Assembly, which was called the Court, or the King's Court. Ingulfus, Abbot of Croyland speaks in this manner of the Elections of the Bishops and Abbots: For many Years, there was no Election absolutely free and canonical: But all Ecclesiastical Dignities were conferred by the King's Court, according to their good Pleasure (1)

As the Wittena-Gemot was concerned in the Election, so was it also in the Deprivation of Bishops. Of which I shall give the following instances. Brihtelm, Bishop of Dorchester, being promoted to the See of Canterbury, Edgar, who had a mind Dunstan should be Archbishop, sent Brihtelm to be sent back to his former Bishoprick. How this was done we are informed by Osbern the Monk, who wrote the Life of Dunstan: Within a few days after Brihtelm was made Archbishop, not thinking himself fit for so great a charge, he departed to the Church he had lately left, by the Command of the King and People. Another Historian relates this matter in the manner following: Edgar made Brihtelm defend the same way he was raised: For a Council being convened for this very purpose, he objected several Articles against Brihtelm, and by the Order and Consent of his Barons, sent him back to the Cure of his former Church of Dorchester. Brihtelm therefore was both elected and deprived by the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot. In the Reign of Edouard the Confessor, Robert Archbishop of Canterbury was removed from his See by a Decree of the Wittena-Gemot, and Stigand being elected in his place, the Papal power could neither procure this Election to be annulled, as long as the Dominion of the Saxons lasted, nor prevent the Englsh from acknowledging Stigand as lawful Archbishop, tho' suspended by the Pope.

These instances show, the Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel-Synod was an Ecclesiastical and Political Assembly at the same time, and that all Affairs relating to the Church and State were indifferently treated there. 'Twas not till long after, when the Papal Authority was grown to a great height, under the Norman and Angewin Kings, that the Clergy claimed the Privilege of debating apart all matters any ways relating to Religion, in Ecclesiastical Assemblies or Synods.

It is time now to speak of the King in particular, his Prerogatives, Revenues, and Succession to the Crown.

Of the KING.

I Have already observed in another place, that the Saxon Government in Germany was Aristocratical, and that they had only a General who commanded their Armies in time of War. The Saxon Leaders themselves erected their several Conquests in Great-Britain into Kingdoms, and assumed the title of King. But with this new title, they were however considered at first by their Subjects upon the same Foot only with their Governors in Germany, whose power was far from being Despotic. Nevertheless, some pretend, the right of Conquest gave these first Kings an unlimited power, from whence it would follow, that the Privileges of the Englsh Subjects were either Concessions of the Kings, or Usurpations of the People. This Argument, drawn from the Right of Conquest, might have some weight if the Privileges of the Britons, who were subdued, was the point in question. But the Business in hand is the Privileges of the Saxons or Englsh, who were themselves the Conquerors, and over whom Conquest gave no power to their Kings. I say, we are to consider here the Saxons only, since there remained in the Country, they became Masters of, but very few Britons, who were looked upon but as so many Slaves. As therefore the Anglo-Saxons can't be said to lose their Rights by making Conquests, they are to be considered upon the same foot as in Germany, that is, as a free People under the conduct of a Head or Chief, whose power was limited by Law.

There is no doubt, that in England, as in all other Kingdoms, the Royal Authority by degrees exceeded the Bounds at first prescribed. But, the History of the Anglo-Saxons being very imperfect, there is no giving a particular Account of this matter. I must therefore content my self with showing in general some of the chief Prerogatives enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxon Kings during their Dominion, which lasted above 600 Years, without being able so much as to observe the alterations that may have been in this respect in so long an Interval.

One of the most considerable of the King's Prerogatives was the power of appointing the Earls, Viscounts, Judges, and other Officers as well Civil as Military. Some however assert, that the military Post of the Dukes or Holds of each County were conferred by the Shire-Gemot. Very probably, it was in the King's power to change these Officers according to his pleasure, of which we meet with several instances in History. But after all, it can't be positively affirmed, because when such an Officer is found to be turned out by the King, it does not necessarily follow, it was done without the Consent or previous Sentence of the Wittena-Gemot (2).

Another great Prerogative of the Crown, was that the Laws made in the Wittena-Gemot were of no force without the Assent of the King, to whom was committed the Executive Power.

The King had also power to pardon Malefactors. But as Offences may be considered in a double View, namely, as they concern the publick, or as being prejudicial to some private Person, the King could only pardon them in the first respect. The King's pardon prevented not the offended Party from demanding satisfaction for the wrongs he had received. This satisfaction was called in Saxon, Wergeld, that is, a Reparation, made to the injured party or his friends and relations. Hence doubtless came the Custom in England at this day, of the Wife's or Son's appealing in Cases of Murders. For the same reason also this Clause is usually inserted in Pardons. Ita tamen ut stet recto in curia nostrâ, si quis versus eum loqui voluerit.

The power of coining Money was another of the King's Prerogatives, which he could grant by Charter to whom he pleased, as we find several of the Saxon Kings granted the same to their Archbishops and others. But the King had not the power of enhancing or debasing the Coin. The Mirror of Justices recites it as an old Law, that the King could not change the Money, or make other Coin than of Silver, without the Consent of all the Counties.

It is uncertain, whether it was absolutely in the Power of the Saxon Kings, to make War or Peace, without the Consent of the Wittena-Gemot. It is true indeed, the Power of making War was, as it is now, of little consequence; since the King not being able to raise Money without the Consent of the Estates, could not bear the expence, if his Subjects refused to assist him. But as for making Peace, the case is quite different, since on a good or bad Peace, depends the welfare of a whole Kingdom, as hath been too often experienc'd. And therefore, these two Prerogatives, which are commonly joined together, widely differ in their Consequences. It lies in the People's Breast to contribute to the Wars the King is pleased to undertake of his own accord, and, by refusing their Concurrence, have it in their Power to prevent the mischiefs that an unjust or unnecessary War may occasion. But how shall they hinder the effects of a pernicious Peace, concluded without their Knowledge?

The King's Revenues were of three sorts. The first consisted in certain things, furnished him by the State, for the maintenance of his Household, as Corn, Hay, Cattle and the like, which were usually paid in kind. The second Branch was the produce of certain Demesnes or Lands annexed to the Crown, and designed to serve for publick Uses, it not being in the Power of the King to grant any part of them, nor even to the Church, without the Consent of the Estates. Hence it is that we find the ancient Charters of the Saxon Kings to the Churches or Monasteries, confirmed by the principal Members of the General Assembly, who signed them in this manner. I. N.--- have subscripsi, confirmavi, approbavi, corroboravi, or other the like Expressions. It cannot be doubted

The King's Revenues.

1) After which the Person so elected being first consecrated, the King invested him with the Temporalities, by the Delivery Baculi, & Annuli, as may be seen in the same Author.

2) As the Earls in these Days held their Estates of the Community, and not of the King, there is no doubt but they were both made and turned out with the Consent of the Great Council. But as a Body Politick cannot act itself, when any particular Act is to be done, the Execution thereof is always done by the King as Lord or Head of the great Signory of the Kingdom. And therefore when he is said to make or put out an Earl, it is not in the Wittena-Gemot it always to be supposed. For Federal Earls (and all were so in those Days) could not be made without the Consent of the Community.

but this Branch of the King's Revenue was applied to public uses, when it is considered, that so late as the end of the XIVth Century, in the Reign of Richard II, the Parliament order'd, that for the future the Revenues of the King's Demesnes should go towards defraying the charge of the Wars he should be engaged in. The third Branch consisted, as at this day, of certain Taxes or Impôts, which were laid from time to time on the People upon urgent occasions, by the Authority of the Wittena-Gemst.

We don't find, during the Heptarchy, the Kings affected any swelling Titles, as some did afterwards. They were all contented with the title of King of their respective Kingdoms; and the Prince who was elected Monarch did not imagine he had a Right to distinguish himself upon that account. Egbert himself, after acquiring the Sovereignty of the Seven Kingdoms, made no alteration in his usual Title of King of the West-Saxons. Attilstan was the first that filled himself, Imperator. Edmund was satisfied with, Rex totius Angliæ. Edgar called himself, King of the whole Island of Albion. Canute the Great assumed the Title of King of Albion and many other Nations. Some affected a Greek Title, as Edgar, who filled himself, Totius Angliæ Basileus.

was of the Kings.

As for the Coronation of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, there was no time fixed for this Ceremony, either during the Heptarchy, or after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Each was crowned when he thought it most convenient. Before Egbert, the Kings of Kent were crowned by the Archbishops of Canterbury; The Kings of Northumberland, by the Archbishops of York; and the rest commonly by the Bishop of their Capital. After Egbert united the Heptarchy, or at least, four of the Kingdoms into one, the Archbishop of Canterbury claimed the Privilege of crowning the Kings; but this pretension was founded only on a Custom, which though usual, was not however necessary. And indeed, we find after the Union, several Kings were crowned by the Archbishops of York, or even by other Bishops. Some say, Harold put the Crown on his own Head himself. Swegen, the first Danish King, was not crowned at all, and yet was owned for King. Edgar reigned several Years in Wessex before he was solemnly crowned. Edward the Confessor's Coronation was not performed till six Months after he was proclaimed. This neglect is a clear evidence, this Ceremony was not then deemed absolutely necessary. And therefore they who date the beginnings of the Reigns from the Coronation-days, only breed confusion in Chronology, from a mistaken nicety. This way of reckoning is so much the more liable to Error, as there were several Kings who repeated the Solemnity of their Coronation several times; for instance, Cædric first King of Wessex. This Ceremony was not at first performed in a Church, but in the open Air. Thus it is expressly said by the Historians, that Attilstan, Edmund and Edred were crowned in an open Place (1).

the Crown.

As for the Form of the Crown, it was not over-curious, at least it was not uniform, as may be seen from many Impressions of Heads of the Saxon Kings, given us by Camden and Spelman (2). Some have only a Diadem of Pearls. Others a Coronet with six Rays or Points, with Flower de Luces between, or Pearls upon them. Edward the Confessor has an Imperial Crown. This variety shows, that in England as well as in other places, there was not then any settled Form for the Crowns, but that each Prince pleased his own fancy (3).

The SUCCESSION to the CROWN in the Time of the ANGLO- SAXONS.

Three Opinions concerning the Succession.

THERE are three different Opinions upon this Subject. The first is, that the Crown was all along Hereditary, as well during the Heptarchy as afterwards. The second, that the Crown was always Elective, and in the disposal of the People; so that, although the Son succeeded the Father, it was however by Election. The third, that the Crown was neither Hereditary nor Elective, but the Kings had power to give it by Will to any one of their Sons or Relations, whom they thought most worthy. But how confidently forever each asserts his Opinion, it is easily perceived that to establish any one of the three, is more difficult than to combat the other two. This difficulty arises from our imperfect Knowledge of the History of the Anglo-Saxons, and perhaps from their not proceeding regularly themselves in this matter. The Arguments used by each Party in defence of his own, and against the Opinions of his Adversaries, are as follow.

The first say, we need only run over the History of the Heptarchy, to be convinced that in each of the seven Kingdoms, the Crown remained in the Family of the first Kings, as long as there were any Male Heirs in being. And that after the Union of the seven Kingdoms, there was no alteration in this respect, the Race of Egbert sitting on the Throne down to Edward the Confessor. 'Tis true indeed, the Danish Kings are to be excepted; but as they intruded themselves by force of Arms, nothing can be inferred from thence against the Crown's being Hereditary.

They who believe the Crown was Elective, ground their Opinion upon the same History, by showing that the Lineal Succession from Father to Son was not always preserved. And indeed, they demonstrate, by undeniable Proofs, that the King's Brother often succeeded before the King's Sons, and distant Branches of the Royal Family were preferred before the nearest; whence they conclude, this was occasioned by the right of Election, residing in the People. They further add, that although the Son succeeded the Father, sometimes even for several Generations, it does not necessarily follow, that the Crown was Hereditary, as the Imperial Crown of Germany can't be said to be so, though it has now continued two hundred and fifty years in the House of Austria. To support their Opinion concerning the Right of Election, they alledge several Passages of the Historians, who, speaking of the Kings that succeeded their Fathers, use this Expression, electus est in Regem, He was elected King.

To this the others reply, That indeed upon certain occasions, Fraud and Violence took place: But however, the Lineal Succession, tho' broken for some time, preserved its Rights, since quickly after we find things were restored to their former State. I think it needless to produce the Instances alledged by both Parties. Besides their having been related in the History, the Reader may easily refresh his Memory by casting his Eye on the Genealogical Tables of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, where the Order of the Succession is set down. As for the Expression of the Historians, He was elected, they say, these Words are to be found only in Authors who wrote long after, and made use of them without considering the Consequences, as not treating expressly of this matter. Besides, 'tis pretended, these Authors have not rightly translated the original Terms in the Saxon Annals, Feng to Rices, which properly signifies, Regnum Capessit, he took upon him the Kingdom.

They who are of the third Opinion, alledge against the first, that the Crown was not therefore Hereditary, because it continued long in one Family, as appears from the example of the House of Austria. To the second they object, that after proving the Crown not to be Hereditary, their Inference, that it was therefore Elective, is not just, for there is another way, which excluded the other two, namely, the Kings dispos'd of the Crown as they thought fit. To confirm their Opinion, they alledge the example of France, where they pretend, the Kings, even as low down as some of the second Race (4), enjoyed the Privilege of disposing of their Dominions, which occasioned the so frequent division of that Kingdom. For, say they, had it been the eldest Son's Right always to succeed his Father, 'tis inconceivable that the younger Brothers should so frequently rise in Arms to compel their elder to share the Kingdom with them. On the other hand, they observe, if the Crown of France had been Elective, 'tis not likely the French would have always elected as many Sovereigns, as the former Kings had left Sons. From all which they conclude that the frequent Partitions during the first and second Race, were solely owing to the testamentary disposition of the Kings. Agreeable to this, is, what Mexart says, speaking of Aribert King Dagobert's Brother. His words are: But as Aribert was young, and the King his Father perhaps had left him no Part of the Kingdom in his Will, it was to no purpose that Bernulf, his Mother's Brother, endeavoured to persuade the Neutrals to rise in his Favour. This Custom, established among the French from the beginning of their Monarchy, as it is pretended to be proved, is doubtless a strong Presumption that the Anglo-Saxons did the like, seeing they lived at the same time, and came as well as the French from Germany, in the same

(1) They were crowned in the Market Place of Kings-ton upon Thames.

(2) These Impressions were taken from old Saxon Coins.

(3) Yves looks upon it as a Fiction in them who will needs have it that Alfred was crowned with a Crown wrought with Flower de Luces, because such a Crown was kept among the Regalia at Weyminster before our late Civil Wars. (See Note (9) p. 95.) The Inscription, He-flo, Rex, being in all probability put on the Box wherein it was kept by some Monk of after-Times, to give the greater Air of Antiquity to the Crown.

(4) The Crown of France has been enjoyed by three Royal Families: First, the Merovingians, begun by Pharamond and ended in Childeric III. twenty one Kings. Second, the Carolingians, from Charles Martel to Lewis V, fourteen Kings: Third, begun in Hugh Capet, of which there have been thirty one Kings.

Century. But if it be objected, there are no Instances to be found then in England of the like Partitions, in the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, it is replied, there were some, tho' not many. The Kings of the Heptarchy, who were but petty Princes in comparison of the Kings of France, took care not to divide their Dominions, otherwise there would quickly have been as many Sovereigns as Cities. However there were some that did so: For Instance, Penda King of Mercia, placed in his Life-time, his eldest Son Peda on the Throne of Leicester, having erected that City, and the adjoining Country into a Kingdom. Ethelred his Son and Successor, gave his Brother Merevald part of his Dominions, with the Title of King of Hereford, which little Kingdom was left by Merevald, to his Brother Mercelm. Offa King of Northumberland, gave the Kingdom of Deira to Alfred his Natural Son, as Ethelwulf did the Kingdom of Kent in his Life-time to Aethelstan. For a further Confirmation of this Opinion, Ethelwulf's Will is produced, who disposed of his Dominions in so absolute a manner, that his four Sons were to succeed one after another, whether the first had Children or not; which was accordingly done. These are the Arguments alleged in Proof of the third Opinion; but they have not regained unanswered.

It is said first, those Princes, who were crowned in their Father's Life-time, were properly but so many Viceroys: and they, who, contrary to the established order, succeeded by virtue of a Will, were admitted to the Throne by the Authority, or at least, not without the Consent of the Estates, which implies a Right of Election in the Subjects.

But it is more difficult to answer the Arguments drawn from the Proceedings of Canute the Great, who towards the latter end of his Life, very carefully avoided every thing that might make the English apprehensive of his intending to alter the form of Government. 'Tis well known, this Prince annulled his Marriage Articles with Emma of Normandy, by making his Will, and appointing Harold his Successor, instead of Hardicanute, who by the Marriage-Contract was Heir to the Crown. This seems to demonstrate, the King was entirely free to chuse his Successor. It is true, after his death disputes arose; but however that be, it appears at least, this Prince thought he might dispose of the Crown by Will. The same thing may be said of Edward the Confessor. Whether this Prince made a Will in favour of the Duke of Normandy, or designed it only, or even gave him but a bare verbal Promise, it may be inferred from thence, that he imagined he had a Right to settle the Succession that way.

These are the Reasons alleged to support the three Opinions, in this important Inquiry. I call it important with regard to those who really think it so. For my part, I can hardly be persuaded there is any occasion to recur to the Customs of the Anglo-Saxons, to establish those that are to be followed at this day.

It would not, perhaps, be impossible to form an Idea of the Anglo-Saxon Government, with regard to the Succession, by uniting the three foregoing Opinions. It seems to me that from all the reasons alleged, it may be inferred in favour of the first, that the Crown was Hereditary in the Family of the Saxon Kings, as well during the Heptarchy, as after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. In favour of the second, it may be granted, that upon extraordinary occasions, the Wittena-Gemot, considering it self as Supreme Legislator, assumed an absolute Authority, and went beyond the usual Bounds. With the third it may be said, the Kings had power of nominating their Successor, provided, when they deviated from the common Practice, which was to prefer the next in Blood, they took care to have their Choice confirmed by the Great Council of the Kingdom. This is the Reason why those Kings who were not the next in Blood, never failed of making use of the Consent of the Estates, thereby to rectify the Irregularity of their accession to the Throne. This we see also in Alfred's Will, at the end of his Life published by Spelman (1). By uniting thus the three Opinions, the Rules for the Succession in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, will be found to be much the same with those at present. It is certain, the Crown is Hereditary. But however, this prevents not the Parliament, in extraordinary cases, from claiming a Power to over-rule Custom, and settle the Succession on a more distant, in prejudice of a nearer Relation. Of this the History of England since the Conquest affords many Instances and Precedents, without insisting on those of our own Times. If it is objected, all do not allow the King and Parliament to have a right to such a Power; it may be replied, till the contrary is determined by a lawful Authority, it is reasonable to presume, this Power is rightfully lodged in the Nation. According to these Principles, they, who labour to prove, the Crown was Elective in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, don't seem to do much in favour of the Parliament, which claims a Power to alter the Succession but on certain occasions. On the other hand, they, who undertake to prove, the Crown was Hereditary at that time, do no great prejudice to the Authority assumed by this August Body only in extraordinary Cases. In fine, as they, who pretend to prove, the Saxon Kings had an absolute Power to dispose of the Crown, probably do not mean that the present Kings have the same Power, they seem to me to debate a Question of more Curiosity than Importance.

Of the LAWS of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

DURING the Heptarchy, there was no Laws Secundum its own in particular. It is very likely however, these Laws were not very different, since the Inhabitants of the seven Kingdoms had the same original. But there is nothing certain in this matter. The first Laws, we have any Knowledge of, are those published by Ethelbert King of Kent about the time of the Conversion of the Saxons. We have likewise Ina's King of Wessex, and Offa's King of Mercia; and there is no doubt but some of the other Kings made Laws, though they are not transmitted to us.

After the Union of the seven Kingdoms, Egbert's Successors explained or extended the Laws already established, or made new ones. The most famous are those of Alfred Lawes of the Great, taken, as he himself says, from the best he could find, and particularly from Ina's and Offa's above-mentioned. Edgar, with such Additions and Emendations as he thought fit, caused the Laws of Alfred to be strictly observed. But it must be remembered, when England was divided into two Kingdoms, namely, Wessex and Mercia, each had their Laws apart, and Canute the Great caused those that were introduced by the Danes into Northumberland and East-Anglia, to be approved by the General Assembly. There were therefore in England three sorts of Laws, the West-Saxon, Mercian and Danish, till Edward the Confessor united them all into one Body (2). As I proposed only to give a general Notion of the Government of the Anglo-Saxons, my design is not to enter into a particular Account of all these Laws. I shall content my self with relating some Circumstances, which seem to me to merit the Curiosity of such as are Strangers to the English Constitution, and are intelligible to all the World.

The Laws were divided into Civil and Criminal. The first concerned the Lands or Estates, which were of two sorts, Boecland and Socland. Boecland was much of the same Nature with the Lands we call Allodial (3). It was Free and Hereditary, and might be alienated by the Owner, though held in Fee of a superior Lord. This was properly what is elsewhere called, Feudum honoratum. This sort of Land was possessed by the Nobles and most considerable among the People. Socland was possessed by the Ceorls, and held of the Lord by payment of a certain annual Rent, and performance of certain personal Services. This sort of Land is the same with what is called

(1) Ego Alfridus---totius West-Saxonie Nobilitatis Consensu peritus & Alfredus, Occidentaliun Saxonum Rex, &c. Whence it is manifest, that though he was nominated in his Father's Will to succeed his Brothers, yet he was Elected or at least Confirmed by the Great Council in the Possession of the Crown, & bequeathed to him by his Father. And therefore it is plain, that though the King had the Power to dispose of the Crown by Will, yet it could not be done without the Consent and Assent of the Estates.

(2) See what Bishop Newton says of this threelord Distinction of the Law in p. 126. Note (3). To which may be added here the Opinion of Spelman. 'Our Saxons, though divided into many Kingdoms, yet were they all one in Effect, in Manners, Laws and Language; so that the breaking of their Government into many Kingdoms, or the re-uniting of their Kingdoms into a Monarchy, wrought little or no change amongst their touching Laws. For though we talk of the West-Saxon-Laws, Mercian-Laws, and Dane-Laws, whereby the several Parts of England were governed; yet they all had an Uniformity in Substance, differing rather in their Moulds than in their Canon; that is, in the Quantity of Fines and Amercements, than in the Corps and Form of Justice. Reign. Spel. p. 49.

(3) The Northern Nations neither incorporating nor divorcing the Inhabitants in their Conquests, divided the Land into three Parts; one they left to the old Possessors, the other two they took themselves. These Divisions are called by the Writers of these Ages, Sorta Gothicæ, and Sorta Romanæ, in from the negative Particle A and Land, which signifies in Teutonic, Persons linked by feudal Tenures, who only had a Share in the Legislature. So that Allodial Lands were such as were not subject to feudal Duties; yet before Teutons were appalled, the Term Allodial was a Term of Reproach, as it denominated the Vanquished from the Victors. Though their Land was at first free from all Service, many Possessors for their better security yet their Possession, placed themselves under such Superstition, and then came in use the Phrase tenere in Allodo, frequent enough in our Domesday Book, and in foreign Writers; for all Protection and Subjection was supposed then to be founded on Tenure. St. Asgard. p. 26, 27.

a Rural Fief. I don't think it necessary to enquire here into the original of Pees, which would lead me too far, and besides would contain nothing peculiar to England. I shall only say, in Selden's opinion, Pees derive their origin from the North, and from thence passed into Germany, Italy, France, Spain, England, where the Northern Nations settled. It would also be too long a digression from my purpose, to recite all the Laws, concerning the possession of the two sorts of Lands before-mentioned, especially as these things are understood by few People. 'Tis sufficient to have given a general Idea of them, and therefore I shall proceed to what is much more intelligible, the Criminal Laws.

By the regulations of Alfred the Great, all Persons accused of any Crime were to be tried by their Peers. This Privilege, which the English have preserved to this day, is one of the greatest a Nation can enjoy. It screens the small from the Oppression of the great, and from the Caprice or Passion of the King himself, of which there have been several instances in England. But as the Term Peers may not be rightly understood by many Readers, it will be proper briefly to explain the meaning of the Word. It is to be observed, that in England there are but two Degrees or Orders of Men, namely, the Peers of the Realm, and the Commons. Dukes, Marquises, Earls, Viscounts, Barons, Archbishops and Bishops, are Peers of the Realm, and Peers among themselves; in so much that the lowest of the Barons is the Peer of the highest Duke. All the rest of the People are ranked with the Commons. So that in this respect, the meanest Artificer is Peer of all below the rank of a Baron. When therefore it is said, every one is tried by his Peers; the meaning is, the Peers of the Realm are judged by those of their own Order, that is, by the other Lords; who, like them, are Peers of the Realm. In the same manner, one of the Commonalty is tried by such as are of the order of the Commons, who, in this respect are his Peers or Equals, how much soever they may differ with regard to Birth or Fortune. There is however this difference between the Peers of the Realm and the Commons; every Peer of the Realm has a right to vote at the Trial of another Peer, whereas the Commons are tried but by twelve Persons of their Order, whose Verdict concerns only Fact. These twelve Persons after hearing the public Examination of the Witnesses for and against the Party accused, only bring him in Guilty or not Guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge; after which, the Judge condemns or acquits him according to Law. Such is the Privilege enjoyed by the English ever since the Time of King Alfred. And perhaps this Prince only revived and rectified a Custom established by the Saxons Time out of Mind (1).

Meaning of the Word Peers.

When the Crime was not clearly proved, or sufficient Evidence found to condemn, or acquit the Accused, two Methods were used, by which, it was thought, the Truth might be discovered. The first was the Oath of the Party accused, to purge himself of the Crime he was charged with. But his single Oath was not sufficient: He was to bring with him a certain Number of Persons who were [and still are] called Compurgators, who also swore to his Innocence.

Meaning of discovering the Truth, By Oath.

The second Method was by Ordeal (2), that is, Trial by Fire or Water. The Trial by Fire was performed two ways. The Person accused held in his hand a red-hot piece of Iron of one, two, or three Pounds weight, according to his Crime, or according to the Evidence against him; or else he was made to walk barefoot and blindfold, over nine red-hot Plow-shares placed at a stated distance. If he had the good fortune to come off unhurt, he was declared Innocent: But in case he was burnt, he was pronounced Guilty. Persons of Quality were tried by Fire-Ordeal, of which Emma, Mother to Edward the Confessor, is an Instance. Trial by Water-Ordeal was made either by Cold or by Scalding Water. Peasants and Slaves were put upon this Trial. In the Trial by cold Water, the Party suspected had his hands and feet tied together, and was thrown into a Pond or River. If he sunk, he was adjudged Innocent, but if he floated on the Surface of the Water, he was declared guilty (3). When the King Water was the Test, the Person accused was to plunge his Arm into it as far as the Wrist, and sometimes up to the Elbow. The Trial by cold Water was introduced by Lewis le Debonnaire, and by Pope Eugenius II, instead of an Oath, which was but too often the occasion of the guilty Persons perjurying themselves; and the English followed their Example.

The third way of Trial was by single Combat. When the Evidences of the Accusation were not strong, the Party was allowed to vindicate his Innocence by challenging his Accuser to single Combat. If a Woman was accused, she had the Privilege of substituting one in her room, who was called her Champion. This Custom was not introduced into England till towards the end of the Empire of the Saxons: But it continued a long time in being.

A fourth way of Trial was by giving the Party suspected a bit of Bread or Cheese (4), consecrated with abundance of Ceremonies. If he was guilty, it was believed the Bread or the Cheese would stick in his Throat and choke him; but if innocent, he would readily swallow it. Part of the Imprecation used upon delivering him the Bread, (after receiving the Communion) was as follows: May this Bread for this Cheese which is given him in order to bring the Truth to light, stick in his Throat and find no Passage, if he is guilty (5). But if innocent of the Crime laid to his Charge, may he easily swallow this Bread [or this Cheese] consecrated in thy Name, to the end all may know, &c. This way of Trial was evidently in Imitation of the Waters of Jealousy among the Jews. They who forged the Circumstances of Earl Godwin's death, as related in the reign of King Edward, had probably an Eye to this Custom. This consecrated Bread or Cheese was called Corfused from the word Snide or Sniden, which signifies to cut a bit off; and Corse, that is, Curse, because 'twas believed, it brought a Curse on the guilty Person. The Church not only approved of all these ways of Trial, but prescribed the Ceremonies and Form of Prayers to be used on these occasions, and even consented that the Bishops and Priests should officiate. There is a Law of Canute the Great concerning the Corfused in this Effect: If a Man be accused of murder, or of having any hand in it, let him clear himself to the Relations and Friends of the murdered Person, and if necessary, let him be put to the Trial of the Corfused. It is very wonderful, the Saxons and other Nations, among whom these Trials were common, could for so long together fancy, they were infallible ways of discovering the Truth. On the contrary, one must needs think, the numberless Experiments, they must needs have had, of their uncertainty, should have opened their Eyes and made them see their Error.

Numb. VI.

When the Charge was fully proved, the Law ordained several Sorts of Punishments, according to the Quality of the Offence. The greatest part whereof consisted in Fines, which the guilty Person was condemned to pay to the injured Party, to the King, to the Earl or to his Lord. There were some Crimes however, that were looked upon as Capital and punished with Death. Such were Treason against the King, or Lord, wilful Murder and Theft. Though Treason was Death by the Laws, yet the guilty Person had the Liberty of redeeming his Life by paying the Valuation of the King's or Lord's Head: I shall explain this hereafter. Coining of Money was not originally a capital Crime; but the Consequences made the Penalty very great. The first Law that made it Death was in the Reign of Ethelred II. though it was left in the King's Power to commute the Punishment for a Fine. As for Murder, the Laws distinguished killing a Man in a sudden and unforeseen Quarrel, from wilful and premeditated Murder. The Punishment of the former was only Pecuniary, the latter was Death. This Distinction still subsists in the Laws of England, where the first is called, Man-slaughter; and the other, Murder. Theft or Robbery was not till after some Time punished.

Murder and Man-slaughter.

(1) Sir William Temple says, Traces are not wanting of this Custom, from the very Institutions of Odin the first Leader of the Aftatic Gulls or Gens into Europe, and Founder of that mighty Kingdom round the Baltic Sea, from whence all the Gothic Governments in their North-West Parts of the World were derived. This is the Reason that it is known to have been as ancient in Sweden as any Records, or Traditions of that Kingdom, and still remain in some Provinces. The Normans introduced the Terms of Jury and Verdict as well as many other Law Terms; but the Trials by Twelve Men are expressly mentioned in Alfred's and Ethelred the First's Laws.

(2) Some in his Glossary gives this Word from Ors, a Private, a d Dal, that is, Distinguish or Difference, as much as to say, an impartial Judgment, which is very Distinguish.

(3) Rapa, a mistle, says Nithing was a Sign of Guilty, and Swimming of Innocence. The Custom among the Country People of trying Witches, by throwing them into the Water with their Thumbs and Toes tied together, is perhaps a Relict of Water-Ordeal. These Trials were made with great Solemnity, and were always managed by the Clergy. The Person accused was obliged to swim, to his Innocence, and sometimes, especially in Orders, to recite the Sacrament. After the Charge was legally brought in, the Person-accused was to spend three Days in Fasting and Prayer. At the Day of Trial, which in the F-Ordeal was made in the Church, the Priest in his Habit took up the Iron which lay before the Altar, and repeating the Hymn of the Three Communion, presented the Fire: Then, using some Forms of Benediction over the Fire and Iron, he spanked the Iron with Holy Water, and made the Sign of the Cross in the Name of the Trinity. Which done, the Party accused passed through the Fire. The Ceremony of the F-Ordeal was much the same. But when the Trial was by cold Water, the three Days Fast and other Circumstances being premised, the Person accused was made a Drudge of Holy Water, to which the Priest added an Imprecation, in case he was Guilty: Then the Water into which he was to be thrown had a sort of exorcising Form of Prayer read over it: All these ways of Trial continued long after the Conquest. The first public Discontinuance being in the Statute in the third Year of Henry III.

(4) He was to take an Oath of clearing himself.

(5) This was a very old saying: My sin has torn Pale, his Limbs be convulsed, and an horrible Alarion appear in his subtle Body.

able by death, and even the first Laws that made it so, permitted the Thief to redeem his Head with a sum of Money.

Fines for other Crimes. All other Offences were punished only by Mulfes or Fines, till the Reign of Canute the Great, who ordered in the case of Adultery, that a Woman should have her Nose and Ears cut off, and the Man be banished the Realm. These Fines were not left to the Will of the Judge, but were settled by Law, according to the Quality of the injured Party, from the King to the Peasant; and with regard to the Malefactors, from the Ealdorman to the Slave. Upon some certain occasions, they who had incurred the Penalty of Death, might buy off their Punishment by giving the King part of their Estates. But this seldom happened, except where the Quality, or Power of the guilty Party, rendered the execution of the Laws difficult or dangerous. We have a remarkable instance of this in the Trial of Earl Godwin in the Reign of Edward the Confessor. This Lord, as was said in the Life of King Edward, entering the Thames with a Fleet, the King was forced to reform him to his Honours. But having been banished by the Witten-Gemot, he was to be recalled by the same Authority. It was necessary therefore to use some Formality, which should screen him from all future enquiry; and the method taken was this. The Earl being come to London, where the great Council was assembled, the King himself turned his Accuser, and said, "Thou Traytor Godwin, I charge thee with the death of Afred my Brother, whom thou hast traitorously murdered." "My Lord (answered the Earl) saving the Reverence I owe you, I have neither murdered, nor betray'd your Brother, and am ready to refer my self to the Judgment of your Court." Upon which the Witnesses were produc'd and examined, and then Leofric Duke of Mercia spoke thus: "It seems evident to me that Prince Alfred was put to death by the Advice of Earl Godwin. But as he is one of the greatest Lords in the Kingdom, it is my opinion, that twelve of us Earls, who are his Relations and Friends, should take as much Gold as we can carry in our hands, and humbly presenting it to the King, supplicate for his Pardon and Restoration to his Honours, upon his taking the Oath of Allegiance." This being agreed to, twelve of the Lords offered a certain sum to the King, which he accepting, pardoned the Earl. But this whole Proceeding was all a Farce. Godwin knew before-hand how matters would go, otherwise he would never have ventured to stand a Trial.

Before I conclude this Head, it will be proper to remark, that several, upon reading the Saxon Laws, misperceptibly imagine, the Murder, as well of the King, as of any other Subject, was punishable only by Fine. But this mistake proceeds purely from not attending to the fore-mentioned distinction between wilful Murder and Man-slaughter. Of this last, we are to understand Atelstan's Law (1), which settles the Fines to be paid for the killing any Person from the King to the Slave.

The Customs and Manners of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

THE Anglo-Saxons brought with them from Germany their own Country's Virtues and Vices, and transmitted them to their Posterity. Their Valour, to which they were indebted for their Conquests, as well in England as Germany, was what they valued themselves most upon. They were bred up to Arms from their Infancy, and War may be said to be their only Profession. They came to their General Assemblies arm'd; and shew'd their Approbation of what was propos'd by striking their Javelins one against another. Their usual Arms were the Sword, Club, Battle-Ax, or Bill, and Javelin. As they had no Bows and Arrows, their Battles were the more bloody. After darting their Javelins, they came to close Fight, where their dexterity in handling their Arms, gave them a great advantage. Indeed, towards the end of their Empire, they were frequently worsted by the Danes, and at length vanquished by the Normans. But where is the Nation, how famous soever for Bravery, that has not experienc'd the like turns of Fortune? Among the Saxons, a Man without Courage was looked upon with the utmost Contempt. This high Conceit of martial Valour was the cause of their being very hardly reconciled after a quarrel. Every one dreading the name of Coward, should he make the first advances, the Quarrel was perpetuated from Father to Son, and very seldom ended but with the Extinction of one of the Families (2). It is easy to imagine, that People of this Temper, accustomed from their Childhood to fear neither Blows nor Wounds, and continually encouraged by the example of their Relations and Friends, encounter'd Dangers with great Resolution. Accordingly there never was any Nation that looked death in the Face with greater Intrepidity than the Saxons. And all the World knows this is the Character of the English at this very day.

The Saxons were extremely addic'd to Religion, even before they had the happiness of becoming Christians. When they settled in Great-Britain, they were not only Idolaters, but of all the Heathens were the most attached to the service of their Gods; even to the sacrificing of the Prisoners of War on their Altars. As soon as they embraced the Gospel, the same Inclination caus'd them to receive and practise, with equal Zeal, the Duties of the Christian Religion, and whatever the Monks, their first Teachers, were pleas'd to inculcate upon them. It was their unhappiness not to come to the Knowledge of God, till the Monks began by degrees to disfigure Religion by superstitious Practices. As the Saxons were Men of no Learning, and consequently incomplete Judges of what they were taught, they entirely gave themselves up to the management of their Guides. Hence their great Zeal in founding and endowing Monasteries. They were made to believe, that enriching the Monks was the main of Religion, or at least would supply all defects. This is also the reason that in the two first Centuries after their Conversion we find among them so many Saints of distinguished Birth and Fortune. Indeed, since a Saintship might be purchased by liberal Benefactions to the Monasteries, it was an easy way for the Rich and the Powerful to attain it. But although they were attached to many unnecessary things, yet even in that may be seen their Bias to Religion. This natural Inclination, no doubt, was the reason so many of their Kings voluntarily exchanged their worldly Grandeur for a Cloyster. They who are acquainted with the Temper of the English at this day, will readily own, no Nation can produce more Instances of fervent and solid Piety. My long abode in England makes me affirm this the more boldly. Indeed, God has permitted Libertinism in point of Religion to make some progress there of late Years. But it would be very unjust to judge of a whole Nation by a few that are infected with it, and of whom one single Person makes more noise in the World by his pernicious Maxims, than many Thousands of pious and sincere Christians.

The Anglo-Saxons were so little accustomed to Swearing and Blasphemings, which are grown so common now-a-days in Conversation, that among all their Laws there is not one against this Vice. This cannot be owing to the negligence of the Legislators, since we see in those very Laws great Penalties laid upon such as violated the Sabbath, or a Fast.

Drunkenness was their reigning Vice. They were used to drink out of large Cups, and take great Draughts, till Edgar, willing to reform this Abuse, order'd certain Marks to be made in their Cups at such a height, above which they were forbid to fill under such a Penalty. But this Regulation was not long in force.

Although the English in general, before the Norman Conquest, were not very famous for Learning, it is not to be ascribed to their want of Genius, but rather to their Education, which was entirely turn'd to Arms. Besides, the time of the Dominion of the Saxons, especially after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, was not a time wherein the Sciences greatly flourish'd.

I have but two Observations more to make on the Customs of the Anglo-Saxons. The first is, they reckon'd the Time by Nights, which is still observable in some English Expressions. For instance, instead of two Weeks they say a Fortnight, or fourteen Nights. Mercat ob-

(1) In this Law we have the Valuation of Men's Heads of all Orders and Degrees. This Valuation was call'd in Saxon, Wergild. The King's Head, was valued at thirty thousand Thring's (that is, in our Money, three hundred and sixty Pounds, each Thring being supposed worth about our true Pence, the same as two Pennings or Scots) half of which was to be paid to his Relations, and half to the State. An Archbishop or Prince's was valued at fifteen thousand Thring's; a Bishop's and Ealdorman's, at eight Thousand; a General's, at four Thousand; a Spiritual and Temporal Thane's, at two Thousand; Hence it is evident, that a Thane was far from being the same with a Baron, whose Valuation would have been at least as much as a Bishop's. The King's Head was valued at two hundred and sixty Pounds, but if he was so rich as to possess five Hides of Land, at two Thousand, the same as a Thane's. The Saxon Money is thus calculated by Mr. Camden: a Pening, three of our Pence. A Shilling, three Pennings, or fifteen Pence's a Pound, fifty eight Shillings, or three of our Pounds; Manca, Mancus, or Manca, twelve of our Pence. Marsa of Gold, thirty Pennings, or seven Shillings and Sixpence.

(2) These are what we call deadly Feuds, that is, Quarrels which end not in Death. The thirty eighth Law of Afred is concerning these deadly Feuds, and gives a strange License for Men to take Satisfaction on their Enemies, even without the Presence of any Officer. Nay, so far did they proceed, that if one Man killed another, his Kinred revenged his Death upon any of the Murderer's Relations (as they do among the Indians) till King Edward, order'd by a Law, that the Murderer alone should bear the deadly Feud or Enmity of the Kindred of the Party slain.

serves the same thing of the ancient Franci. This, with several other Customs common to the Francs and Saxons, is a strong Presumption, these two Nations had the same Original, as Sir William Temple asserts in his Introduction to the History of England.

The Saxon
Dike.

My second Observation is, that the Anglo-Saxons were wont to separate their Lands by large and deep Ditches. This was not only practised by private Persons: but the Kings themselves took care to raise Ramparts with large Ditches on the Frontiers of their Dominions, to part them from the neighbouring States, when there was no Mountains or Rivers to serve for Boundaries. Offa's Dike, made to divide Mercia from Wales, was twenty four miles long. There was another between the Thames and the Severn, separating Mercia from Wessex. It was called Woden's Dike, but contracted now into Wansditch. Mercia and East-England were parted by a like Ditch. Afterwards, the Engl-Angles making Conquests upon the Mercians, made another Ditch seven Miles further into the conquered Country. The first was called, but for what reason I know not, the Devils Dike, and the other the Seven Mile Dike. They had this Custom from the ancient Saxons, who practised the same thing in Germany. We are informed by some Historian, that the Saxons of Sleswick threw up a large Rampart from Sea to Sea, to defend themselves against the Incurfions of the Danes who were in possession of the Cimbriick Chersonesus or Jutland. Pepin King of France was long prevented from entering Saxony, by one of these Ramparts, and it was with great difficulty that he made his way over it at last.

The Language of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

The General
Dialect of the Anglo-Saxons.

TO say in general, the Anglo-Saxons spoke English or Saxon, would not be shewing with sufficient exactness what their Language was. To give a fuller Idea of it, it will be necessary to distinguish the several Tongues used in England after the arrival of the first Saxons. The English Tongue originally differed but little from the Danish, since the ancient Writers call them indifferently Cimbriick, Scandinavian, Gothic: But this Language was not the same with the Saxon. In the parts lying North of the Thames, was spoken pure English or Danish, and South of the Thames pure Saxon. Though these two Languages were different, they too far agreed however, as to be understood by both Nations. In process of time, and especially after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, Saxon prevailed in all England, because the Kings were of that Nation. Thus pure English, [or the Language of the Angles] was by degrees disused, or at least banished from common Conversation. Afterwards the Danes settling in England, brought their Language, which was not the ancient Danish or English above-mentioned, but a modern Danish, mixt with the Language of several neighbouring Nations of Denmark. This modern Danish was chiefly used in Northumberland, Mercia, and East-England, where the Danes were Masters. Though, out of complaisance to the English, Canute the Great published his Laws in Saxon, yet the Danish Tongue was still retained in the North, where the People were mostly Danes. As it was also the Court-Language during the Reigns of Canute the Great and his two Sons, it became necessary for the West-Saxons, who adopted several Words and Idioms of it into their own Language. But upon Edward the Confessor's accession to the Throne, Saxon prevailed again at Court. Hence the Inhabitants of the North were under some necessity of learning it, just as the Gaels in France are obliged to learn French.

In the Reign of King Edward, the Norman Language began also to be introduced into England. As his Mother was a Norman, and he had lived many Years in that Court, he was very fond of the Norman Language. Moreover, the great number of Normans that flock'd into England, very much helped to introduce this Language among the Persons of Quality, who took a pride in speaking it well. The Norman Tongue being at that time a mixture of Danish and French, the last began to prevail, so that the ancient Danish brought by the Normans into Normandy, daily lost Ground. As soon as William the Conqueror was seated in the Throne of England, he used all possible means to bring his native Tongue in vogue throughout the Kingdom. He published his Laws in Norman, which, with the settlement of multitudes of Norman Families in England, made that Language as common as the Saxon.

The Language then of the Anglo-Saxons just before the Conquest was a mixture of the following Dialects. 1. Of British or Celtic, from whence no doubt the Saxons borrowed some words and Phrases. 2. Of Latin, which was common in Great-Britain when the Saxons arrived. 3. Of the ancient English or Danish. 4. Of the modern Danish. 5. Of pure Saxon. 6. Of Norman mixed with Danish and French. They who have carefully studied this matter, distinguish three principal Dialects in the Anglo-Saxon Language. The first was compounded of British, Latin and Saxon, but in such manner, that the Saxon was predominant. The only remains of this Dialect, which was in use above three hundred years, is a Fragment of the Writings of Cedmon the Monk, inserted by Alfred the Great in his Translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The second Dialect, which may be termed Dano-Saxon, was used in the northern Parts, from the first Invasions of the Danes, to the Norman Conquest. There are still preserv'd in some Libraries, two Manuscript Versions of the Gospels in this Language. The third Dialect was composed of the other two and the Norman. This Dialect, which was introduced chiefly in the Reigns of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror, has admitted of great alterations, by the addition of many French words, particularly, after Henry II's Accession to the Crown of England. They who are ignorant of the English Tongue, hardly believe, that a mixture of so many Languages can have any extraordinary Beauties. But the English pretend, their Language, for that very reason, must be more Beautiful and Expressive, since they have adopted only the more refined part of other Tongues, and rejected what is rude and unpolished. Be this as it will, they have a great value for their Language, and, if a Foreigner may be allowed to give his Opinion, I think, very justly.

I shall conclude this Article with a word or two concerning the Name of Sterling, given to the English Money. Some believe this word comes from the Town of Striveling or Sterling in Scotland, where they pretend, but without any ground, that the best and purest Money was formerly coined. Others say, with much greater probability, that Sterling is derived from the Saxon Word Stear, which signifies Rule or Standard: So that according to this opinion, Sterling Money means no more than money made according to a settled Standard. Canute and some others imagined this word was of a more modern date, and taken from certain Flemish Workmen, who in the Reign of King John were invited into England to reduce the Money to its due fineness, in which they were more expert than the English. As the People of that Country were generally called Easterlings, on Account of their Situation Eastward of England, 'tis pretended, the Money they coined, was called Easterling or Sterling, that is, made by the Easterlings, or Flemish, and consequently purer than what had been hitherto coined (1).

(1) It is believed that in the most ancient Times, when Money was first coined in this Island, it was made of pure Gold and Silver, like Monies now current in Holland. But as the Art of refining the Metals, in making the Monies, it being found convenient to have a certain Quantity of base Metal to be mixt with the Gold and Silver, the word Sterling was introduced, to denote the certain Proportion or Degree of Fineness which ought to be retained in the respective Compositions of each Mixture. Sterling and Standard are therefore synonymous Terms. It is probable, the word Sterling was unknown in the time of the Conquest, as there is no mention of it in Domesday, which was every Man's Money, as Domesday, or Peppin's Money, but not a Sterling. But it never this Term was born after this usage, because the Statute of the 15th of Edward III. refers to ancient Sterling. Some suppose the Word is derived from Star, which they suppose to have been imprinted on the Money.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK VI.

The Norman Line: From the Reign of WILLIAM the Conqueror, to the Death of King STEPHEN, containing the Space of about Eighty Eight Years. With the State of the CHURCH during the said Space.

I. WILLIAM I. Surnam'd the BASTARD, or CONQUEROR.

From the Duke of Normandy's Alliance with England.

WHEN a Man impartially considers the Attempt form'd by the Duke of Normandy upon England, he is at a loss which to admire most, either the Ground, or the Boldness, or the Success. In the first place, it must be very surprizing, he should build his Right upon so sandy a Foundation as the bare Will of King Edward, of which too it does not appear in History, he ever offered to give the least Proof, or produce any Evidence. In the next place, it is as hard to conceive, how this Prince, who pass'd for one of the most politick of his time, could form a Design to support his pretended Right by Arms, notwithstanding all the Obstacles that seem'd to conspire to divert him from it. Never Project seem'd more rashly form'd, or with less Appearance of Success. The Forces of Normandy, were not comparable to those of England, neither had Duke William, in the Country he undertook to conquer, any strong Holds, or Friends, or Correspondence, whereon to ground the hopes of succeeding. Even after he had landed a powerful Army, not a single Lord declared in his Favour. Far from reasonably expecting any Assistance from the English, he could not possibly be ignorant how well they stood affected to Harold. Indeed some among them, from a Sense of Justice and Equity, might be dispos'd with the new King's usurping the Crown upon Edgar. But they were far enough from blaming him for supplanting the Duke of Normandy, whose very Pretensions were unknown to them. They were so little inclin'd to reject the King they had chosen, that, on the contrary, they had just given him sensible Marks of their Fidelity, by their Zeal and Readiness in his defence against the King of Norway. On the other hand, the Obstacles Duke William was naturally to expect from the neighbouring Princes, were no less apt to deter him from his purpose. Their Interest required that instead of promoting his Enterprize, they should oppose his growing Power. The French in particular, could not, without running counter to the most obvious Maxims of Policy, forbear endeavouring to blast a Design, the Success whereof would infallibly be very prejudicial to them. But supposing he could have been sure, the Princes his Neighbours would voluntarily shut their Eyes against their own Interest, how could he expect to succeed, since the States of Normandy refused to assist him in an Undertaking which to them seem'd equally unjust and rash? Lastly, in the Execution of this Design, it is surprizing to see, contrary to all Expectation, the greatest Difficulties insensibly vanish before him, and the very things which seem'd most opposite to his designs, help to accomplish them. The States of Normandy refusing him the Assistance he wants, private Persons voluntarily drain their Purse and supply him more plentifully than he could have expected from the States. The Court of France lets him act unmolested, and even suffers the French to aid him in procuring a Crown which might one day render him equal to his Sovereign, or at least enable him to dispute his Superiority. All the rest of the neighbouring Princes strive with emulation to forward a Design, the Success whereof must be fatal to them. He is assisted by the Earls of Bretagne (1) and Anjou, who a little before were his mortal Enemies. In a word, within the space of a few Months, he has a numerous Army (1), a good Transport Ship, and Money in Abundance. Even Harold's late Victory over the King of Norway contributed as much as any one thing to the Duke of Normandy's Success, though seemingly it should have destroyed all his Hopes. In that Action, Harold lost his best Troops, and the King by withholding the Saxons, and by his Army was impeded with a fatal Contempt of the Victory, that proved his ruin. Had not it been for this Contempt, Harold had have avoided coming to Battle, according to his Brother's Advice; and if the Norman Army to have been away in an Enemy's Country, where no Assistance could be found. And afterwards, Duke William, constrained to fight with disadvantage, had been vanquished, what could he have urged to vindicate the Injustice and Rashness of his Attempt? But the Event has dispelled all these Reflections, and determined the Historians to extol an Action, that would manifestly have blighted, had it proved unsuccessful. Thus the Foundation on which the Duke of Normandy built his Pretensions, the little Reason he had to flatter himself with a happy Issue, and the Ease wherewith he accomplished his Enterprize, equally deserve our Admiration. Add to all these Considerations, that, by one single Battle he became master of a Country, which neither the Danes, or the Saxons, nor the Romans themselves, could subdue till after numberless Engagements, and in the space of several Ages. All this obliges us to own, he was guided by the hand of the Almighty, the only Giver of Victory, and who exalts and humbles Nations according to his good Pleasure. God, no doubt, was pleased to make use of this Conqueror, to render the English Nation more illustrious than ever. The English, hitherto almost unknown to the rest of the World, began after this Revolution to make a considerable figure in Europe. This may be said to be the first Step by which England is arrived to that height of Grandeur and Glory, we behold it in at present. This will evidently appear in the whole course of the History, the principal Events of which I am going to describe. But since I am to begin with the reign of William the Conqueror, it will not be improper to give some farther Account of this Prince, who was two and forty years old at the time of the Battle of Hastings, and had now been three and thirty years Duke of Normandy. It will be necessary therefore, before we enter upon his Reign, to consider by what degrees divine Providence raised him to the Throne of England, of which his Birth seemed to give him no manner of Prospect.

(1) As an Addition to Note (1) p. 149. The Reader is desir'd to observe, that it was Conan II. who was poisoned, by his Chamberlain that had been kill'd by William, Harold's Son in the Battle of Hastings. He was succeeded with the Title of Earl of Breton, and with the Inheritance of Earl Edward in York-shire, which from his Title was call'd the Honour of Richmond. After William's Victory, most of Conan's Forces returned into their own Country, except a few of the meaner Sort, who settled in England. D'Argenteau, p. 173 — 177. Edit. 1611.

The Affairs of Normandy, one of the largest and most considerable Provinces of France, was possessed by the Normans ever since the forced Grant made by Charles the Simple to Rollo the Dane, the first Duke. Rollo and his immediate Successors, content with this noble Acquisition, were less solicitous about enlarging their Bounds, than securing the Possession to their Posterity. By means of numerous Colonies of their own Nation, who by reciprocal Marriages were incorporated with the Natives, they soon caused the two Nations to become one People, under the common Name of Normans. For the French called the Foreigners lately settled in Normandy, which from them took also the Name of Normandy. The first Dukes made it their principal Care to gain the affection of their Subjects, by causing them to enjoy as much as possible, the Sweetness of Peace, and governing them with Justice and Equity. By this prudent Conduct they not only destroyed the Seeds of Rebellion, which might lurk in the Hearts of the ancient Inhabitants; but also screened themselves from the secret Practices of the Kings of France, who grieved to see so noble a Province torn from their Monarchy. Accordingly, when the French, at any favourable Juncture, attempted to recover it, they always found the Dukes of Normandy able to defend themselves with their own Forces, because they were assured of the People's Affection.

From Rollo to William the Bastard there were seven Dukes, among whom Richard II. who was the fourth, was one of the most illustrious. His first Wife was Judith of Lotharing, by whom he had three Sons, Richard, Robert and William. After the Death of Judith, he made a double Alliance with Constance the Great, giving him his Sister Emma, Widow to Ethelred II. King of England, and taking himself Matilda Sister to that Prince. How honorable soever this Match might be, his Love of a young Danish called Pavia, caused him to divorce Ethelred and marry his Mistress. By this second Wife he had William Earl of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Raen.

After the death of this Prince, his Son Richard III succeeded him, notwithstanding the Endeavours of his younger Brother Robert to supplant him: Robert, not being able to accomplish his designs, was forced to desist; or rather, as some affirm, went a furer and a more ready way to work. 'Tis said, he procured his Brother to be poisoned, who, after a Reign of two years, left him the Possession of the Dukedom, he had so ardently wished for. Whether Duke Robert's crime was never fully proved, or his just Government blotted out the remembrance of it, he found means to gain the affection of his People at home by his Justice and Liberality, whilst his Valour made him respected abroad. By one and it was that Henry I. King of France, took possession of the Throne, notwithstanding the Pretensions of Robert his younger Brother, who was supported by a powerful party. The Intrigues of Queen Constance their Mother, who espoused the Interest of her young Son, obliging Henry to implore the assistance of the Duke of Normandy, he came to him at Raen, and obtained an Aid of five hundred Spear-Men. This first Aid was soon followed by a more considerable Supply, led by the Duke himself into France, where he placed Henry on the Throne, compelling the younger Brother to be satisfied with Burgundy. Henry, in a grateful test of so signal a Service, protested, he would have it in eternal remembrance: And to give him an effectual Proof of his Sincerity, annexed to the Duchy of Normandy the Cities of Chaumont and Pontiff, then in possession of the Crown of France.

It will not be proper here to enter into the particulars of Duke Robert's Wars with some rebellious Norman Lords, and with the Duke of Bretagne for refusing Homage. 'Tis sufficient to say in a word, he was successful in taming the Rebels, and reducing the Duke of Bretagne to his Duty. I have already mentioned his design of causing Justice to be done to his Cousins, Sons of Ethelred II. and how his Enterprize miscarried; wherefore it is needless to say any more of it.

It is hard to conceive why this Prince who was a Lover of his People, should never think of marrying, though he might plainly foresee, in case he died without Heirs, great Confusion and Troubles would ensue. There were in Normandy several Branches of the Ducal Family, who might pretend to the Succession if he died without Children. Consequently their several Pretensions would, very probably, occasion a Civil War, which Robert might prevent by marrying. Notwithstanding this, he was resolved to live single. One would be apt to think, this resolution was owing to his Insensibility for the fair Sex, had we not a proof to the contrary, in his passion for a young Danish, with whose graceful Mien he was charmed as he saw her dancing. The Danish, who was called Arlotta (2), a Skinner's Daughter of Falaise, thinking herself extremely honoured by the Duke's Addresses, readily yielded to his Solicitations. 'Tis said, the first Night the Duke took her to his Bed, the dreamt her Bowels were extended over all Normandy and England. This Dream was very naturally interpreted afterwards, if it be true that it was not forged after the Event.

Robert had by this Mistress a Son called William, of whose 'tis related, that the Moment he was born, laying hold of some Straws, he held them so fast, that his Fift was forced to be unloosed before he would let them go. This made the good Women say, he would one day prove a great Acquirer, since he began so early. Robert educated his young Son with all imaginable care, bestowing him for his Successor. But whilst he was laying out his Pains in his Education, the fancy took him to go in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. This act of Devotion was looked upon as Robert proof of the effect of his remorse for the murder of the Duke his Brother, and of his desire to atone for his Crime by this sort of Penance. Be this as it will, before he set out, he took all necessary measures to secure the Succession to his Bastard Son. He was very sensible how difficult it would be for young William to take possession, if the Normans were not prepared beforehand to acknowledge him. And therefore, he summoned the States of Normandy, and communicating to them his design of going to the Holy Land, conjured them, in case he should never return, to receive, after his death, his young Son William for their Sovereign. The States did all that lay in their Power to divert the Duke from his Journey; but finding, he was not to be prevailed upon, gave him their Promise with an Oath, if any ill Accident befel him on the Road, they would conform to his Will. To convince him of their Sincerity, they swore Fealty to William as the presumptive Heir of Normandy the Duke his Father. This Affair being settled to Robert's Satisfaction, he appointed Alain Duke of Bretagne, his Relation and Vassal, Seneschal of Normandy, giving him power to govern, in his absence, with an absolute Authority. Then he carried his Son to Paris, and delivered him into the hands of the King of France, who took charge of his Education. Before he left the Court of France, he made young William do Homage to the King, as if he had been in actual possession of Normandy.

Normandy.

The Absence of Duke Robert occasioned Troubles in his Dominions, which obliged the Duke of Bretagne to use some Severity, and exert the Authority he was intrusted with. But whilst he was earnestly endeavouring to restore Peace and Tranquillity, he was taken off by Poison. This Accident was soon followed with a report of the Duke's being dead on the Road. Notwithstanding the uncertainty of this News, it was the cause of Commotions so much the more dangerous, as there was no body in Normandy capable of appeasing them. They who had the Administration of Affairs in their Hands, were themselves engaged in Factions, which had been forming ever since the Duke's Departure, and thereby help'd to increase the Confusion.

Robert's
Death.

Whilst things were in this ill State, some of the Duke's Retinue arrived, and confirm'd the news of his death. Upon which several of the principal Lords, descended from the ancient Dukes, began to cabal openly, to exclude the Bastard from the Succession. Plausible Pretences were not wanting; but the States declared, they could not without Perjury violate the Oath, they had bound themselves by. The Resolution being taken of acknowledging William for Sovereign, Ambassadors were dispatch'd to the King of France to demand the young Prince. After Henry was informed of the Duke of Normandy's Death, the Shame of doing an ill Action, and the desire of becoming master of Normandy, kept him in suspense. He was in hopes the Troubles of that Dukedom would turn to his Advantage, and began to lay his Schemes accordingly. However, when he found the States of Normandy had declared in favour of William, he thought proper to defer the Execution of his Designs, till a more convenient Season. He chose therefore to conceal his Intentions, and send home the young Prince. As soon as William came to Roan, the States swore Fealty to him, and gave him for Governor Ranul de Gace, Constable of Normandy.

Chron.
Norm.

The Troubles were not allay'd by the Arrival of the new Duke. The Lords who claimed the Ducal Crown, could not resolve to drop their Pretensions. They imagined the preferring a Bastard before them, was a manifest Injustice. But, as they who held the Reins of the Government, were Men of great Prudence and Interest, and thought to be supported by France, the Claimants durst not openly avow their designs. Mean time, King Henry burnt with desire to make an Advantage of these dissensions. The death of Duke Robert made him forget the great Service received from that Prince. In fine, not being able to resist the Temptation any longer, he suddenly laid Siege to the Castle of Tilliers, to which he had some Pretensions. This Place being very strong and well provided with Ammunition, would have held out a long time, if the Duke's Ministers had not ordered the Governor to surrender it on condition the Castle should be demolished. Henry very readily agreed to these Terms, and commanded the Walls to be actually raz'd; but on some ambiguous Clause in the Capitulation, caus'd them to be immediately rebuilt. This good Success inspiring him with great hopes of his Enterprize, he seized also upon Argentan. Then marching to Falaise, he became master of the Town with the same ease. He would have made farther Progress, if Ranul de Gace, having drawn together a powerful Army, had not compelled him to retire. His retreat gave the Constable opportunity of retaking Falaise, the French not having time to lay in any Stores.

Treasury.

As soon as the Claimants saw, the King of France, instead of protecting the young Duke, was making War against him, they began to stir again and prosecuted their respective Pretensions. The first that appeared, was Roger de Trevisy, Standard-bearer of Normandy, descended from an Uncle of Rollo. This Lord, who had amass'd great Riches in Spain, where he had long bore Arms against the Saracens, returning home during Duke Robert's Absence, put himself at the Head of one of the Factions that disturbed the State. As soon as he heard of that Prince's Death, he form'd the Project of seizing the Dukedom. But his Apprehension of the King of France's assisting Duke William, prevented him then from pursuing his Designs. But this Apprehension being removed by the Proceedings of King Henry, he drew some Troops together, imagining the Duke's Forces would be sufficiently employed against France. But he was presently after defeated and slain by Roger de Beaumont, who commanded the Duke's Army.

the Earl of Arques.

William, Earl of Arques, Son of Richard II, by Pavia, was not discouraged by this Example. As he found himself supported by the King of France who put him upon Action, he boldly sent a Defiance to the Duke. But the Duke, heading his Army in Person, push'd him so vigorously, that he compelled him to shut himself up in the City of Arques, where he besieged him. Henry, who had engaged the Earl in this Enterprize, thought himself obliged in Honour to raise the Siege. To this end he march'd into Normandy, where he received two Overthrows, and was constrained at last to abandon the Rebel, who, upon the City's being taken, was sent into Exile.

Guy of Burgundy, Son of a Daughter to Duke Richard II, and of Croy de Burgundy, was the next that appeared on the Stage. He had concerted his Measures so well, that he was like to have surpris'd the Duke's Person, who was then at Valognes without any Guard, ignorant of what was plotting against him. But a certain Peol, whom the Conspirators did not mistrust, hearing their design, travel'd all Night to give the Duke notice, who had but just time to put on his Cloaths, and ride full Speed to Falaise. What havoc he might make, he was so closely pursued, that he must have been taken, his Horse not being able to carry him thither, had he not been assisted by a Gentleman whom he accidentally met on the Road. This Conspiracy seem'd to him so dangerous, that he apply'd to the King of France for Aid. Henry, either out of Generosity, or for some other unknown Reasons, being unwilling to suffer the young Prince to be oppress'd, brought him some Troops himself, which enabled him to give his Enemy Battle. Guy being vanquish'd and taken Prisoner, Duke William by an Act of Generosity, which redounded no less to his Honour than the Victory, freely gave him his Pardon.

William Guerland, Earl of Mortagne, and another William, Earl of Eu, Son to a natural Brother of Richard II, were likewise for attempting to dispossess the young Duke. But being prevented by his Diligence, they were sentenced to perpetual Banishment.

The Vigour and Conduct shewn by Duke William during all these Troubles, made his Subjects conceive great Hopes of him. His Neighbours began also to consider him as a Prince of distinguished Merit, and capable in time of giving them trouble. The King of France, in particular, grew extremely jealous of him, and blamed himself exceedingly for assisting him against Guy of Burgundy; but to retrieve that Oversight, he raised him a fresh Enemy, the Earl of Anjou; whom however he only privately assisted at first. Afterwards he openly espous'd his Quarrel, and made a fierce War upon the Duke, which lasted several Years, but in the end turn'd to the Disadvantage of the two Allies. Duke William gaining two successive Battles, they sued for Peace, which the King of France could not obtain but by the Surrender of the Castle of Tilliers, taken by him during the Duke's Minority.

During this War, as the Duke was besieging Alençon, some of the Inhabitants came upon the Walls with Skins in their Hands, by way of Reproach, for his Mother being a Skinner's Daughter. He was so provok'd at this Insult, that he swore by the Splendor of God, his usual Oath, he would be reveng'd. Some time after, becoming master of the Town, he accomplish'd his Oath, by putting out the Eyes, and cutting off the Hands and Feet of two and twenty of the insolent Burghers.

Henry died soon after this War. He was succeeded by Philip I, his Son, a Minor, under the Guardianship of Baldwin, the fifth Earl of Flanders; who had lately given his Daughter Matilda in Marriage to the Duke of Normandy. The relation the Regent stood in as well to the King his Pupil, as to the Duke his Son-in-law, made him take all necessary Precautions to keep up between the two Princes a good Understanding, which lasted many Years.

Duke William took this Opportunity to extinguish all remains of Rebellion among his Subjects. He banish'd great numbers, who, for the most part, retired into Apulia, to Robert Guiscard, a Norman Gentleman, who made then a great Figure in that Country (1). The Duke's Relations by his Father's Side giving him the most disturbance, he oblig'd almost all of them to quit Normandy. Their Estates being confiscated to his use, he enrich'd with them his Mother's Relations, who till then were but in mean Circumstances. Robert, his uterine Brother, had the Earldom of Mortagne, forfeited by William Guerland, Odo, his Brother, partook also of his Bounty, and moreover was made Bishop of Bayeux. Two of their Sisters were married to the Earls of Aumale and Albemarle.

Mauger his Uncle, Archbishop of Roan, was not only concerned in all the Plots against the Duke, but had also the boldness to excommunicate him, on pretence of the too near Relation between him and Matilda his Wife (2). As soon as the Duke was in a State of Tranquillity, he resolv'd to be revenged on this Prelate. To that end, having assembled all the Bishops of Normandy at Lisieux, he caus'd him to be accus'd before them of several Misdemeanours, particularly, his selling the consecrated Chalice to supply his Luxury. Upon these Accusations, supported

After Duke William had thus humbled, or dispersed all that could create him any Disturbance, his Circumstances were such, that he might have spent his Days in profound Tranquillity, since he had nothing to fear either at Home or Abroad. But as he was of a covetous and ambitious Temper, this Tranquillity, which only procured him what he already enjoyed, was far from contenting him. It was probably with a view to new Acquisitions, that he went to visit King Edward his Cousin, who had no Children, and perhaps had given him some hopes of being his Heir. However this be, it is generally believed, Edward during the Duke's stay at the Court of England, promised him, to make a Will in his Favour. But though this Will never appeared, and no Proof of it was ever produced by the Duke, it was however, according to all the Historians, the Pretence, used by him, to undertake the Conquest of England. Nevertheless, in the Manifesto published upon his Landing, he says not a Word of this same Will or Promise, of which he could not produce any Evidence. We have seen in the foregoing Book, what Duke William did to support his pretended Right till the Battle of Hastings. It is time now to see, how he improved the Success of that Day to mount the Throne of England, and the Methods he used to secure the possession in spite of all Opposition.

Duke William's Conquest after the Battle of Hastings.
W. Pictus.

It is easy to conceive the Conformation of the English, after the loss of the Battle of Hastings, and the Death of their King. They were destitute of Men, Arms, and Ammunition; but chiefly of a Leader that had a right to command them, and take care of their present Wants. On the other Hand, the victorious Normans were not far from London, the only Place where necessary Measures could be taken to prevent the Calamities the Kingdom was threatened with. Harold's Sons were fled into Ireland. Edgar Atheling was too young, and besides of too narrow a Genius, to give them any Prospect of Assistance in this their pressing Necessity. It is true, the Earls Morcar and Edwin were still alive, and retired to London with Part of the fugitive Army. But to take proper Measures on such an Occasion, more time was required, than, probably, the Conqueror, would afford them. Thus the Affairs of the English were in a terrible Confusion; all the Methods proposed to free them from Danger, being clogged with insurmountable Difficulties. On the other side, the Duke of Normandy, willing to make advantage of the Terror of the English, was now marching towards London (1) to increase, by his approach the Trouble and Confusion that prevailed in the Metropolis. But on a sudden he altered his Resolution: He considered, though the loss of a Battle had thrown the English into Astonishment, yet there was no likelihood of their being entirely discouraged: That their Cause not being yet desperate, they might easily bring into the Field fresh Armies, and try again more than once the fortune of War: That in such a Case, should he chance to receive but one Overthrow, he had no-where to retreat to, nor any Opportunity of sending for Supplies from Normandy. These Reflections made him resolve to besiege Dover, before he advanced any farther, to secure a Retreat in Case of Necessity, and a Port, where his Convoys might easily come from Normandy. This Precaution, even after his Victory, is a clear Evidence of the Boldness, or rather Rashness of his Enterprize, since, had he been vanquished, he would not have had a single Spot in the Kingdom to retire to. He marched therefore directly to Dover, a place naturally very strong, but was become more so by the great Number of English Officers and Soldiers, fled thither after the Battle. For this Reason, it might have stood a long Siege; but the Conformation was so great, that it surrendered in a few Days. As soon as the Duke was in Possession, he ordered the Town to be more strongly fortified, and spent eight Days there, to forward the Works. After which he marched for London (2).

We find, in some Histories, that the Duke, as he was marching at the Head of his Army, saw at a distance a great Multitude of People coming towards him with Boughs in their Hands, who, looking like a Moving Forest, at first somewhat alarmed him. But his Surprise ceased, when he found they were Deputies of the County of Kent, attended with great Crouds of People, who were come to assure him of the Submission of the County, and whithal to demand the Preservation of their ancient Privileges. They who relate this Adventure, add, the Duke received them very graciously and granted their Request. But as William of Poitiers, who was then with the Duke, makes no mention of this Fact, there is Reason to think it a Forgery (3).

Whilst the Duke was before Dover, or on his march towards the Thames, the Trouble and Confusion at London continually increased by the diversity of Opinions preventing them from coming to any Resolution. Some were for submitting to the Duke without loss of time: Others believed it more advisable to treat with him first, and procure some assurances for the Preservation of the Privileges, not only of the City, but the whole Kingdom. Some intimated, that things were not yet desperate: that the Winter, which was begun, might give them time to concert Measures for their Defence: and with this view laboured heartily to get Edgar Atheling placed on the Throne. Edwin and Morcar were at the head of this last Party. But, how great soever their Credit might be, it was not possible for them to carry their Point. All they could obtain of the Citizens, was, to shut the Gates against the Duke, till some Resolution was taken. Mean while, the Duke approaching the City, encamped in Southwark, separated from London by the Thames. He hoped his approach would oblige the Londoners to a voluntary Submission, and in that belief lay quiet some days. This Proceeding had a quite contrary Effect to what he expected. Morcar and Edwin took this opportunity to excite the People to take Arms and fall out to surprize the Normans, who were on the other side the Bridge. This fall, which was easily repulsed, convinced the Duke that other Measures were to be taken, and the City vigorously pushed, of which he could have but small hopes of being Master, if he gave the Inhabitants time to recover out of their Conformation. However, he was under some Perplexity, as may well be thought, if it is considered, that although he had gained a Battle, he was still very far from his Ends. He had but one single Castle, situated in the utmost bounds of the Kingdom. All the rest of the Country was against him, and there were several remote Counties, where the English might draw an Army together without molestation. And indeed there was no advancing towards the middle of the Kingdom and leaving London behind him, without being exposed to manifest Danger, and losing the Communication with Dover, so absolutely necessary for him. On the other hand, it was hardly possible for him to undertake the Siege of London, during the Winter: besides that the situation of the City would have necessarily obliged him to leave a considerable Body of Troops on the South-side of the Thames, which would very much have weakened his Army. In fine, a Siege of that Importance, which probably would have lasted several months, would have given the English time to recover, and raise Armies in other parts of the Kingdom. By which means he would have been obliged to conquer England inch by inch, as the Romans, Saxons, and Danes had done. But he was by no means in condition to maintain so tedious a War. He had therefore properly but one way to compass his ends; which was, to take advantage of the Conformation of the Londoners, and oblige them, rather by terror than force, to submit to his Laws. With this view it was, that he posted himself at Wallingford, from whence he continually sent Detachments to ravage the Counties adjoining to London, in order to terrify the Citizens, cut off their Provisions, and prevent them from laying in Stores (4). At the same time, he caused Southwark to be reduced to Ashes, to let them see what they were to expect, if they obstinately persisted in the defence of the City. But perhaps all his Efforts would have been ineffectual, if the Clergy, who were at London, had not broken all the Measures Morcar and Edwin would have taken to crush his Designs.

The Aim of these two Lords and some other zealous Assertors of their Country's Liberty, was to place Edgar Atheling on the Throne. They represented to the People, that the only way to avoid the present Danger, was first to come out of that state of Anarchy they were in: That, whilst there was no body who had a right to command, it was impossible to take just measures to resist the Normans, now at their Gates: But as soon as there should be a King, he would send Orders into all Parts of the Scriptores) from a Manuscript History of the Monks of St. Augustine's Convent, written by Helmut of St. who in all probability invented it to magnify the Valour of their Abbot and of the Kentish-men. Tyfel observes the improbability of that, as the Green Boar in the beginning of November, Samuel has also in his Treatise of Geographical content this Relation. However Poissoneux says that, not far from Dover, the People of Kent came, of their own accord, in to him, gave Fealty, and gave Hollies; and the City of Canterbury first desired to put him with her Submission.

1066. Kingdom to levy Troops, and the Duke of Normandy would then find in his coat, the gaining a single Battle was not sufficient to render him Master of England; but in case they continued inactive, they could expect nothing but total Ruin, and to see the Kingdom fall under a foreign Yoke: In a word, that Prince Edgar had an incontestable Right to the Crown of England, and could not be refused possession without great Injustice. The majority of the People approved the proposal of the two Earls: but the Clergy openly rejected it, not thinking proper to expose their Lands and Repose to the Chance of War. Edgar was little able to protect them. On the other hand, the Duke of Normandy had the name of a Religious Prince, well-disposed to the Church, and his Enterprize had received the Pope's Approbation. This was sufficient to oblige all the Clergy, who were then in London with the two Archbishops at their Head, to cabal among the People in order to hinder Edgar's Election. They were in hopes, their Submission to the Duke of Normandy would turn to a better account than a War, which, in all appearance, would be of long continuance, in case a Resolution was taken to resist him. However this be, or whatever their Motive was, they made so strenuous an Opposition, that Edwin and Mercar despairing of success, retired into the North (1), imagining, it would be long before the Duke could follow them thither. They were no sooner gone, but Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, repaired to the Duke, then at Berkhamstead. He was quickly followed by Aldred Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Winchester (2), and at last by Prince Edgar, who suffered himself to be guided by their Counsels. The Duke received them in a very civil and courteous manner. He granted all their Requests, among which there were some that concerned the whole Nation: Nay, it is added, he confirmed his Promises by a solemn Oath. It is not known what were the Terms these Prelates obtained of the Duke: but it is to be presumed, the Church's Interests were not forgotten. Be this as it will, they swore Fealty to the Duke, as if he were already their Sovereign, and induced Prince Edgar to do the same. Their Example influencing many Persons of Distinction, in a few days the Londoners found themselves destitute of the assistance of those they could chiefly rely on, in case they resolved upon a vigorous Defence.

Mean time, as the Citizens were still in suspense, and as the possession of the Metropolis, before the rest of the Kingdom had taken any Resolution, would be of the utmost Importance to the Duke, he drew nearer the City, as if he intended to besiege it. His approach immediately determined the Magistrates, who, finding they were in no condition to defend a City, where all was in confusion and despair, chose to go and present him with the Keys of the Gates. He gave them a very favorable Reception, and, it is said, promised with an Oath to preserve their Privileges. They had gone too far to draw back. The Duke's whole Conduct discovering he aspired to something more, they thought it best to prevent his Wishes, since it was not in their Power to hinder the Execution of them. To this purpose, after advising with the Prelates and Lords, who had now submitted, they unanimously resolve to place the Duke on the Throne. Accordingly, they all went in a Body, and made him an offer of the Crown, telling him, They had always been accustomed to live under kingly Government, and they knew no Person more worthy than him to govern them. The Duke, forgetting, on this occasion, or pretending to forget, that he had entered the Kingdom in arms, by virtue of his pretended Right to the Crown, showed at first some doubt, whether he should accept of the Honour. He told them, their Offer was of so great moment, that he desired, before he resolved, to advise with his Friends. The Result of which was, that he ought by no means to refuse the Dignity voluntarily offered him by the English, since, by such a Refusal, he would put it out of his Power to reward his Followers, who had engaged in his Cause, with the sole Prospect of placing him on the Throne. He was entreated therefore not to reject what Providence had been so kind as to throw in his way, and what had cost him so much Blood already. The Duke, easily yielding to these agreeable Solicitations, returned in Answer to the English Lords and the Magistrates of London, That he was ready to consent to their Request. Accordingly, he accepted the Crown, as their Gift, and tacitly acknowledged a Right of Election in the People of England, though the manner in which he caused himself to be elected, was no great sign of his being persuaded of that Right. And indeed, what Authority could the Magistrates of London and a few Bishops and Lay-Lords have to dispose of the Crown without the Concurrence of the Estates? Notwithstanding the essential Defect in this precipitate Election, the Duke appointed Christmas-day following for the Ceremony of his Coronation. Mean while, as this Solemnity was to be performed at London, the Inhabitants whereof he suspected, he ordered a Fortress to be run up in haste, which he garrisoned with Normans.

Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was then suspended by the Pope, as an Intruder into that See, in the room of Robert, who was never Canonically deprived. But notwithstanding this Suspension, he exercised the Archiepiscopal Function, the English not being yet convinced, the Pope's Power was so extensive as he pretended. However, the Duke, who was obliged to the Pope, and besides was willing to avoid the Objections that might be made to his Coronation, if performed by a suspended Bishop, would not receive the Crown from the hands of Stigand. Aldred therefore, Archbishop of York, performed the Ceremony. Before he set the Crown on his head, the Archbishop, addressing to the English, asked them, whether they would have the Duke of Normandy for their King? All the People consenting by their Acclamations, the Bishop of Constance put the same question to the Normans, who answered in the same manner as the English (3). this last circumstance evidently shows the Duke had even then resolved to make the English and Normans but one and the same People. Otherwise, there was no occasion to ask the Consent of the Normans, to make him King of England. What followed, plainly discovered this to be his real intention. The Archbishop of York, continuing the Ceremony, placed the Duke on the Throne, and administered to him the Oath usually taken by the Saxon Kings. The Substance of the Oath, was, "That he would protect the Church and its Ministers: That he would govern the Nation with equity; That he would enact just Laws, and cause them to be strictly observed; and that he would forbid all Rapines and unjust Judgments." Malmibury adds, he promised to behave himself mercifully to his Subjects, and govern the English and Normans by the same Laws (4). If this Historian do not deceive us, it may be inferred from this last Article, that this Prince had already determined to settle the Normans in England. There are Writers however that affirm, King William took no Oath at all, as unwilling to be bound to receive Law from a conquered Nation. But very probably they are mistaken. King William accepted the Crown as a Gift, and consequently had no reason to dispense with the usual Oath. In the next place, only the Londoners can be said to have acknowledg'd him for Sovereign. All the rest of the Kingdom being still to conquer, what likelihood is there that a Prince of his Abilities, should at such a Juncture, let the English see he intended to rule with an arbitrary Sway. In fine, tho' the Surname of Conqueror, is given him, it is certain, he never openly pretended to possess the Crown by right of Conquest, but rather, took great care that this Title should never be clearly explained.

Among the things, which, contrary to all Appearance promoted the execution of King William's Undertaking, That, which I am going to relate, is one of the most surprising. He had indeed gained a Battle, which gave him Opportunity of approaching London; and tho' he could scarce have taken that City, if the Citizens and the rest of the Kingdom would have done their Duty, the Gates were opened to him, and the Crown set on his Head. But as he was crowned without the Advice and Consent of the rest of the Kingdom, he still seemed to have a great deal to do to complete the Conquest of a Country that resisted whole Ages, the Arms of the Romans, Saxons, and Danes. And yet, as soon as it was known that he was crowned at London, all the rest of England submitted to the new Sovereign, without any one offering to dispute with him the possession of a Crown, which no body knew by what Title he could claim. Probably, if the English had resolved to elect a King of their Nation, whether Edgar or any other, King William would have still found many difficulties to surmount. Let us suppose, for a moment, this King to have drawn together an Army in some remote place from London, what a Perplexity would King William have been under? He could not have removed from London and Dover, without a manifest Hazard of losing the capital City; nor have fluid at London without giving the Enemies Army time to increase. The bare mention of this consideration sufficiently shows how fortunate King William was 1666. to meet with no opposition. The Reader, of his own accord, may reflect on a thousand difficulties King William would have found in his way, if the English had determined, even after the Battle of Hastings, to make a vigorous stand. Most certainly, the more this Enterprise with all its consequences are considered, the more extraordinary and almost supernatural it appears.

1667. The new King's first care after his Coronation, was to seize on the Treasures laid up by Harold at Winchester. He distributed part among the principal Officers of his Army, and part to the Churches and Monasteries, to gain the reputation of a pious and religious Prince. The Pope had also a share, whether he had lent the King Money, or the King was willing to show his Gratitude for Favours received, when he embarked in his Enterprise. At the same time, he sent to Rome the late King's Standard, as a sort of Homage to the Holy See, and a Testimony that the Conquest of England was undertaken with the Pope's Approbation. Harold's Treasures being thus distributed, Ways and Means were to be devised to fill the new King's Coffers. To this end, it was intimated to the Cities, Corporations, and most wealthy of the Subjects, that it would not be amiss to gain the Good-will of their new Master by some Presents. Every one cheerfully consenting, these Presents yielded the King a very considerable Sum.

The King's moderation to the English, in the beginning of his Reign, gave them room to hope they were going to enjoy a solid Happiness under the Government of a Prince who seemed to have their Interests at heart. Indeed he exhorted the principal Officers of his Army to treat the Vanquished with the moderation due from one Christian to another. He entreated them to refrain from all kinds of Insults to the English, least by Injuries they should be provoked to revolt. As for the inferior Officers and Soldiers, he published severe Orders against such as should violate the Chastity of the Women, or give the least cause of complaint to the Natives. Then he confirmed by a public Edict the People's Privileges, and all the Promises he had made in that respect. If we were to judge of Princes by their Manifestoes, or the expressions in their Edicts, we should be apt to imagine, they always make Justice and Equity the sole Rule of their Conduct. But their Actions too frequently ill correspond with their Words. These sort of publick Acts seldom fail however of producing a present Effect, which is generally the only end proposed. King William found the English disposed to trust to his magnificent Promises. They were so far from taking any measures for the Preservation of their Liberties, that they suffered themselves to be seduced by this seeming Indulgence. These happy beginnings made them believe, the Conqueror, in imitation of Cæsar the Great, who behaved in the same manner, would use his utmost endeavours to gain the People's Affection, that he might enjoy his Conquest in Peace.

How great a regard however the King showed for the English, he could not forbear mistrusting them, persuaded as he was, that their Submission proceeded rather from fear than good-will. A few days after his Coronation he retired from London to Berking (1), not daring to stay in that great City, whose Fidelity he suspected. But as he was not more sure of the rest of the Nation, he placed strong Garrisons in Hastings, Dever, and Winchester, to take away from the English the Desire of shaking off their new Yoke. Mean while, these Precautions had no ill effect on their Minds. They considered them as absolutely necessary, in the beginning, of so great a Revolution, and were not at all alarmed at them. On the contrary, they who had hitherto refused to acknowledge the new King, came and submitted to him in Crowds. Edwin and Morcar, who had begun to concert measures for the Defence of their Country, altered all their Projects. As they were convinced of the King's Sincerity, like the rest of their Countrymen, they went and swore fealty to him at Berking (2). He forgot nothing that could help to keep them in this mind. He not only assured them of his Protection, but even in their Presence bestowed on Prince Edgar large pelfessions (3), who was the Idol of the English, and generally stiled England's Darling.

The Victory of Hastings was too glorious for the King to neglect to transmit the Memory of it to Posterity. For that purpose he laid the Foundations of a Church and Abbey, in the very place where Harold was slain (4), and ordered, when they should be finished, the Church to be dedicated to St. Martin (5), and the Monastery called Battle-Abbey (6). Though the desire of Prayers for his own and Harold's Soul was the Pretence he used to make this Foundation, probably Vain-glory had no less a share in it than Devotion. The three first months of this new Reign passed in this manner to the mutual Satisfaction of the English and Normans. The former believed they were no great Losers by the late Revolution, and the latter liv'd in hopes the King would perform the Promises made them, when they engaged in his Service.

King William's Precautions procuring him an universal Submission, he thought his happiness incomplete, if he had not the pleasure to go to Normandy, and appear in his new Grandeur. This Journey was not only unnecessary, but seemingly very dangerous, in the beginning of an Empire established by Arms. He imagined however he could prevent all Revolts during his absence by two Precautions. First, by placing strong Norman Garrisons in all the Castles. Secondly, by carrying along with him such of the English Lords as were most suspected. Of this number were Prince Edgar, Stigand, Morcar, Edwin, Waltheof Son of Seward, formerly Earl of Northumberland, with several others of the prime Nobility. These Lords were not over-pleased with the Honour he did them, being sensible he carried them into Normandy but as so many Hostages, and to add to the Glory of his Triumph. However, they were forced to comply, for fear of giving him occasion to suspect them by an unseasonable Opposition to his Will. Before he left England, he committed the Government of the Kingdom to his Brother Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osbern (7). There was no end of the Rejoicings among his old Subjects upon his arrival in Normandy. He spent his Easter (8) at Fescamp, where the French Ambassador (9), attended with a numerous Retinue of Nobles, came to congratulate him in his Master's Name upon his new Dignity. On this occasion, the King affected to appear before the French with all the magnificence he thought capable of advancing the Lustre of his Glory. He passed all that Summer, and part of the following Winter in Normandy, where he seemed to forget his New, amidst the Acclamations of his Old Subjects.

Whilst he was giving the Normans marks of his Affection by his stay among them, his Absence proved fatal to England. Odo his Brother, and William Fitz-Osbern, who governed the Kingdom, abused their Authority without any discretion (10). Wholly taken up with enriching themselves by all manner of means, instead of protecting the English who made their Complaints to them, they not only suffered them to be grieved with a thousand Injustices, but oppressed them by continual Acts of Tyranny themselves. To see these two Regents proceed with so little caution, one would have thought they had Orders to stir up the People to revolt, on purpose to make them incur the Punishment. The most prudent however preserved their Allegiance, in a belief that the King, at his return, would rectify these Disorders. But others, more impatient, were of opinion, they ought to take the advantage of his

"There are," says the learned Sir William Dugdale, great Errors or rather Falsifications in this Roll, which have been the Subject of some Monks of old, that, finding it acceptable unto them, to be reputed Descendants to those who were Companions with Duke William in his Expedition, therefore to gratify them, they inserted their Names into that ancient Catalogue." 1067. Absence, to attempt the recovering of his Liberty. The Kentishmen led the way; and called to their assistance Euface Earl of Boulogne, who endeavoured to surprize Dover-Castle (1). But not succeeding according to his expectation, he retired to his Ships, leaving the Kentishmen to the mercy of the Regents, who treated them very severely.

Notwithstanding this Example, Edric, an English Lord (2), to whom Historians give the Surname of Forster, took up Arms in the County of Hereford, and barbarously used all the Normans that fell into his Hands. News being brought the King, he immediately embarks for England (3), committing the Government of Normandy to Matilda his Wife, and Robert his eldest Son. His return appeased the Storm raised by his Absence. But these two Attempts filled him with so many Suspicions of all the English in general, that he began from that time to consider them as so many secret Enemies, who fought an occasion to revolt. This Opinion of his was not groundless. When one considers his Temper, and how the English stood affected towards him, it is easy to conceive, the mutual Confidence, necessary for their common Tranquillity, could hardly subsist. The King was naturally mistrustful and rigid. On the other hand, his great Armament had plung'd him deeply in debt. Besides, he was under a Promise of liberally rewarding the Officers who had engaged in his Service, and all this must be done at the Expense of the English. To this may be added, he was naturally covetous, greedy of Money, not to expend, but hoard it in his Coffers. In fine, his Partiality to his own Nation was excessive, and prevented him often from giving Ear to the Complaints of the English against the Normans, who made a very ill use of the King's Favour. On the other Side, the English were extremely prejudiced against the Normans. This Prejudice, begun in the Reign of King Edward, and fomented by Earl Godwin and his Son Harold, was farther increased since the late Revolution. How careful soever the King was to recommend Moderation to the Normans, there was no hindering them from abusing the Superiority, their Victory gave them over the English, and insulting them in their Misfortunes. This was not very proper to maintain a good Intelligence between the two Nations. Besides, the King had built his Right to the Crown upon so slight a Foundation, that the English must have considered him as a greedy and ambitious Prince, who had formed the Project of his Enterprize upon England, from the sole motive of gratifying his Passions. In a word, the Administration of the two Regents during his Absence, gave occasion to think, they would not have carried their Excesses and Rapines to that height, had they not been assured of their Master's Approbation. However, the Consideration of the mildness of his Government for the three first Months of his Reign, had in some measure caused these Reflections to vanish, and dissipated all their Fears. But when they found, after his Return, he not only neglected to punish the Regents, but even approved of their Conduct, they could not contain any longer. They every where spread their Complaints and Murmurs, and openly shew'd their Discontent. Then it was, that the King's Suspicions daily increasing, made him resolve to be on his Guard, and use all possible means to prevent the Discontent of the English from breaking out into a Flame. As his Temper inclined him to Severity, his methods were rigorous. To which he was also prompted by the Normans, whose Interest it was that he should subdue the English by Force, rather than gain them by fair means. This is the most that can be said in his Favour, though there are some, who charge him with a settled Design of reducing England to a State of Slavery, before ever he received any Provocation. Be as it will, the Confidence between the King and his new Subjects was soon broken (4), and from that time the King thought only of using all proper means to establish himself on the Throne, without nicely examining whether those means were consonant to Justice and Equity.

Reasons of the Mistrust between the King and the English.

Ready.

Matilda is crown'd. Birth of Prince Henry. Earl Wec. S. Dunelm.

Robert, Richard and William, the eldest of whom was about twelve years old.

The King had hitherto delayed to satisfy those who had voluntarily assisted him in his Expedition into England. Besides the Stipends due to them, they expected to be rewarded in proportion to their Services, and the Power he had acquired by their means. His ordinary Revenues not being sufficient for this, there was a necessity of having recourse to the English, whose misfortune it was to be vanquished. To this end, he bethought himself of an Expedient, which could not but be very ungrateful to them. And that was, to revive Dane-gelt (6), abolished by the Confessor, which brought to their remembrance the Calamities they had suffered under a foreign Power. He plainly forefaw, the People would be extremely dissatisfied, and therefore endeavoured to prevent the ill Effects of their Discontent, by caressing the principal English Lords, as far as his reserved Temper would permit. He was most apprehensive of Earl Edwin, who by his Birth, Honours, and personal Merit was in great Credit with his Countrymen. In order to prevent the Earl's using the present occasion to raise new Commotions, he thought proper to secure him to his Interest, by promising him one of his Daughters in Marriage. Edwin was very well pleased with the Offer, and instead of fomenting the dissatisfactions of the English, did all he could to appease them. Aldred, Archbishop of York was not so easily managed. This Prelate had entertained so great an Opinion of the King, that he was continually speaking in his Praise. But when he saw him begin to pull off the Mask, by renewing a Tax so odious to the Nation, he was quite of another Mind. He sent one to represent to him in his Name, the Injury he was doing the English, and the Inconveniences that might follow. The King was offended with this Remonstrance, and sharply rebuk'd the Person that dar'd to deliver it. 'Tis said, Aldred was so sensibly touch'd with this Proceeding, that he could not forbear cursing the King and all his Race. There was danger of the Archbishop's Resentment occasioning some Troubles in the North. At least the King seem'd to be uneasy on that account, by his sending one of his Officers to endeavour to appease him. But the death of Aldred, which happened at that time, freed the King from his Fears, and Dane-gelt was levied with all the Rigour imaginable. From thence forward nothing was heard but Murmurings and Complaints, which incensing the King, caused him to consider the English but as so many Rebels, as they, on their side, looked upon him under the odious Idea of a Conqueror.

Before I enter upon the Relation of the Troubles in this Reign, it will be proper to remark, the Historians are very much divided concerning the Causes that produced them. Some cast the blame on the English, and intimate the King used not Severity till he found milder means were ineffectual. Others maintain, the King's ill usage of the English was the sole Cause of their Revolts. To decide this Question, it would be necessary to examine the Extent of a Prince's Power that had acquired the possession of the Crown in the manner we have seen, and how far the Obedience of a Nation was due, who had submitted partly by Compulsion, partly of their own accord. But upon these very Points, there would be perhaps no less diversity of Opinions. 'Tis sufficient therefore to observe, that among the Historians who had writ of William the Conqueror, some have studiously displayed all his good Qualities, and but slightly touched upon his Faults. Others have endeavoured to misrepresent all his Actions, and aggravate even such as may be easily justified. So far is certain, the English were ill-treated in his Reign. This the greatest Stricklers for the Conqueror and his Race cannot deny, but alledge in his Excuse, the Necessity he was under of guarding against the English ever prone to revolt. Others, on the contrary, ascribe the ill treatment of the English solely to the avaritious Temper of the King, and affirm, their Revolts were entirely owing to their Despair. Amidst these various Opinions, the Course I shall take, will be, plainly to relate such Facts as are uncontested, without making any Reflections, that the Reader may be at Liberty to judge as he shall think proper.

As Matters stood between the King and the English, it was very hard for them to sit still and not endeavour to shake off a foreign Yoke, which to them seem'd insupportable. The Insurrections began in the Western Parts, where the Inhabitants of Exeter refused to take their Oath to the King and admit a Norman Garrison (1). William, sensible of what Importance it was to put a stop to this Evil before it spread any farther, marched in the midst of Winter to reduce Exeter to Obedience. Upon his Approach, he was met by some of the principal Citizens, to petition him for Pardon in the Name of the Corporation, and give him Hostages. But, whilst the Deputies were with the King, the ordinary sort of Townsmen being superior, disapproved of their Proceedings, and resolved to stand upon their Defence. Githa, Mother to King Harold, who was then in the City, encouraged the Inhabitants in their Resolution, and probably, was the Person that put them upon it. Mean time, the King being too far advanced to retire with Honour, found himself obliged to besiege the Town in Form, notwithstanding the sharpness of the Winter. The Approaches being made, and the battering Engines beginning to play, the Citizens saw no other Remedy but to implore the King's Mercy. How much sorer the King was bent to make an Example of them, he yielded to the Intreaties of the Clergy, who were very urgent for their Pardon (2). Githa had the good Fortune to escape into Flanders with a great quantity of Money. To prevent a second Insurrection, William ordered a Castle to be built in the City, and left it to the Care and Management of Baldwin, Son of Earl Gilbert, with a Norman Garrison.

The King could no longer delay the Payment of his Debts, and the Rewards so often promised to his Troops. The Sums raised by the late Tax of Danegels, which at first were designed for this Use, had been paid into the King's Treasury, and he could not bear the Thoughts of parting with the Money again. He believed it absolutely necessary to have a Reserve upon any sudden Occasion; especially as the Discontents of the English gave him room to dread a general Revolt. And therefore, without meddling with that Money, other means were to be used, which very much inflamed the Discontent of the English. Commissioners were sent into all the Counties, to enquire who sided with Harold, and confiscate their Estates. The English loudly exclaimed against this seemingly very unjust Enquiry. They alleged, when they took Arms for Harold, that Prince was in actual Possession of the Throne, having been elected at a time when William's Pretensions to the Crown were even unknown. That before the Battle of Hastings, they had never taken their Oath to the Duke of Normandy, and consequently their Estates could not be liable to Confiscation for bearing Arms against him: That besides, supposing they were guilty, they had made ample amends for their Fault by a ready Submission, which the King had accepted of, and even promised to protect them in their Rights and Privileges. These Reasons were very strong. But on this occasion, the King acted with a view to Politics rather than Justice. His intent was not to punish them for their pretended Crime, but to have a plausible pretence to raise Money, and withal to put it out of their Power to hurt him, by depriving them of their Estates, a thing, he judged absolutely necessary for his Safety and Quiet. Accordingly this Fact is slightly passed over by the King's Friends; and, by way of Diversion, an Act of Justice done by the King on this Occasion, is mightily extolled, namely, the restoring a confiscated Estate to an English Lord, who proved he was never in Arms for Harold (3). However, we may be assured, this was one of the most remarkable Events of this Reign, since the confiscated Lands, passed into the Hands of the Normans and other Foreigners, who thereby became more considerable in England than the English themselves. From these descended many noble Families now in being. However this be, the Confiscations were of great Service to the King upon two Accounts. First, as they enabled him to pay his Debts, and reward his Followers. Secondly, as they gave him an Opportunity of filling the Counties with such as were devoted to him, and whose Interest it was to support him in the Throne.

Whilst the King was thus guarding against the English, he daily forfeited their Esteem and Affection, and naturally led them to devise means for the Recovery of their Estates. Edwin, Earl of Northumbria, one of the most considerable among them, thought it his Duty to attempt the restoring of the almost desperate Affairs of his Country. The King had amused him with Hopes of one of his Daughters; but there was no likelihood he intended to perform his Word. On the contrary, the King seemed to want only some Pretence to involve him in the same Ruin with the rest. Morcar, his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, who was in much the same Situation, very readily engaged in the Plot. As these two Lords had a very great Interest in the Kingdom, they soon raised an Army which was reinforced by Blanchin King of Wales, their Nephew, with a good number of Troops (4). The King had reason to fear this Revolt would become general, unless he timely opposed its Beginnings. Accordingly he drew his Forces together with the utmost Expedition, before the Evil spread any farther. In his March towards the Rebels, he fortified the Castle of Warwick, and made Henry de Beaumont Governor, who was also the first Earl of Warwick (5). At the same time he built likewise Nottingham-Castle (6), to secure a Retreat in case of Necessity, by means of these two Places. Having taken these Precautions, he continued his march towards the North, to engage the Rebels, or besiege York, which had sided with them.

Mean time, the two Earls hoping the rest of the Kingdom would follow the Example of the North, were very much deceived in their Expectations. The King's great Diligence, and the Superiority of his Forces breaking all their Measures, they found themselves unable to resist him. In this Extremity, they had but two ways to take, either to fly the Kingdom, or submit to the King's Mercy. They chose the last, and found their Account in it. How much sorer the King might be incensed, he very readily pardoned them, with a View to reclaim the English by this Act of Clemency. He pursued however his March towards York, the Inhabitants whereof, little able to sustain the Burden of the War alone, came out to meet him, and delivered up the Keys of their City. By this Submission they were pardoned as to corporal Punishments; but were forced to pay a large Fine, and had the Mortification to see a Castle built in their City (7), and garrisoned with Norman Soldiers. Archibald, a Northumbrian Lord, who had been concerned in the Revolt, was also received into Favour upon delivering his Son in Hostage (8). Egelwin, Bishop of Durham, made his Peace likewise upon the same Account (9).

The King's Clemency to the Heads of the Rebels might have had a good Effect, if at the same time that he pardoned some, he had not punished others who were much less guilty. He ordered great Numbers to be shut up in Prison, who had no Hand at all in the late Insurrection (10), and thereby gave Occasion to think, the Mercy shewn to the Leaders was only a Strain of his Policy. This Conduct spread a Terror throughout the Kingdom, which was still increased, when Castles were seen building at Lincoln, Huntingdon, Cambridge, which were evidently designed to keep the English in awe. Morcar and the other Northumbrian Lords (11), dreading their Punishment was only deferred till a more convenient Season, retired into Scotland. Earl Gospatric was under the same Apprehensions, and infiltrated them into Prince Edgar, who, by his advice, fled to the Court of Scotland, with his Mother and Sisters (12). Malcolm Canmore (13), who was then on the Throne, received them with the Respect due to their Rank, and considering their 1068. Birth rather than their Fortune, married soon after Margaret Edgar's eldest Sister. From this Marriage sprung Matilda, Grandmother to Henry II. King of England, in whose Person the Saxon and Norman Royal Families were united.

1069. The King was not sorry to see himself thus rid of his secret Enemies, who gave him much less Uneasiness being in Scotland, than if they had staid in England. However, the Flight of these Lords discovering how the English stood affected towards him, he resolved to take all possible Measures to secure himself from their Resentment. For that Purpose, he took two Precautions which were equally insupportable to them. The first was to take away their Arms⁽¹⁾. The second, to forbid them any Lights in their Houses after eight a-Clock. At which Hour a Bell was rung to warn them to put out their Fire and Candle, under the Penalty of a great Fine for every Offence. The found of this Bell, called the Curfew, was for a long while very grating in the Ears of the English. When they reflected on the Sweetness of Liberty, enjoyed under their ancient Kings, they could not without extreme Grief behold themselves reduced to such Slavery. If this Order was not most punctually observed, they were sure to be immediately punished as if guilty of some heinous Crime. This Bell therefore was as a Signal, which being repeated every Day, constantly put them in mind of their Slavery. This Oppression joined to a Thousand others which they daily suffered from the Hands of the King, as well as from the Foreigners, embittered their Lives, and made them deplore their sad and helpless Condition. In this manner several Historians represent the State of the English at that Time.

Whilst the King was thus guarding against the secret Practices of his Subjects, Goodwin, Edmund and Magnus, Sons of Harold, made a Descent in Somersetshire. The only Opposition, they met with, was from Edmuth, formerly Master of the Horse to the King their Father, who was willing to give King William a Proof of his Fidelity by encountering these Princes. His Zeal for the new King proved fatal to him, for he was slain in the Battle; after which, they retired laden with Booty.

If the Historians on the side of the English may be credited, England was then in a pitiable State. The Normans supported by the King's Favor and Protection, daily committed Outrages upon the English, for which they least could expect no Redress. Others, more Friends to the Normans than the English, assure us, the English vexed that the King's Measures should put it out of their Power to shake off a Yoke which they bore with extreme Impatience, found fault with the Normans in general. They add, scarce a Day passed but the dead Bodies of assassinated Normans were found in the Woods or Highways, without any possibility of discovering the Authors of these Murders, so firmly did the English stand by one another. In all Appearance the King was persuaded, the English were wholly to blame, since he published a severe Edict, ordering, that when a Norman should be slain or robbed, the Hundred where the Act was done should be responsible for the Crime, and pay a large Fine. This Law was not new to the English. From the time of Alfred the Great, it had been in Force in the Kingdom⁽²⁾. But what extremely provoked them, was that this Edict was made in Favour of the Normans only.

How gracious fever the King might be to the Foreigners, many of them desired leave to return Home⁽³⁾. The King readily granted their Request, paying the Arrears due to them, and rewarding them beyond their Expectation. All this was done at the Expence of the English, on whom were levied the Sums necessary to defray this Charge.

Occasions of complaint continually encreased on both Sides. The King complained, the English appeared ready upon all Occasions to rebel; and the English thinking themselves unjustly oppressed, loudly murmured at it. The Northumbrians were the most impatient. We have already seen in several Parts of this History, that they were wont to be, as it were, their own Masters, and could not bear a State of Slavery. The same Spirit still reigned among them. They could not refrain expostulating upon the least Occasion, and often uttered in their Complaints with some Insurrection. The turbulent Temper of these People, and the Neighbourhood of Scotland, creating some dread in the King, he resolved to appoint them for Governor, Robert Cumin, a Norman Lord, whose rough Disposition seemed proper to tame their Fierceness. They heard this News just as a Project of calling in the Danes was going to be executed. Some of them who had taken refuge in Denmark, had persuaded King Sweyn, he might easily conquer England⁽⁴⁾. Nay, they had brought Assurances from the Northumbrians, that they would assist him in his Undertaking. Whereupon Sweyn fitted out a Fleet of two hundred Sail⁽⁵⁾, which was ready to put to Sea when Cumin with seven hundred Normans, came and took possession of his Government. As his Arrival might prove very prejudicial to the Designs formed in the North, the principal Contrivers of the Plot resolved to rid themselves of so troublesome an Inspector, with his Attendants. Though he had notice of their Intent⁽⁶⁾, he thought it so little in their Power to hurt him, that he neglected the Intelligence. Mean time the Conspirators privately drawing some Troops together, came to Durham, where Cumin lay in a careless manner, and put him and his Norman Followers all to the Sword⁽⁷⁾. Presently after arrived the Danish Fleet under the command of Osbern, Brother to the King of Denmark⁽⁸⁾. Upon News whereof all the Male-contents went and joined the Danish General, who had now landed his Troops⁽⁹⁾. Edgar Ateling, Gospatrick, Merleswyn⁽¹⁰⁾, and all the other Lords who had retired into Scotland, brought him Reinforcements, which rendered his Army very formidable. As all Northumberland was for the Danes, and the King had not in those Parts any Forces capable of withstanding so numerous an Army, Osbern marched directly to York. The Norman Garrison upon the Approach of the Danes, resolved to hold out to the last Extremity, not doubting but the King would come to their Relief with all possible Expedition. In this Expectation, they set Fire to the Suburbs at the Foot of the Castle, that the Houses might not be of Service to the Besiegers. But the Fire spreading farther than was designed, a great Part of the City was reduced to Ashes. The Cathedral-Church, the Monastery of St. Peter, and a famous Library begun by Archbishop Ebert about the Year 800, entirely perished in the Flames. Mean while the Danes taking Advantage of the Confusion, caused by this Accident, entered the City without Opposition. As soon as they were Masters of it they attacked the Citadel so vigorously that they took it at the first Assault, and put the Garrison to the Sword⁽¹¹⁾. After this, the Danish General understanding the King was preparing to march against him, went and encamped in an advantageous Post⁽¹²⁾, leaving in York Earl Walthoff with an English Garrison.

The News of this Invasion something shook the King's resolution. He was afraid the Danes were called in by a general Combination. Possessed with this Notion, he durst not quit the Heart of the Kingdom, for fear his absence should give the rest of the Male-contents an Opportunity to rise. On the other hand, it was no less dangerous to neglect the Affairs of the North, which might be attended with ill Consequences. In this perplexity, he believed it advisable, before all things, to endeavour to pacify the English by some Acts which seemed proper to that end.

(1) This doth not appear from the ancient Histories. And as for what follows about the Curfew (qu. Coverse-few, or Cover fire) Polydore Virgil is the first who mentions it. There is a Passage quoted out of William Malmsbury p. 156. to countenance that Notion, but whether it does any way confirm it, I leave the Reader to judge:—Lucernarum uilum noctibus in Curia relictis qui fuerat tempore fratris intermissus, h. e. He [Henry I.] reposed in his Court the use of Lights at Night, which had been left off in his Brother [William Rufus's] time. But is this any thing like a Curfew?
(2) In the time of the Danes, when the Body of an unknown Person was found murdered, it was taken for granted, it was a Dane, and the Hundred paid the Malt. Thus William only reviv'd an old Custom, by changing the Name of Dane into that of Norman. Baum's Hist. c. 40. p. 62. Rapin.
(3) About this time (says Ordericus Vitalis p. 572.) some of the Norman Ladies wanting their Husbands, sent for them to return, and wish'd let them know, if they returned not, they must have other Men to relieve their Necessities. Hugo de Grentemaign, who presided at Winchester; Humphrey de Tilius, Governor of Hastings; with many others, returned into Normandy. His Soldiers likewise, wearied with the Dilapidations of the Country, importuned him for their release, that they might retire to a fixed place of Abode, which he granted, and dismissed them with plentiful Rewards. The Earl coming to Durham, suffered his Men to treat the People like Enemies, killing some of the Bishop's Tenants. S. Dausen. p. 198.
(7) They flock'd to Durham in the Night, and forcing the Gates in the Morning, rushed in, and slew so many of the Earl's Attendants as they could meet with. Cumin fled for refuge into the Bishop's Palace, but it being set on fire by the Conspirators, all that were in it perished in the Flame. Of the seven hundred Normans, but one escaped. 1070. trary. Such of the Clergy as refused to comply, only gave the King what he wanted a Pretence to dispossess them and place Foreigners in their room. Moreover, he quartered upon the Monasteries, almost all his Troops, and obliged the Monks to find them in Necessaries. By this Means, he kept his Army without any Charge, and had Spies in all the Religious Houses, who watched the Actions of the Monks.

He seized the Money and Plate in the Monasteries.
S. Dunelm.
Sax. Ann.

All this not sufficing to make the King easy, he thought himself of another Expedient, which drew upon him the Imprecations of the People, and especially of the Monks. Some of his Emisaries (1) informing him that many Persons had lodged their Money and Plate in the Monasteries, he took occasion to order all the Religious Houses to be searched, and every thing of value to be seized, on pretence it belonged to the Rebels. Some Historians affirm, he did not spare even the Shrines of the Saints and the consecrated Vessels. Very probably, the Clergy's Zeal, after the Battle of Hastings, to place this Prince on the Throne, was entirely owing to the fear of losing their Effects. But on this last occasion, they had but too much Reason to perceive how greatly they were mistaken in their Politics.

Several Bishops and Abbots are deposed.

Malmsh. de Pontif.

How severely soever the King had used the Clergy, he was not yet satisfied. The great Credit of the Bishops and Abbots still making him uneasy, he resolved to be rid of the most suspected. To proceed in the least blameable manner, he sent for two Legates from Rome (2), who convened a Council at Winchester (3), where every thing passed to his wish. Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was degraded for intruding into the See, Robert his Predecessor not having been canonically deposed. This was probably a Sacrifice offered by the King to the Pope, for it does not appear he had any reason to complain of the Archbishop. The same Council also deposed Agilmer, Bishop of East-Anglia, whose See was at Helmham. Agelric, Bishop of Selsey (4), and some others, whom the King did not like, were likewise sacrificed to his Jealousy. As for others, against whom the Council had nothing to allege, the King, by his sole Authority, banished some the Kingdom, and threw the rest into Prison, without any legal Proceedings, or giving other Reason than his Good-Pleasure. After he was thus clear of all that gave him any Uneasiness, he placed in their room Normans or other Foreigners (5), for all were acceptable but English. He promoted Laufanc an Italian, Abbot of a Monastery at Cam, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury (6), and Thomas, a Canon of Bayeux, to that of York. Three of his Chaplains were made Bishops of Winchester, Helmham, and Selsey (7), and Norman Abbots were placed in the Monasteries, from whence the English were removed. This however must be said for the King, that he made choice of Persons of eminent worth to fill up the Vacancies.

Let it not be imagined that I have used any exaggeration in what has been said concerning the usage of King William to the English, or affected to follow those who made it their Business to blacken his Reputation. Whoever will be at the pains to consult the original Historians, will easily be convinced of the contrary. They will see, there is not a single Circumstance but what occurs in the Histories, written during his Life, or shortly after his Death, by Authors most desirous to justify his Conduct.

*It is therefore a groundless Assertion of some of our modern Writers, to say, this Prince never acted as Conqueror, but constantly followed the ancient Laws and Constitutions of the Realm.

The King's whole Conduct demonstrating to the English that his Design was to reduce them so low that they should never more be able to hold up their Heads, some of the principal among them thought now was the time or never, to make a vigorous Effort to prevent their utter ruin.

Frætheric, Abbot of St. Albans, was one of the most zealous to inspire his Countrymen with this Resolution, and by means of his Interest and Riches it was that a fresh Combination was formed to drive the King and the Normans out of the Kingdom. Matters were carried on with that Secrecy, that the Conspirators suddenly drew an Army together, before the King had any notice of it. This Army growing very numerous in a few Days, the Abbot of St. Albans sent for Edgar Aetheling out of Scotland, and put him at the Head of the Male-contents, by whom he was acknowledged for King, and proclaimed in all the Places they were Masters of. This bold Enterprize made the King extremely uneasy, who was ever apprehensive of some sudden Revolution robbing him of the Fruit of all his Labours. He communicated his Thoughts to Laufanc the new Archbishop of Canterbury, who advised him to deal more gently with the English; intimating the absolute necessity of a speedy Negotiation with the Rebels, lest the Flame, already kindled, should over-spread the whole Kingdom. The King took his Advice, and after many fair Promises, found means to engage the Heads of the Male-contents in a Conference at Barkhamstead. He calmly heard all their Complaints, and promised to redress their Grievances. Nay, he swore on the Holy Evangelists, to establish the ancient Laws of the Realm, which went under the Name of Edward his Benefactor. This Condescension satisfying the Male-contents, they returned to the Army to dismiss their Troops, believing they had no further occasion for them. But the King had not the least thought of keeping an Oath, which he looked upon as extorted. Presently after, he ordered a great Number of those that had taken up Arms against him, to be apprehended, some of whom were put to death, and others banished or imprisoned. Upon this Edgar fled into Scotland (8), and the rest took Refuge in Ireland, Denmark, and Norway. The Abbot of St. Albans retired to the Ile of Ely, where he died with Grief. As soon as the King heard of his Death, he seized the Goods of the Monastery, and took from thence all the valuable Effects. He was resolved to destroy it utterly, if Laufanc had not prevailed upon him to desist from his Design (9).

The King's Behaviour to the Male-contents variously wrought on the Minds of the English. Some, terrified by his Severity, resolved to endure all things, for fear of increasing their Afflictions by fruitless Attempts. Others, not so passive, determined to try all ways to free themselves from a Yoke they could no longer bear. These retired to the Ile of Ely, where was a rich Monastery, the Abbot of which was their Friend. But this was not the only Reason of their chusing that Retreat. This Place, called an Ile from its being surrounded with a Morass, was very strong, and seemed proper to shelter them from the King's Rigours, when filled with a sufficient Number of Men to defend it. Edwin and Mercar chose to join them (10), being sensible, they should be the first Victims of the King's Suspicions, and not daring any longer to trust to his Promises. Some time after, Edwin resolving to go into Scotland, where he thought he might be more serviceable to his Party, was murdered on the Road by his own treacherous Followers. Mercar his Brother found in the Ile of Ely many Persons of Quality, with Egelwin (11) and Walter, Bishops of Durham and Hersford, all resolutely bent to oppose to their utmost the despotic Power assumed by the King. Their Number being considerably increased by Multitudes of Male-contents flocking to them (12), they chose for their Leader Hereward (13), Nephew to the Abbot (14) of Peterborough, who was looked upon as the bravest and best Soldier in the Kingdom. He was banished in the Reign of King Edward, for some Outrages committed in his Neighbourhood, and retired into Flanders, where his Valour gained him great

In this Council he likewise supplies, That the Bishops and greater Abbots gave their Consents that, for the future, their Lands should be held by Knight's Service: From which time, the Bishops and Abbots, who fit before in our Councils and Synods as mere spiritual Persons, appeared henceforward in the great Councils of the Kingdom among the Lay Nobility, as the Bishops do to this day. (8) To this time may most probably be referred what Rufinus relates, That William sent a Herald to demand Edgar, denouncing War against Scotland, unless he were surrendered up. Malcolm looked upon it as a cruel and faithless claim, to deliver up his Guest and Kinsman to his capital Enemy, to be put to death, and therefore resolved to suffer any thing, rather than to do so: And thereupon he harboured and detained Edgar. Rufinus, p. 216. Engl. Edit. Folio.

(9) The Account of this Revolt is only related by Matthew Paris in the Life of Frætheric, and for that reason is by some called in question. But as he could not well have known it, it is most probable he found it in the Annals of the Monastery of St. Albans. Tyrrid observes, Edgar Aetheling could not be concerned in it, seeing he had fled into Scotland near two Years before, and did not return into England till three Years after, though this Author makes him to come back the Year before.

1071. Reputation, and raised him to eminent Posts. The Death of his Father oblig'd him to return into England, he found his Estate given to a Noblesman. He demanded Restitution, but not obtaining it by a legal Process, drove out the Foreigner by Force, and took Possession. It was precisely at this Juncture that coming to Ely to avoid the King's Retirement, he was chosen General by the Malecontents. As he had a great Reputation, and as the courageous and resolute were as much dreaded by the King, as those that dur'd not to oppose him were despised, he made the King extremely uneasy. The Honour he had just received animating him with fresh Ardour, and with a Desire to shew he was not unworthy of it, he prepared for a vigorous Defence, foreseeing he should not be long in that place without being attacked. Whilst he was laying in warlike Stores, he cas'd all the accessible Parts of the Isle to be carefully fortified, and took all other Precautions, that might render a Siege the more difficult. King William knowing whom he had to deal with, march'd with all possible speed to attack him, in expectation to surprize him unprepared. But Hereward had already taken care to oppose his Entrance into the Isle, by ordering a Castle of Wood to be run up in the Morafs, which could not be assaulted, and which denied the only Passage to the Befieged. In spite of their seemingly insurmountable Difficulties, the King was bent upon a Siege, or rather a Blockade. He was in hopes to reduce them by Famine, and have them all at his Mercy, the same thing that prevented his Approaches, being also an invincible Obstacle to their Flight. With this view he built a Bridge over the Morafs two Miles in length, by means of which he deriv'd the Befieged of all hopes of Relief (1). However, though he had now spent a great deal of time in the Siege, he was never the nearer, since the Rebels had provided great Store of Provisions. This Delay made him very uneasy, as well upon account of the Affair in hand, as because it prevented him from marching against the King of Scotland, who had taken this Opportunity to make an Inroad into the northern Counties. At length, when he began to despair of the Success of his Enterprize, a happy thought made him master of the Place.

The Monastery of Ely holding without the Limits of the Isle many Manors, from whence the greatest Part of their Revenues arose, the King was advis'd to seize them, in order to reduce the Monks to Obedience out of fear of losing them. He had no sooner put this advice in Practice, and distributed the Lands to his Counters, but Thurstan the Abbot, not being able to withstand the Clamours of the Monks, sought Means to recover their Estates. He could think of no proper Method than procuring the King's Favour by some considerable Service. To this End, he privately sent and offer'd to put the King in possession of the Isle of Ely, with all that were in it, and pay him a thousand Marks (2), on condition the seized Lands were restored to the Monastery. This offer was gladly accepted, and the Abbot performed his Promise; but Historians have neglected to inform us of the Means he us'd to accomplish it. However that be, the Malecontents were constrained by the Abbot's Treachery to submit to the King's Mercy. Hereward alone escap'd, having opened a way with his Sword through the Guards that attend'd a certain Pass. Of those that were taken in the Isle, some had their Eyes put out, or their Hands cut off, others were shut up in divers Prisons. Among these last were Earl Edgar, with Egelm Bishop of Dyham, who having been too hardly us'd to excommunicate the King (3), was sent to Abington, and there starv'd to Death (4). The Monks of Ely were likewise chastised, though they had taken all imaginable care to perform their Capitulacion. When they came to pay the stipulated Sum, for the want of a Great only, they were forced to pay another thousand Marks (5). Moreover the King quartered upon them forty Knights, for whom they were oblig'd to find all Necessaries.

Whilst the King was employ'd in the Siege of Ely, Malcolm continued his Ravages in the North (6), with a Barbarity unworthy a Christian Prince, if it was such as is ascribed by the English Historians. They call us the Scots ripped up the Bellies of Women with Child, cut the Throats of the old Men, and fill'd young Children into the Air to receive them on the Points of their Swords. But very likely, this Account is exceedingly exaggerated, as well as the Number of English Slaves, carried into Scotland, where it is pretended every Trade was confus'd with one. Gespatrie, who was then Governor of Northern Scotland, not being strong enough to resist the King of Scotland, made an Incurfion into Cumbria, where he revenged on the Scots the Calamities suffer'd by their Countrymen, on the English. This Expedition serv'd only to inflame the King of Scotland's Retirement (7), who took Occasion from thence to increase his Ravages in Northumberland. The King could not bear these Insults; but the Affair of Ely seeming of greater Importance, he was willing to see the End. As soon as it was over, he march'd into Galloway, where however, he only fatigued his Army to little Purpose. Mean time Malcolm, who was retir'd into Scotland, endeavour'd to prolong the War, in hopes, some new Troubles, of which he might take Advantage, would arise in England. The same Pol. Vrg. Reason oblig'd the King to put an End to it as soon as possible. The readiest way to succeed, as he thought, was to follow the Scots into the Heart of their Country, that the Dread of a Battle, which to them might prove fatal, might compel them to a Peace. This Resolution procur'd him the expected Advantage. Malcolm, unwilling to hazard a Battle in his own Kingdom, offering to accommodate Matters by a Treaty, he was of Opinion, he ought immediately to end a War, which the Circumstances of his Affairs made him look upon as extremely dangerous. Besides, he seem'd, ever since the Battle of Hagfinn, resolv'd never to run any Hazard. This was what had formerly prevented him from fighting the Danes, and probably the same Reason caus'd him to behave in like manner with the Scots. Be this as it will, the bounds of the two Kingdoms were settled (9), by the Treaty, and Malcolm did him Homage (10). Some English Writers (11) pretend this Homage concern'd all Scotland; but the Scots affirm it was only for Cumbria. And indeed that is most likely, since there is no appearance that Malcolm, who had not received the least Check, should humble himself to do Homage for his whole Kingdom. I am very sensible, King William is said to have a right to demand it: But this is not a Place to examine this Point, the Discussion whereof will more properly come in elsewhere.

The good Reception Malcolm gave all the English Refugees, drew great Numbers into his Dominions, where some procur'd Settlements which oblig'd them to continue there. From these are deriv'd several considerable Families at this Day in Scotland (12). Some will have it, that the English brought thither their Language, with the Titles of Duke, Earl and Baron; but Buchanan affirms, they were in use there before that Time. He freely owns indeed, that the English introduced into Scotland Luxury, Pride, Wantonness, Drunkenness and other Vices, to which he pretends, his Countrymen were Strangers before. Among the chief of these Refugees was Earl Gospatrie, who had been deprived of his Government, under colour of his being concern'd in the Death of Cumin, tho' he had since that, done the King very signal Services. He was succeded by Earl Waltheof (13), the only English Lord, for whom the King yet shew'd any Regard. But he did not keep long in his Favour, for which he was principally indebted to his Wife, who was the King's Niece.

The French had afforded King William sufficient time to settle himself in the Throne of England, without giving him the least Molestation. He hop'd therefore, as he had not taken Advantage of the late Troubles in England, they would be still less inclin'd to disturb him, after the entire Reduction of his English Subjects. But on a sudden Philip's Jealousy reviving, he could not bear to 1073. see the King of England in so prosperous a Condition. He blamed himself for being so impolitic as not to assist the English Male-contents, and resolved to retrieve his Error by attacking Normandy. He expected no doubt the English would take advantage of this Diversion to revolt, and keep the King employed in England. Whatever his Thoughts were, he suddenly invaded Normandy, without any Declaration of War. Upon which, the King went over with an Army wholly consisting of English (1), not daring to carry his Norman Troops out of the Kingdom. Besides, he chose rather to expose the English than Normans, who were absolutely necessary for the Preservation of his Conquest. With these Forces, he retook Mans and all the Province of Maine, which had lately revolted, the English glorying in faithfully serving him in Normandy, whilst in England he treated them with great Rigour. Philip not succeeding according to his expectation, soon grew weary of the War, and put an end to it by a Peace with the King of England.

Shortly after this Treaty, Prince Edgar, tired with living like a Fugitive in a foreign Country, came to the King, and, begging his Pardon, submitted to his Will. He met with a favourable Reception, and was allowed a Pound of Silver a Day. From that time he ever remained in Obedience without giving the King the least Cause of Uneasiness. If he had occasion to complain, it was not so much of the King as of the English, who, after the Death of Edward, had preferred a private Person before him. It was not Edgar that King William had deprived of the Crown, but Harold, who in all Appearance, had been able to keep it, would have left it to his Son, regardless of the Rights of the Saxon Prince. On the other hand, it must be confessed, Edgar had reason to be satisfied with the King's Clemency, who was very willing to receive him into Favour, notwithstanding the Mistrust he might justly entertain of him.

Whilst the King was in Normandy, Gregory VII, the boldest and most enterprising Pope that ever sat in the Papal Chair, sent his Nuncio to summon him to do him Homage, pretending, England was a Fief of the Holy See. He demanded likewise the Attire of Peter-Pence, which had not been paid for several Years. Some pretend the Pope's Demand, as to the first Article, was not groundless, but was the Condition, on which the King had obtained the Pope's Approbation for the Conquest of England. Others derive the Pope's Sovereignty over England from the voluntary Grant of Romefort, or Peter-Pence made to the Church of Rome by Ina and Offa, Kings of Wessex and Mercia. They pretend it was a real Tribute by which they became Feudatories to the Holy See. In fine, there are some who giving up this Pretension, content themselves with dating this Sovereignty from the time of Ethelwulf's Journey to Rome. But tho' perhaps at the time King William was meditating his Enterprize, he did not dispute the Pope's Claims, yet when he found himself well fixed in the Throne, he was otherwise disposed. He plainly told the Nuncio, he held his Crown only of God and his Sword, and would not make it dependent on any Person living. Nays, he went further: For, upon the Nuncio's daring to threaten him, he published an Edict, forbidding all his Subjects to acknowledge any Pope but whom he allowed of, and receive any Orders from Rome without his Leave. This was to make Gregory sensible, who had then a Competitor, how great a Risk he run of being fowled in his turn, if he persisted in his Claims. As for the Attire of Peter-Pence, he promised to pay what was due, and to be more punctual for the future. This Firmness convincing the Pope, the King was not swayed by superstitious Scruples, much less to be awed with Threats, he desisted from his Pretensions.

The King's long Stay in Normandy occasioned in England a seditious Conspiracy, so much the more dangerous as the most considerable of the Norman Lords were the Conspirators. Ralph de Guader, a Breton, Earl of Suffolk, and Roger de Breteuil Earl of Hereford (2), resolving to unite their two Families by the Marriage of Ralph with the Daughter of Roger (3), the King, for Reasons unknown, put a stop to their Proceedings. The Earls, who durst not complete the Marriage whilst the King was in England, took the Opportunity of his Absence to accomplish their Design. They made a splendid Entertainment upon this Occasion, to which were invited several Persons of Quality, and, among the rest, Earl Waltheff. As they knew the King's Temper, they formed at the same time the Project of a Conspiracy to depose him, perceiving no other way to avoid the effects of his Anger. The present Occasion seeming favorable to draw their Guests into their Plot, as soon as they saw them heated with Wine, they began to talk of the King, and dwelt upon such Subjects as were most likely to exasperate them against him. They pretended to pity the English, who from being always a free People, were now reduced to a shameful Servitude. As for the Normans, they stirred them up with a Consideration of the King's severe Government, who by the excessive Impositions laid on Estates, took from them with one Hand what he had given them with the other. In fine, perceiving they were heard with pleasure, they openly declared, it was unworthy of Persons of Honour to be governed by a Bastard who had usurped the two Crowns, he possessed. Their Discourse had so sudden an effect upon Men who in their Cups thought nothing difficult, that with one Consent they resolved to take Arms and oppose the King's Return. Earl Waltheff, warmed with Wine like the rest, came in to the Plot without reflecting on the Consequences. But on the Morrow, the Fumes of the Liquor being dispersed, he considered more maturely, that he had embarked in an Enterprize, which, instead of freeing the English from Oppression, could not but increase their Misery. He foresaw the Difficulties which would naturally occur in the Execution. But supposing it chanced to succeed, he plainly perceived, England would not be the better for it, since she would become a Prey to several petty Tyrants who would complete her Ruin. Moreover, he considered, in case the Conspirators were crushed, which was very probable, the Vengeance would all fall on his Head, as being an Englishman, whereas the Foreigners might find some Favour with the King. He could not likewise forbear acknowledging, he was much indebted to the King, who not only pardoned him once before, but also distinguished him by many Favours from all his Countrymen. These Reflections working in his Mind a hearty Repentance for Repent of it what he had done, he went to Lanfranc and imparted to him all that had passed. He alleged his drinking too much permitted him not to reflect on what was proposed to him, and intreated him to intercede for his Pardon. The Archbishop commended his Repentance, and advised him to repair forthwith to the King, and inform him of all the Circumstances. He put him in hopes of easily obtaining a Pardon for a Crime done with so little Pre-meditation, at such a time, and for which he was so soon sorry, and even wrote to the King in his Behalf, Waltheff taking this Advice, set out immediately and went and threw himself at the King's Feet, who received him very kindly, and pardoned his Imprudence, after he was informed of all the Particulars of the Conspiracy.

The King was very much alarmed at this News, and resolved to return into England, without delay, to appease the Troubles occasioned by his Absence. But his Presence was not necessary. The Conspiracy was stifled almost in its very Birth by the Vigilance of the Bishop of Bayeux the Regent (4). The two Earls had concerted their Measures so ill, that they could not even join the Forces, each had assembled. So that Ralph de Guader found himself constrained to retire to Norwich Castle, where he was immediately besieged. As he despaired of pardon, in case he fell into the King's Hands, he did not think fit to wait the Issue of the Siege, but finding Means to escape, fled into Denmark (5). After his Departure, his Countess defended the Castle some time, but at length surrendered upon Terms. She had Liberty to follow the Earl her Spouse, who had now procured a powerful Aid from the King of Denmark to support the Revolters. And indeed, soon after Sax. Ann. Huntingd. a Danish Fleet appeared on the Coast of England, but not finding the English inclined to rise, sailed back immediately (6).

1074. Mein time King William, being returned to England, was informed, there were still some remains of the Conspiracy in the Higham Counties (1). To prevent the Fire from rekindling, he marched with all speed to those parts, and severely punished all whom he suspected to be concerned in the Plot. Some he ordered to be hanged, others, to have their Feet and Hands cut off, or their Eyes put out. Those that were most favourably treated were banished the Kingdom. The Pardon granted Earl Waltheof going for nothing, he was apprehended, carried to Winchester, publicly beheaded and buried under the Scaffold. His Riches are said to be the principal Occasion of his Death, the King having a longing Desire to his great Estate (2). Others add, that Julius his Wife did not a little contribute to his Ruin, encouraging the King by false Reports, that the might be at Liberty to marry elsewhere. Be this as it will, the unhappy Fate of this brave Earl was universally lamented. Every one thought he was too severely dealt with for so slight a Crime, even supposing he had not obtained his Pardon. Some time after (3) his Body was removed to Croyland-Abbey (4), where it was pretended to work divers Miracles, and accordingly this Earl passed for a true Martyr. The Abbot of Croyland, encouraging this Belief, was turned out of his Monastery, by the King's Order, and Inguilphus, a Monk of Fountains, was put in his room. This is the same Inguilphus who, notwithstanding his Obligations to King William, has not failed to attack, in his History of Croyland, the Miracles wrought at Waltheof's Tomb.

The English were not concerned in the late Conspiracy, but rather refused to join the Malecontents, yet were they no less punished. The King took it for granted, they had privately fomented the Rebellion, and consequently, deprived some of their Estates, and others of their Liberty. From this time William of Malmesbury dates the Servitude of the English. As much Norman as he was, he plainly enough intimates that from thenceforward the King had no manner of Regard for them. Hence it may be conjectured, this Prince's Severity to the English was very great and universal, since this Historian reckons as a Tide, what the King had already done with respect to the Spiritual and Temporal Lords.

The Precautions taken by the King, to remove from the English all Thoughts of a Revolt, rendering him easy, he went beyond Sea, to be revenged of Ralph de Guader, who was retired to his City of Del in Brittany (5). He was not satisfied with seizing all his Estates in England, but resolved to deprive him also of his Hereditary Possessions. For that purpose, he laid Siege to Del, which however he could not take, the Resistance of the Besieged giving the King of France time to come to their Relief.

1076. King William missing his Aim, returned to England, where during the rest of that and the following Year, nothing remarkable happened, except a Council held at London, where was settled the Precedency of the Bishops.

1077. The King enjoyed then a Tranquillity which seemed to promise a long Continuance, when it was disturbed by an unexpected War. Robert his eldest Son, encouraged by the King of France (6), pretended his Father ought to resign Normandy to him, in pursuance of a positive Promise, made him, as he said, to that Purpose (7). Upon this Pretension (8) he attempted to render himself Master of the Dukedom, and even treated very ill such as refused to own him for Sovereign. The King surprized at this Audaciousness, immediately drew an Army together confiding entirely of English, for the reason before-mentioned, and passed into Normandy to put a Stop to his Son's Proceedings. Robert was not deterred from his Design by his Arrival; but vigorously opposed his Father, who saw himself forced to carry on the War in Form, finding in his own Son no contemptible Enemy. He happened one Day to fall into an Ambush, where he was obliged to expose himself as much as the meanest Officer. He hoped his Person as much as his Valour, that Robert, who distinguished himself by his Valour, the most formidable of his Enemies, assaulted him, and wounding him in the Arm, dismounted him with his Lance. The King was in great Danger of losing his Life, if by good Fortune, Robert had not known him by some Mark on his Arms. Then the young Prince, hastily alighting, raised him up, and set him on his own Horse, to rescue him from the present danger. Mean time, the English Troops being roughly handled by the Normans, the King was obliged to retreat in Disorder (9). Robert's being like to kill his Father, made such an Impression upon his Mind, that, to shew the Sincerity of his Sorrow, he submitted entirely to his Mercy. But this Generosity was not sufficient to recover the King's M. Paris. Favour, who never after had any Affection for him. Nay, 'tis said, in the first Emotions of his Passion, he denounced his Curse against him, which all the Submissions of the young Prince could not prevail with him to retract. However he gave him a kind reception: but carried him into England, on pretence to send him at the Head of an Army against Scotland. Accordingly, next Year (10) Robert was commissioned to bring the Scots to reason, who had renewed the War (11).

He did nothing remarkable in this Expedition (12), except founding the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne, in the same Place where the Abbey of Monksey stood, famous for the Authority of the Monks. This War ended in a Treaty between the two Nations.

Before the Army was disbanded, the King being desirous to make himself some amends for the Charges in raising it, turned his Arms against the Welsh, in order to chastise them for some Incursions into his Dominions (13). The Welsh Princes finding themselves unable to withstand him, voluntarily submitted, and obliged themselves to pay an annual Tribute to the Crown of England.

About this time King William built the famous Tower of London, to keep the Citizens in awe, whose Fidelity he had ever suspected (14). Some pretend, this Citadel was founded by Julius Cæsar; but it would be difficult to prove Cæsar was ever at London, and more so, that he undertook this work, of which he makes no mention in his Commentaries.

The Peace with Scotland, and the Submission of the Welsh, introduced a State of Tranquillity, which lasted some Years. The King took the Opportunity of this Calm to settle the Affairs of the Kingdom. Since his Accession to the Crown, England had been in extreme Confusion, by reason of diverse Alterations as well in the Government, as in the Laws and Methods of administering Justice. But this Confusion was still increased with regard to the Debts of private Persons. The Creditors imagined they who were put in possession of the Lands were to pay the Debts of those that were turned out, and accordingly to them were they sent by the Debtors. But the Possessors refused to meddle with Matters that were liable to so many Frauds; and maintained, the King granted them the Lands free from all Demands. Besides, the Jurisprudence of the Normans being different from that of the English there was no knowing how to proceed, the King not having yet determined any thing on that subject. If he had made any Regulations it was in cases where his own Advantage and Interest were concerned. As for private Persons, it does not appear that he had hitherto given himself much trouble about them. 'Tis true indeed, they who make it their Business to extol him on all occasions, remark the strict Justice that was exercised in his Reign, with respect to Crimes (1), as an Argument of his Affection for his Subjects. But this proof is not so strong as they imagine, for this Strictness turned no less to the King's than to the People's Advantage; as the suffering Crimes to go unpunished must tend to the Prejudice of the supreme Authority. Besides, Offences, for the most part being then punishable by pecuniary Fines, all the profit accrued to the King, who had deprived the Earls, Barons, and Bishops of the share they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings (2).

However this be, it can't be denied that the King's predominant Passion was a greedy desire to heap up Riches. He was never weary with inventing new Expedients to gratify his covetous Temper (3). We have already seen how he impoverish'd the English. But in this he acted as much or more for the Advantage of the Normans and other Foreigners, than for his own. He therefore judged it reasonable that the Foreigners who were Proprietors of the Estates in England, should be liable to the same Impositions as the English. But that he might proceed in due Proportion, he wanted to know the Value of every Person's Estate. To this end he ordered an exact Survey to be taken of the Lands, Goods and Chattels of all his Subjects. This Survey contained the Number of Acres in each Man's Estate, what he was wont to pay in the Saxon Reigns, and how much he had been taxed of late years since the Revolution. Moreover, what Stock each had of Horses, Cattle, Sheep, &c. How much ready Money in his House, what he ow'd, and what was owing to him. All this was set down in great Order in a Book called Doom's-day Book, that is, The Book of the Day of Judgment, apparently to denote that the Means of the English were sifted in that Book, as the Actions of Mankind will be at that great Day. This general Register, which some term the Great Terror, or Land-Book of England, was laid up in the Exchequer or King's Treasury, to be consulted upon Occasion; that is, as an Historian expresses it, when it was required to know, of how much more Wool the English Flocks might be feed'd. The King's strict Orders to take this Survey with all possible Exactness, were punctually executed (4), the Commissioners as well as private Persons, having Cause to dread an exemplary Punishment, in case they used any Fraud, or were guilty of the least Connivance on this Occasion (5).

We may easily guess, this Survey was not taken purely to satisfy the King's Curiosity. The Taxes laid afterwards upon almost all the Effects of private Persons, were a clear Evidence that his Intent was to leave the English no more than what was absolutely necessary for their Subsistence. This Monarch, considering England as a conquered Country, imagined himself the Proprietor of all the Lands in the Kingdom, and that the Vanquished were to receive what he was pleased to leave them, as a signal Favour. According to this Rule, 'tis easy to see, his Revenues were to be proportionable to the Estates of the English, and his own Avariciousness. Not to enter into a particular Account of the several Branches of his Revenues (6), it will suffice to observe, that it amounted annually to four hundred thousand Pounds sterling, which Sum, according to a moderate Computation, was equal to five Millions now of the same Money. Besides these settled Revenues, he had a great many Perquisites, as Mulk and Fines, which were very frequent in those Days. But what is further remarkable in this Matter, is, that none of this Money was employed in paying the Army that was kept on Foot. In the Distribution of the Lands taken from the English, the King had taken Care to charge them with the Maintenance of his Troops. The new Proprietors were very willing to accept of the Estates upon that Condition, since having no right, they were wholly indebted to his Liberality for them. By this means, he maintained, without any manner of charge to him, three thousand Men, ready to march upon the first Notice. 'Tis not at all strange, he passed for the richest Prince in his time, since his Incomes vastly exceeded the Expence of his Household, in which he spent but a small Part of the yearly Profits of the whole Kingdom.

After the King had thus settled his Revenues, he sought means to gratify another Passion, which was almost as strong as the former. I mean his Fondness for Hunting, which caused him to commit a world of unjust Acts. By these Acts I don't understand those severe Laws he made on that Account (7), though they were exceeding rigorous. This does not properly distinguish him from many other Princes, who look upon the Breaches of the Game-Laws, as a most capital Offence, and more readily pardon the killing of a Man than a Stag. What I speak of, was the prodigious Defoliation King William ordered to be made in Hampshire, by dispeopling the Country for above thirty Miles in Compass, demolishing the Churches and Houses to make a Forest for the Habitation of wild

(1) During his Reign, People could go about any where safe and unmolested, even though they were loaded with Gold; whereas before, every Wood was a Nest of Robbers. See Ann. M. Will. p. 229. Brumf.

(2) See the foregoing Digestion, p. 151. 154. It does not appear that William abolished the County, Hundred, and other Courts, (which did not grow into disuse till King John's Reign. See St. Ann. p. 261.) or that he absolutely deprived the Kaldormen or Earls of the Profits that accrued to them from Fines, &c. But he seems rather by his Laws to have confirmed them in the Possession thereof. As for the Bishops, it is certain, that, whereas they used, under the Saxon Kings, to sit in the County, Hundred, and Sheriff's Courts, with the Earl or Sheriff, and there jointly determine both Ecclesiastical and Secular Causes. King William did in the Year 1085, ordain, That no Bishop or Archbishop should for the future hold Pleas in any of these Courts, concerning Episcopal Laws or Canons; but that every one who had transgressed the Episcopal Laws, should be judged in such place as the Bishop should appoint; which gave Rise to the Ecclésiastical Courts. The Order whereby the Bishops were deprived of this valuable Privilege, and had their Jurisdiction confined to spiritual Matters, in Selden's Notes on Doomsday, p. 169; and Brady, Vol. II. p. 214.

(3) Mr. Milner owns that he was justly blameable upon that account, and that he had no regard for what he said or did, though never so unbecoming his Royal Character, so as he could be a Gainer by it. Malm. p. 112. Sax. Ann.

(4) Yet this is not to exact a Survey, as some Historians would represent it, if we may judge of the rest by what Inghulph, p. 79, relates about his own Monastery of Croyland. That the Commissioners were so kind and civil, as not to give in the true Value of it: And we may reasonably suppose that other Monasteries found the like favour. See Tyrod, p. 55.

(5) This Survey was begun in the Year 1080, and finished in 1086. It was made by Vendid or Presentment of Jurors, or certain Persons sworn in every Hundred, Wapentake, or County, before Commissioners, consisting of the greatest Earls or Bishops, who enquired into, and described as well the Possessions and Customs of the King, as of his great Men. They noted, what, and how much, arable Land, Pasture, Meadow, and Wood every Man had, and what was the Extent and Value of them in the time of Edward the Confessor, (expressed by the Letters T. R. E. l. c. Trovour Regis Edwardi) and at the time of making the Survey. This Survey was made by Counties, Hundreds, Towns or Manors, Hides, Half-hides, Virgates, and Acres of Land, Meadow, Pasture, and Wood. Also they noted what Mills and Fisheries, and in some Counties what and how many Freeman, Scoten, Villains, Bondsmen, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, working Horses, &c. in every Town and Manor, and who they belonged to. Always setting down the King's Name first, then the Bishops, Abbots, and all the great Men that held of the King in chief. Brady, p. 205, 206. [See the Light themselves in Body, Vol. I. Appendix, No. 1. and Vol. II. No. 10. and Selden's Preface to Doomsday, p. 3-5.] This Survey was chiefly intended to give the King a true Account of his own Lands or Demesnes, as also what were held by his Tenants in Capite. It is therefore no wonder, if many of those Towns or Villages, which were then held by their Feudatories or Under-tenants, are quite left out and omitted in it. Some Cities and Towns of note are not mentioned therein, as any one may find, that will but take the Pains to compare it with an exact Catalogue of the ancient Towns and Villages in England, the greatest part of which he will not be able to find there. All England (except Wessex, Cumberland, and Northumberland) was divided, with part of Wales; and the Description or Survey written in two Books, called the Great and Little Doomsday Book, now in the Exchequer. The little Book contains only Northfolk, Suffolk, and Essex. This being the highest Record in the Kingdom, it was then (and is to this day) a decisive Evidence in any Controversy in which there may be occasion to make use of it.

(6) They are set down by Brady as follows: 1. A Land-Tax, called Hidage, which he found here before his Arrival in the time of Edward the Confessor, or rather which he set up again. 2. Reliefs, or Fines for giving the Possession of Hereditary Fiefs, Affirmation of Power out of the Husband's Estate, Compulsion for Licence to marry, and to have the Wardships of Heirs, or Entrance upon Farms due to him from all Tenants in capite. Also other Fines, Forfeitures of Goods, and pecuniary Mulcts for Crimes, &c. Tolls and Customs for Passage and Portage, for Liberty of buying and selling; Excise, besides the ancient Customs upon Merchandises. 3. Green-Land, being fourteen hundred and twenty two Manors or Lordships in several Counties, besides abundance of Farms and Lands in Middlesex, Surrey, Shropshire, Staffordshire, in the last of which he had also a hundred and fifty Pounds of Kent in white Money. To which finally add Ekebates and Forfeitures. --- In short, his Revenue was so great, that Ordricus Vitalis (p. 523.) says, it was reputed to be one thousand and fifty Pounds of Sterling Money, thirty Shillings and a Penny half-penny of the just Rents and Profits of England every day of the Year, besides his Gifts and Pensions, and pecuniary Punishments, which if we reckon ten times as much now, according to the Rate of things in his time, his yearly Revenue amounted to 5,874,497 l. 16 s. 3 d. But allow it to be fifteen times so much now as then, as may very well be done, and not over-rate it, then his yearly Income was 5,811,745 l. 12 s. 1 d. 4 d. half-penny, besides Free-gifts, Fines, and Amercements for Offences. Brady, Vol. II. p. 202, 211, 212.

1080. ticular from a worse Motive. They pretend, his Aim was to enslave the English by causing them to commit Offences which were generally punished by Mults and Confiscations to his use. But supposing this were not so, as it must be confessed it cannot be proved, his covetous Temper, and all his other ways to heap up riches, are but too just Grounds for such an Accusation.

Remark on the English Language.

To return to the Norman Language. There are those who affirm that in spite of all his Pains the King could not introduce it into England. On the contrary, they maintain, the Normans by Degrees learnt to speak English, their small number being carried away by the Bulk of the Nation. Others, who are of a contrary Opinion, endeavour to demonstrate the Norman Tongue was established upon the Ruins of the English. But it is difficult for either to prove their Assertions. Thus much is certain, the Language spoken in England after the Conquest, was not exactly the same with what was used in the time of the Saxon Kings. However, the Normans can't be said to learn English, or the English to admit of Norman, but rather out of the two Languages was formed a third, which was neither one nor other, but partook of both. Nevertheless, all publick Acts were in Norman till Edward the Third's Time (1).

The King's Partiality for the Normans.
In. 1. ph.
p. 86.

The King's Partiality to the Normans was so great, that he could not forbear showing it upon all Occasions. Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, gives us an instance which deserves Notice. He says, he appeared one Day before the Council, where the King was present, to demand certain Lands belonging to his Monastery (2), then in possession of Talboys a Norman, who had settled there some Monks of his own Nation. The King, continues the Historian, examining the original Charter or Grant of the Abby-Lands, judged at first that the Demand was right and just. But Talboys alleging in his Defence, that the Monks settled on these Lands were Normans, and hearty Friends to the King, whereas those of Croyland were English; this single Argument was sufficiently strong to induce the King to give Sentence in favour of the Norman. Herein, he was biased by his natural Inclination and Interest. The former made him favour his own Nation, and the latter inclined him to put it as much as possible out of the Power of the English to revolt.

Od. ap. p. 209.

What has been hitherto said of the Oppressions of the English, suffices to show, they did not complain without Cause. Perhaps their impatient Behaviour occasioned these Oppressions. But, be this as it will, 'tis certain they were extremely impoverished, whilst they beheld the Normans enriched by their Spoils. A single instance will demonstrate, how much they were pillaged by those who were most in Favour with the King. Od. Bishop of Bayeux, his half-Brother, after an abode of fifteen or sixteen Years in England, thought himself rich enough to purchase the Papacy. To that end, he bought a stately Palace at Rome, where he designed to reside, and convey all his Treasures, that he might be ready upon the Pope's Death to put his Design in Execution. Mean time, as he was willing to conceal his Intentions, he took the Opportunity to begin his Journey during the King his Brother's absence in Normandy, and went to the Isle of Wight, where his Ships lay ready for him. Contrary Winds preventing him from embarking so soon as he expected, he was forced to remain some time in the Isle. His Stay there broke all his Measures. The King having Intelligence of his Design, came over with all speed, and surprised him just as he was going to sail. He ordered him to be seized immediately. But finding Fear and Respect hindered his Officers from doing their Duty, he laid hands on him himself. In vain did the Prelate plead the Privileges of his Order. The King told him, he seized him not as Bishop, but as Earl of Kent, and commanded him to Prison. This Seizure was quickly followed with a Confiscation of all his Effects to the King's Use, the Prelate being convicted of numberless Exactions and Rapines (3).

Nothing remarkable happening in the rest of this, and the next Year, I shall proceed to the Occurrences of the Year 1084, in which we meet with the Death of Queen Matilda (4), and the King's Preparations against an Invasion he was threatened with. The English who had taken refuge in Denmark, persuaded King Cnut that their Countrymen waited only for an Opportunity to throw off the Norman Yoke. The present Juncture seeming very favorable, he formed a Project to conquer England, to which he had some Pretensions. That, being supported with Force, appeared very plausible. To this end he fitted out a Fleet (5), and levied Troops, whose Numbers plainly showed he had some great Design in hand. Those Preparations gave King William some uneasiness; the advices from Denmark putting it out of doubt that this Armament was designed against him. As he durst not confide in the English, he brought into the Kingdom a numerous Army of Foreigners (6), and laid upon his Subjects a Tax of six Shillings upon every Hide of Land, which was three times as much as Dane-Gelt used to be. Whether Cnut was diverted from his purpose by the Preparations in England, or by some other unexpected Affairs (7), he gave it over without making any Attempt. The King, on his part, disbanded his Army (8); but the Money, levied for their pay, was not restored. On the contrary, he imposed a new Tax, on Account of the Order of Knighthood, he intended to confer on Henry his youngest Son (9). The Norman Custom of making the Prince Prefects, when he knighted any of his Sons, tended too much to the King's Benefit for him to neglect to introduce it into England, where it was never practised before (10).

It was not difficult for the King to lay what Burthens he pleased on his Subjects, since he was sure to be obeyed in whatever he enjoined. The Normans took care not to oppose his Will, for Fear of losing their Estates the same way they acquired them, I mean, by a bare Act of his good Pleasure; and the English were unable to throw off his oppressive Yoke. There was scarce a Lord of that Nation, but what was imprisoned or banished. If any still preserved their Liberty, they were watched so narrowly, that the least Opposition, or the least Suspicion given the King, was sufficient to ruin them. Edgar Atheling, who seemed the most formidable, subdued entirely upon his Pension from the King. Besides, since his voluntary Submission to the Conqueror, he had forfeited the Hearts and Affection of the English, who looked upon him now with the utmost Contempt. An Historian even assures us, he was in some measure stupid. And for proof alledges, that for a Horse presented him by the King, he remitted the Pension given him for his Livelihood. The ill State of his Affairs, and perhaps the Fear of falling a Sacrifice to the King's Suspicions, made him resolve to go into the East and bear Arms against the Infidels (11). The King readily giving him Leave, he set out attended with two hundred Knights, who having lost their Estates in England, were willing to seek their Fortune elsewhere. Having spent two Years in the Eastern parts, where, 'tis pretended, he signalized himself by many brave Actions, he returned to England, regardless of the Estates and Honours offered him by the Emperor of Constantinople.

As for Pleadings in French, they were in use only in the King's own Court (now called the King's Bench) or else in the Exchequer; but in inferior Courts in the County, where for the greater part of the Law-Books of the Kingdom was dictated, it was otherwise. The antient Law-Books we have, viz. Glauville, Bracton, and Fleta, are in Latin; the first that we can find in French being Breton, and Henri's Mirror of Justice, both which were written in the time of Edward I. when it became very much the Fashion to write, not only our Laws in French, but our very Parliament-Rolls of Edward III. and great part of Richard II.'s Reign in that Language. 1086. was grown so corpulent and unwieldy, that a quiet Life seemed absolutely necessary for him. But he was far from any such Thought. All on a sudden he is seen to make extraordinary Preparations, which plainly shewed he was meditating some great Undertaking. Philip, King of France, easily guessed this Armament was designed against him. And indeed, quickly after, King William sets out for Normandy, in order to make fierce War with France (1). But Philip prevented the impending Storm, by offering Proposals, which were followed by a Truce. The King, whose Corpulency was extremely troublesome to him, taking this Opportunity to go through a Course of Physick, a Jett of King Philip occasioned the breaking of the Truce. This Prince asking one that was come from Roan, Whether the King of England was delivered yet of his great Belly? King William, being informed of it, sent him Word (2), as soon as he was up again, he would come and offer in the Church of Notre-Dame at Paris, ten thousand Lances by way of Wax-lights (3). His Words were soon followed by Deeds; for marching in the very hottest time of the Summer (4), he ravaged le Vexin in a terrible Manner, and then laid Siege to Mantes. He was so provoked, that after taking the City, he reduced it to Ashes, without sparing the very Churches, in one of which two Hermits were burnt (5). The warmth of the Season, and the great Fire, which he stood very near to see his Orders executed, threw him into a Fever, which interrupted his Progress. This was attended with another Accident, no less fatal to him. Whilst he was on the Road in his return to Roan, leaping a Ditch on Horse-back, he so bruised the Rim of his Belly against the Pommel of the Saddle, that the Violence of the Blow very much increased his Fever. After this Accident, not being able to mount his Horse, he was carried in a Litter to Roan, where he grew worse and worse. As soon as he found he was near his End, he began seriously to reflect on all the past Actions of his Life, and view them in a different Light from what he had hitherto done. He ordered large Sums to be given to the Poor and the Churches, particularly for rebuilding those he had burnt at Mantes. He set at Liberty all the Prisoners, among whom were Morcar and Ulfeth (6). This last, Brother to King Harold, had been detained in Prison in Normandy from his Childhood, when he was given in Hoflage by Earl Godwin to Edward the Confessor. It was much more difficult to obtain the like Favour of the King for the Bishop of Bayeux his Brother, because he had sworn never to release him. However he was prevailed upon by the Importunities of the Bishop's Friends (7). His Distemper, which daily increased, leaving him no hopes of Recovery, he ordered his principal Officers to stand round his Bed, and notwithstanding his Weakness, made them a long Discourse, wherein he greatly extolled the Reputation he had gained by his warlike Actions. Nevertheless, he could not forbear owning, he had unjustly usurped the Crown of England, and was guilty of all the Blood spilt upon that Occasion. Adding, as he would not presume to bequeath a Crown, which of Right did not belong to him, he left it to God's Disposal: but if he might have his Wish, William, his second Son, should wear it after him. In his Will, which he made just before he died (8), he left Normandy to his eldest Son Robert, not so much out of Affection (9), as because he foresaw great Obstacles in the Execution of his Will, should he have ordered it otherwise. Henry his third Son, had for his share an Annuity of five thousand Marks (10), with all his Mother's Effects (11); this was all his Portion. It is said, the young Prince complaining that he was so ill provided for, the King told him, by a prophetic Spirit, he should one Day be King of England, and excell his Brothers in Glory and Riches. But one can hardly believe, God so intimately revealed himself to such a Prince as this (12).

Though the dying King left his Crown to God's Disposal, he did all that lay in his Power to procure it for his second Son. He wrote upon that Subject to Lanfranc a very pressing Letter (13), which he ordered his Son William, even before his Death, to carry himself. No doubt, he thought that Prince would meet with too strong an Opposition in England, in case necessary Measures were not taken beforehand, to gain the Consent of the Normans and English. Having thus settled his Temporal Affairs, he caused himself to be removed to Herneville, a Village near Roan, that he might be more at Liberty to think of his Spiritual Concerns. Here this Prince ended his Days on the 9th of September, in the Sixty-fourth Year of his Age, after a Reign of Fifty-two Years in Normandy, and Twenty-one in England (14). If some of his Historians are to be credited, he expiressed on his Death-bed a hearty Sorrow for all the Injuries he had done the English. His Body was removed to Caen without any Ceremony, and deposited in the Abby-Church, built by himself, where he had chosen to lie. Robert his eldest Son, being then in Germany, and William in England, his youngest Son Henry took care of his Funeral. The Corps was but meanly attended for so great a Prince, his principal Officers having abandoned him before he expired, some to make their Court to Robert, others to William (15). An extraordinary Adventure rendered the Funeral of this Monarch very remarkable. Just as they were going to lay him in his Grave, [Anselm Episcopus] a Norman Gentleman, stands up and forbids the Burial in that Place, claiming the Ground as his Inheritance, and alleging, the deceased had built the Church upon it, without paying him for it. Whereupon, they were forced to stop, according to the Laws of the Country, in order to examine this Pretension; which proving well grounded, Henry was obliged to make the Gentleman Satisfaction (16), and then the Corps was interred (17).

Thus lived and died William I. surnamed the Bastard and Conqueror, if this last Title may be justly ascribed to him, which all Historians are not agreed in. They that maintain this Title perfectly futes with him, ground their Opinion upon his having no Right to the Crown, and the Severity of his Government, which was all along Arbitrary. Others affirm, his Election entirely cancelled his Right of Conquest. This uncertainty gives Occasion to compare him to the Emperor Augustus, of whom it is said, that he came to the Empire neither by Conquest nor Usurpation, nor Inheritance, nor Election; but by a strange mixture of these Rights. However this be, or in what manner soever King William may be accused or justified upon this Head, he kept Possession of the Throne, by such Politick Methods, as are practised by the most able Princes, but which are seldom consonant to the Maxims of Justice and Equity.

This Prince's Character is variously drawn by the Historians, according to the different Faces, under which they were pleased to view him. Some considering him only as a Conqueror of a great Kingdom, extoll him to the Skies for his Valour and Prudence, and slightly pass over the rest of his Actions. Others considering the same Conquest as a real Usurpation, and reflecting chiefly on the Means, he made use of, to preserve it, scruple not to represent him as a real Tyrant. It is certain, they may be all in the Right, since there was in this Monarch a great Mixture of good and bad Qualities. He was reckoned one of the wisest Princes of his Time. Ever vigilant and active, he showed as great Resolution in executing, as Boldness in forming his Designs. He saw Danger at a distance, and generally endeavoured to prevent it. But when that could not be done, no Man faced it with greater Intrepidity. On the other Hand, his extreme covetous Temper, and Partiality to his Countrymen, led him to the commission of many things, which can hardly be justified.

(1) He would have been, long before, revenged of the King of France, for assisting his Son Robert, and exciting him to frequent Revolts; if he had not been afraid of a Civil War in Normandy, which might have been attended with another in England; both which would have found him more work than he could well have dispatched. But at last, in the Year 1086 they came to blows. Robert was the occasion of it; for he revolted again, and retired to the King of France, who furnished him with Troops, wherewith he ravaged Normandy. W. Genuin, l. 7. c. 43. *P. (17) William Rufus caused a most rich Monument to be erected for his Father, before the High Altar of St. Stephen's Monastery, which was adorned with Gold, Silver, and precious Stones. This costly Monument stood till the Year 1562, and then Chastillon taking the City of Caen, certain Soldiers opening it, and not finding the Treasure they expected, broke it to pieces, and threw about William's Bones; some whereof were afterwards brought into England by the Monk in the Year 1684, in the Face thereof, caused a plain Altar Tomb to be built. See the Figure of it in Sax. Ann. p. 7.

1087. In his younger Years, he was handsome and well proportioned. He had rather a stern and majestic, than a mild and taking Countenance; however, he could sometimes put on such Sweetness and Gentleness in his Looks, as was hardly to be refuted. We may guess his great Strength and Vigour from Historians assuring us, none but himself could bend his Bow. The same Historians are very much divided concerning his Chastity. Some say, he was very much addicted to Women in his Youth: Others tell us, his little Inclination that way, gave occasion to call his Manhood in question. Some affirm, after he was married, he never gave his Queen cause to be jealous. Others assure us, he kept for his Mistress a Clergyman's Daughter, whom Matilda ordered to be ham-strung. Be this as it will, after he was on the Throne of England, Hunting was observed to be his sole Diversion. His Household was perfectly well regulated; but his Expenses were not answerable to his Greatness and Riches. Nevertheless, upon solemn Occasions, he loved Magnificence, and took a Pleasure in appearing in all his Grandeur. Seldom did he fail of being crowned every Year (1), at the three great Feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, which he generally spent at Gloucester, Winchester, and Westminster. During these Festivals he kept a splendid Court, was much more easy of Access and liberal of his Favours. The great Men of the Kingdom (2) were usually about him whilst these Solemnities lasted; but one can hardly believe it was in order to hold a Witten-Gemot or Parliament, as some do pretend (3). And indeed, there is no likelihood, that after depriving the English of their Estates, he should leave them in possession of the greatest of their Privileges. It is still less probable he would transfer this Right to Foreigners, since he was at liberty to grant them the English Estates on what Terms he pleased. Now it is certain, his Temper was such, that he would never voluntarily render himself dependant on his own Subjects. However this be, if the Saxon Witten-Gemot subsisted in his Reign, it may at least be affirmed, its Authority was very limited, and its Nature very different from what it had been.

There are Historians who greatly commend this Prince's Clemency, on account of his being very often satisfied with punishing the English Rebels, by the Consecration of their Estates. It cannot be denied, what they say is true, with regard to Persons of the first Rank. Indeed, except Earl Waltheof, who was publicly beheaded, and Egelwin Bishop of Durham, who was starved in Prison, we don't find any of the principal English Lords put to death in this Reign. But his Clemency with respect to Persons of a lower Rank can not be justly extolled. It is certain he punished great Numbers with Death, put out the Eyes or cut off the Hands of many others, and condemned Multitudes to perpetual Imprisonment for very slight Crimes. All the Historians unanimously upbraid him with the Death of Earl Waltheof, as an Action the most heinous; since he beheaded him for what he had already pardoned. But this Severity was in some measure balanced by his Moderation to Prince Edgar, who had furnished him with sufficient Pretences to sacrifice him to his Jealousy. Perhaps, the little merit of this Prince was the sole Motive of this Moderation: since the King never considered him as a very formidable Rival. However, I think, he ought to be praised for his Clemency in this respect, since the motive is unknown. How little formidable soever Edgar might be, with regard to his personal Qualities, he can't be denied to be so on account of his Birth. He was the only surviving Prince of the Royal Family of the Saxons, and as he served for a Cloke to several Insurrections, the King could not be entirely assured of him.

King William had by Matilda, Daughter to the Earl of Flanders, four Sons and five Daughters. Robert was Duke of Normandy. Richard was killed by a Stag in the new Forest, or as others say by a Distemper caught in hunting of which he died in his Father's Life-time (4). William mounted the Throne of England, and was succeeded by Henry his Brother. Cicely his eldest Daughter was Abbess of the Holy-Trinity at Caen. Constance was married to Alan Fergant Duke of Bretagne. Adela was Wife to Stephen Earl of Blais, and by him had a Son of the same Name, whom we shall see King of England. Adeliza, promised to Harold, died young (5). Alphonso King of Galicia married the fifth, whose Name was Agatha (6). She is said to remain a Virgin after Marriage, and, being entirely devoted to the Service of God, spent her Days in the constant Exercise of Prayer (7).

Note (9). The same is also confirmed by the late learned Mr. Nadew. At his Court, and more especially at some solemn Times in the Year, the King held his Great Councils, and ordinarily transacted such Affairs as were of great Importance, or required Pomp and Solemnity, according to the Custom of the Times. See p. 178. Note (6). The Baronage attending on his Royal Person made a considerable Part of his Court. They were his Honorary; they held their Barons of him; he was their Sovereign or chief Lord, and they were his Men as to Life, Limb, and earthly Honour. With them the King consulted in weighty Affairs, and did many solemn Acts in their Presence, and with their Concurrence. Madax. Hist. of the Exchequer. p. 2--6. The Places at which King William is recorded to have held his Court are as follows: In the Year 1069, at Tork. (Ord. Vitalis.) In 1072, at Winchester at Eggher; and the Whitsuntide following at Windsor. In 1074, at Wymmsbury. (S. Dunelm. p. 209.) In 1084, at Gloucester, he held it (de more) at Gloucester. II. The most remarkable Occurrences not mentioned by Mr. Rapin are these: 1. King William brought the Jews from Rouen to inhabit in England. Stow's Chron. p. 101. 2. In his Reign, or much about that time, Sirames came first to be used. 3. Trial by Battail was introduced into this Kingdom. 4. The Normans brought in a new way of creating Knights; and also the Use of Seals and Writings in all Deeds and Instruments. Before that time, or at least before the Reign of Edward the Confessor, the Persons concerned only set down their Names, with a Cross before them. Ingulph. p. 70, 71. Lastly, the Normans brought in the shocking Vice of common Swearing. In the Year 1076, there was an Earthquake in England; and a Frost in the beginning of November, till the middle of April. In 1077, Aug. 14, there was a very great Fire in London. *Sax. III. As the Translator intends to give a short Account of the Coin in every Reign, he begins with observing, That, probably, the Britons never coined any Money, but in Cæsar's time used only Iron Rings and Shagpels Pieces of Brass, and that even their Tribute-Money was the ordinary current Coin brought in or minted here by the Romans, as long as this Island continued a Province. For among the many thousand Roman Coins, there was never one undoubted Æthel Coin yet produced, though of Candelæ being liable to manifold Objections. After the Saxons were settled in England, their first Coins were generally all of a size and ill-matched, which they called Pennies, worth about three-pence of our Money. They had also Half-Pennies and Farthings, (as appears from the Saxon Gold) and Half-farthings, called Siccas. Of which kind Bishop Nicolson takes those brass pieces to be that were found Am. West since at Rapin in Yorkshire, and communicated by Sir Edward Blakel the Owner to several curious Antiquaries. After the Norman Conquest, a Pound of Gold being divided into twenty four Gerats (or half Ounces) and every Gerat into four Grains, the old Stirling, (as it was afterwards called) or Æthel Standard of Gold, consisted of twenty three Carats, and three Grains and a half of fine Gold, and half a Grain of Alloy of Copper or Silver. Again a Pound of Silver being divided into twelve Ounces, and every Ounce into twenty Penny-weight; and every Penny-weight into twenty four Grains, a Pound weight of Old Stirling consisted then (as it does now) of eleven Ounces two Penny-weight (of fine Silver), and eighteen Penny-weight of Alloy. The first eight Kings after the Conquest continued to coin Money much like their Saxon Predecessors, only a little lighter (for of the Saxon Pennies, there were at this day that which weigh more than a Penny-weight, whereas few of those of the Norman Kings reach twenty two Grains till Edward I. when the English Pennies were to weigh a Penny-weight. The Normans also continued to coin like the Saxons as to Inscriptions, having found the King's Head his Name and Title, which was very short, only REX or REX ANGL and on the Reverse the Name of the Mat-

1088. He added, Justice it self required the Crown to be given to the first-born, to which he had a lawful Right, and of which he had not deserved to be deprived. These Considerations were strengthened with Assurances of the Uprightness and Generosity of Robert. He set forth his mild and gracious Disposition, which put them in hopes of enjoying, under his Government the Tranquillity they so earnestly longed for.

Whether Birth-Right had any Weight with these Lords, or William's ill Temper made them wish for a new Master, they readily came into the Prelate's Measures. Each promised to do his utmost to promote the Design, provided Robert would exert himself likewise, and bring over Supplies from Normandy. The Norman Lords, who were in the Conspiracy, beset themselves so effectually, that they quickly gained almost all the Leading-Men of their Nation. As soon as the Bishop was secure of the Assistance of his Countrymen, whom he judged much more capable of serving Robert than the English, he sent that Prince word, that nothing was wanting but his Presence, with a Body of Norman Troops, to recover the Crown unjustly usurped by his Brother. As this News could not but be very agreeable to the Duke, he came immediately to a Resolution upon so advantageous a Proposal. But as he had not Money sufficient to defray the Expenses of so great an Undertaking, he borrowed [three thousand Pounds] of his Brother Henry, for which he mortgaged to him the Country of Cotentin (1).

As soon as the Norman Lords were certified of Robert's Resolution they began to stir (2). The Bishop of Constance with his Nephew Maubray (3), made themselves Masters of Bath and Berkeley Castle, and stored Bristol with Ammunition, intending that Place for their chief Magazine. Roger Bigod in Norfolk, Hugh Grantmell in Leicestershire, seized several Places. Roger de Montgomery (4), William Bishop of Durham (5), Bernard of Newark (6), Roger Lacy, Ralph Mortimer seized Worcester. In a word, there was not a Lord among the Conspirators but what fortified himself in some City. Had Robert arrived at that Time, probably he would have dethroned his Brother. But his natural Slothfulness, and unbecoming Expences made him lose so fair an Opportunity. On the contrary, the King, who was of a quite different Temper, omitted nothing to stifle the Conspiracy, whilst his Brother's Indolence afforded him Time. The most effectual Means, he made use of, was the gaining the English to his Side, in which Lanfranc's Interest was very serviceable to him. This Prelate, who in the late Reign had shown great regard for the English, made use of their Confidence in him, to induce them to assist the King in so urgent a Necessity. By his Solicitations and Pains, he reclaimed the Conspirators, and persuaded the rest to continue firm to the King (7). So that, in a very short Space William was enabled to send out a Fleet, whilst with an Army of Englishmen (8), he marched against Odo his Uncle, whom he justly considered as the Ring-leader of the Rebels. The Prelate had fortified himself in Kent, where he had made himself Master of Rochester and Pevensey. As soon as he heard of the King's Approach, he shut himself up in Pevensey (9), where he was in hopes to hold out a Siege, 'till the Duke of Normandy should come to his Relief. But as he was more hot than courageous, and for want of Fore-sight, had even neglected to provide Things necessary for his Defence, the Town was taken in a few Days (10) by the furious Assaults of the King. Odo could obtain his Pardon upon no other Terms but the procuring the surrender of Rochester, where the chief of the Norman Lords were shut up, under the Command of Eustace Earl of Boulogne. To this Purpose he was conducted to the Gates of Rochester, where he feigned to persuade the Governor to deliver up the City. But Eustace observing by his Looks, that he did not speak from his Heart, detained him Prisoner, and so furnished him with a plausible Excuse for the Breach of his Promise.

William despairing of becoming Master of Rochester, this way, was obliged to besiege it. He was six Weeks before the Town without making any Progress (11), the Besieged defending themselves with such bravery, that he began to lose all hopes of Success. But at length a contagious Dis temper, which daily weakened them, compelled them to desire a Capitulation. It was no easy Matter to agree upon the Terms. At length, after many Debates, the King granted them the Liberty to march off with their Horses, without hopes of being ever restored to their Estates and Employments. The Bishop of Bayeux, being reduced to a very low Ebb, retired to the Duke of Normandy, who committed to him the Administration of his Affairs. The Siege of Rochester had furnished the Duke with a fair Opportunity to make a Diversion in some other part of the Kingdom. But by an inexcusable Negligence, he lost the Advantage of so favorable a Juncture. Instead of going himself into England with Forces proportionable to the Greatness of his Enterprize, he contented himself with sending a single Ship with some Soldiers, who were all taken and drowned (12).

William being Master of Rochester, marched his Army towards Durham, to chastise the Bishop, who was one of the Rebels. As the Garrison was very Weak, the City was quickly obliged to surrender, and the Bishop with all that had taken Arms against the King, were banished. Thus, this Conspiracy, which seemed so dangerous, was crushed by the Vigour and good Conduct of the King, who equally made use of Prudence and Force to bring the Rebels to Reason. He not only gained by his Address Montgomery (13), but also several other Norman Lords, whose Defection was very prejudicial to Robert's Party. By his secret Emisaries, he made them sensible, they were extremely in the wrong to act against him: That, seeing they held their Estates by Virtue of the same Right that procured him the Crown, it was manifestly their Interest to support him. On the other Hand, he gave an Instance of the greatest Prudence in beginning with his Uncle's Destruction, who was the Author of the Conspiracy. But his Success on this Occasion was chiefly owing to his Diligence.

As the English had showed themselves ready to assist him in his Necessity, they expected a suitable Reward. But it was not long before they perceived they flattered themselves in vain Hopes. Whilst he wanted their Assistance, he gave them fair Words; but as soon as he saw himself well settled in the Throne, he forgot his Promises. He even began to oppress them with several Impositions; in which he showed still less Moderation than the late King. He was gently admonished of these Proceedings by Lanfranc, who could not forbear putting him in Mind of what he had promised. How careful soever this Prelate might be to make use of the most respectful Terms, William was extremely offended, and asked him in an angry Tone and with an Oath, Whether he thought it possible for a King to keep all his Promises? From that time the Archbishop was quite out of Favour, neither did the King ever afford him any kind Look. But his Disgrace was of no long Continuance. He died quickly after, lamented by both Nations, as one of the most worthy Prelates, promoted to the See of Canterbury ever since the Conversion of the Saxons.

Whilst Lanfranc was alive and at Court, the Presence of so venerable a Man was some Check to the King's vicious Inclinations. But as soon as he was clear of this Prelate, who had an awe over him, he threw off all Restraint. More especially he gave a loose to his natural Desire of heaping up Money in order to squander it away in a vain and extravagant Manner. Avaricious without Frugality, Covetous and Prodigal at the same time, continually scraping up Money without ever filling his Coffers, he was always in Want, and under a Necessity of inventing perpetual new Ways and Means of raising Money. One of his Methods, never before practiced in England, was to seize the vacant Benefices. He was not satisfied with having the First-Fruits, but appropriated the whole Profits to himself for several Years to-1088. together without filling them. And after conveying away every thing that was convertible into Money, he sold them for pilled to such as had highest, without regarding the Measure or Capacity. As soon as the Archbishopric of Canterbury was vacant by Laufane's Death, he seized the Temporalities, and kept them in his Hands four Years. He did the same with the Bishoprick of Lincoln, and all others that became void in his Reign. This Prince's Historians, most part Monks or Ecclesiasticks, bitterly inveigh against him upon this Account. They so frequently insist on this Point, that there is no room to doubt, it was one of the principal Motives, which induced them to blacken his Reputation to the utmost of their Power. However this be, these Proceedings occasioned loud Clamours among the Clergy; but they were disregarded by the King. It was in vain, they carried their Complaints to the Pope. The Court of Rome, as Matters then stood, durst not intermeddle in this Affair. The Church was rent by a Schism, wherein England was yet unengaged. Besides, Urban II., to whom the English Clergy made Application, was then projecting the Recovery of the Holy-Land, in which Enterprize he intended to engage all the Princes of Christendom. He was not possible therefore for the Pope, nor consistent with his Interest, to fall upon William, at such a Juncture.

1090. The Monarch had reason to be satisfied with the Possession of a Crown, which he had no right to expect. The single consideration doubtless, ought to have bred in him too much regard for his Brother Robert, as might have helped to make him easy under the Injury he had done him. But neither Duty nor brotherly Affection could balance in his Mind the desire of becoming Master of all his Father's Dominions. He no sooner saw himself settled in the Throne of England, but he formed a Design to conquer Normandy. Perhaps, to his Avidity was added the Desire of being revenged for the Duke his Brother's Attempt to dethrone him. Be this as it will, after making extraordinary Preparations, the Intent of which Robert never suspected, he made a Descent in Normandy. He immediately became Master of St. Valeri, Albemarle and some other Places, whilst Robert was unprovided of Forces to oppose this Invasion (1).

The pressing Necessity, the Duke was in, of applying to a Foreign Power, obliged him to implore the Protection of the King of France, who came in Person to his Assistance. But he reaped no great Advantage from thence. William, who understood how to use Cunning as well as Force, found means to make Philip his Friend (2), who retired without doing any thing, leaving Robert exposed, as before, to the Insults of his Brother. By the King of France's Retreat, the Duke's Affairs were in a worse condition than ever, for relying on that Aid, he had taken no other Measures. William took from him several other Places, and bribed certain Burglers of Rean, who promised to deliver the Metropolis of Normandy into his Hands (3).

Mean time, Robert was in great Straits (4). He had no other Refuge than the Assistance of Henry his youngest Brother; but he had little Reason to expect any favour from him. Henry was exasperated at the Duke's taking Possession of Caen without paying what he owed him, and was preparing to do himself Justice by Force. Nevertheless, Robert's Promise to make him Satisfaction, as soon as the War was ended, disarmed him, and even engaged him in his Quarrel. This Aid came very seasonably, to free the Duke from his present Danger. Henry hearing of the Plot that was contriving at Rean, suddenly entered the City, and seizing Caen Chief of the Conspirators, threw him headlong from a Tower. By this bold Action, he quashed the Conspiracy, which, had it taken effect, would have robbed the Duke of his Capital, and probably, of all his other Dominions.

1091. The Union of the two Brothers, and the ill Success of the Rean Conspiracy, put a stop to William's Progress, who, quickly after, was obliged to conclude a Peace with the Duke. The Articles of the Treaty were, that Robert should deliver up to the King the Country of Ex and Towns of Fecamp and Cheburgh, with all the Places he had taken on the Coast of Normandy. William on his part, obliged himself to assist him in reducing the Province of Maine which had revolted, to restore to the Normans all their confiscated Estates in England, and to grant certain Fiefs to his Brother in the same Kingdom. Lastly it was agreed, if either of the two Brothers died without Heirs, the Survivor should succeed to all his Dominions. This Treaty was solemnly sworn to by twelve Barons on each Side, and the Brothers seemed perfectly reconciled.

But if these two Princes were pleased, their younger Brother was not so. He was not only omitted in this Treaty, but found Robert by no Means disposed to keep his Word with him. Incensed at this Treatment, he thought he might lawfully right himself some other way, and, on a sudden, surprized Mount St. Michael. This unexpected Blow startled Robert, who not caring to leave a Place of that Importance in the Hands of his Brother, desired William's Assistance to retake it. Though William had no Concern in this Affair, he readily accompanied Robert (5) to the Siege, or rather Blockade of this Place, situated on a Rock, which the Sea, by flowing round it twice a Day, renders inaccessible.

Whilst the two Brothers lay before Mount St. Michael, William, as he was riding alone at some distance from the Camp, chanced to see two Horsemen (6) coming from the Town. As he was of an impetuous Temper, he rid up to them to try to take one of them Prisoner, that he might be informed of the State of the Place. The Soldiers, finding themselves attacked by a single Person only, stood upon their Defence, and in the first Encounter his Horse was killed under him, and himself thrown on the Ground with his Foot intangled in the Stirrup. This Accident would have cost him his Life, if, the Moment one of the Soldiers was going to kill him, he had not cried out, Hold, Rafael, I am the King of England. Upon which, they were struck with Fear and Respect, and helping him up, gave him one of their Horses. He nimbly leaped into the Saddle, and then addressing himself to the Person that dismounted him, Come, said he to him, thou shalt be my Soldier for the future, and enjoy the Reward of thy Valour.

Though the Siege went on but slowly, Henry was driven to great trials for want of Water. However, as he knew Robert's good Nature, he did not despair of some Relief, by representing to him, it would be more glorious to subdue him by Arms than by Thirst. Robert, who was naturally generous, sent him immediately a Tun of Wine (7), with leave to supply him with as much Water as was necessary. William upbraiding him as guilty of Folly in this Complaisance, What, replied he, is the Quarrel between us and our Brother of that Importance, that we should desire he should die with Thirst? We may have Occasion for a Brother hereafter: but where shall we find another when we have destroyed this? But William not at all pleased with this, as he thought, unfeeling Generosity, quitted the Siege and returned to England. However, Robert persisted, notwithstanding all Difficulties, to carry on the Siege, 'till the Place was surrendered upon Terms. Henry having Liberty to go where he pleased, wandered up and down for some time without any fixed abode, attended only by a Chaplain and three or four Domesticks.

About the same time Robert banished Edgar Atheling Sax. Ann. out of Normandy, and William forbade him ever returning into England. The Cause of his Disgrace is unknown; it is only said, he retired into Scotland, his only Refuge in his Misfortunes.

Whilst William was employed in Normandy, Malcolm King of Scotland took advantage of his Absence, to make an Incursion into Northumberland (8), from whence he had carried away a great Booty. The northern People loudly complained of the King's amusing himself beyond Sea, whilst his Frontiers were plundering by Foreigners. These Complaints apparently hastening his Return, he was no sooner arrived (9), but he made great Preparations to be revenged of the King of Scotland. But fearing his Brother Robert, who was become Master of Mount St. Michael, would take Advantage of his Absence and seize his Castles in Normandy, he desired him to come and join him. He pretended, his Valour and Experience were absolutely necessary to put an honorable End to the War. But to engage him by a more powerful Motive, he promised as soon as the Affair was over, he would punctually perform his part of their late Treaty. Robert being prevailed upon by this Promise, and the good Opinion the King his Brother seemed to have of him, speedily repaired into England and attended him to Scotland.

The Success of the War did not answer William's Preparations. The greatest part of the Fleet, fitted out to annoy the Coasts of Scotland, was destroyed by a 1091. Storm (1), His Army suffered no less in marching over the Morasses and Mountains. The want of Provisions in those almost desolate Places he was engaged in, and the Roads, grown impassable by Reason of the bad Weather, visibly destroyed so many of his Men, that he often repented of this Expedition. He would have been very hard put to it, by these Accidents, had not Malcolm been apprehensive of the ill Consequences of a War, that had drawn the Enemy into his Country. And therefore, choosing rather to oblige William to leave Scotland by fair means, than venture to drive him thence by Force, he sent him Proposals (2), which being gladly accepted, were soon followed by a Treaty of Peace. The Conditions were, that Malcolm should pay William the same Homage his Father had done. That twelve Manors, held by him in England before the Rupture, should be restored to him, and that William should pay him yearly twelve Marks (3) in Lieu of all other Claims. Prince Edgar, who was employed in this Negotiation, behaving to the satisfaction of both Parties, William and Robert received him into Favour, and he had leave to return into England. The Duke of Normandy was in hopes the War being over, the King his Brother would seriously think of satisfying him. But perceiving at length he fought only to amuse him, he returned Home (4) in great Anger, taking Prince Edgar along with him.

Whilst William was in Scotland, Robert Fitz-Hamon, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, conquered Glamorganshire in South-Wales. He had served Joslyn, Lord of Glamorgan, against Rees King of Wales, on certain Terms, which the Welsh Lord refused to execute, after the War was ended. This Breach of Faith causing Fitz-Hamon to resolve to right himself by Arms, he drew his Friends together, attacked Rees, slew him in the Fight, and seized his Country. Twelve Knights, who accompanied him in his Expedition, were rewarded, each with a Manor which they and their Posterity enjoyed (5).

The next Year, Prince Henry took by Surprise Danzon, a small Town in Maine, where he retired in Expectation of a better Fortune.

The frequent Irruptions of the Scots into the northern parts of England, convincing the King of the necessity of stopping their Progress by a strong Barrier, he ordered the City of Carlisle upon the Tine to be rebuilt. This City which had been destroyed by the Danes, and lain two hundred Years in Ruins, was peopled again, and endowed with great Privileges which it enjoys to this Day (6). The Episcopal See of Dorchester was removed to Lincoln, and that of Wells to Bath about this Time, with the King's Consent, which was purchased with a round Sum of Money.

This Monarch was become so absolute, that he met with no Opposition to his Will. Taxes and Impositions were renewed every Day on divers Pretences. Nothing happened but what the King made an Occasion to levy Money upon the Cities, Burroughs, private Persons, without favouring the Normans any more than the English. None daring to oppose these Oppressions, the People expected no other Remedy for their Evils, but the Death of the King, which they heartily prayed for in private. A Diffemper, which seized him at Gloucester (7), gave them hopes their Prayers were going to be heard. He himself thought, he had not long to live. The Approach of Death, which to him seemed certain, and the Exhortations of the Bishops about him, threw him into Reflections, which were followed by some Signs of Repentance. He appeared firmly resolved to correct the Mismanagements in the Government, if it pleased God to restore him to his Health. The Bishops improving these good Motions, admonished him to fill the vacant Benefices. They represented to him what an Obstacle it was to his Salvation, to apply the Church's Revenues to Uses contrary to the Intent of the Donors. The Condition he was in, made him readily comply with whatever was desired. He nominated Robert Blet, one of his Counsellors, to the Bishoprick of Lincoln, and for Archbishop of Canterbury, made choice of Anselm, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, who was then at the English Court. It was with great difficulty that Anselm was prevailed upon to accept of this Dignity. He was a zealous Asserter of the Rights of the Church, and as he knew William was not very scrupulous in these Matters, he dreaded the taking upon him a Burden, which to him seemed too weighty in such a Reign. However the Persuasions of the Bishops, and seeming Repentance of the King, brought him at length to a Compliance. Before he was consecrated, he requested the King, to restore to the Church of Canterbury all that belonged to it in Lanfranc's time; which was positively promised. Mean time, William, finding he was out of Danger, and perceiving he daily gathered Strength, used Delays, to avoid restoring the Church-Lands. At length, as the Archbishop pressed him continually upon that Subject, he frankly declared his Intent was, that the Persons to whom he had granted the Lands should enjoy them, they and their Posterity. He even told the Archbishop, he expected his Consent. But Anselm would never be brought to this Compliance, which he looked upon as a downright Persecution. Hence the great Contest between the King and him, which occasioned a world of Trouble to both.

In the mean time, William, whose Repentance proceeded entirely from the Fear of Death, finding himself perfectly recovered, forgot all his Promises, and fell to his former Courses. The Prisoners, commanded to be freed, were, by his Order, more closely confined, and those that were set at Liberty, were again thrown into Prison. Extortion, Injustice, and Rapine, were as prevalent as ever. The Administration of Justice was in the Hands of such as took more Care to enrich themselves, than discharge the Duties of their respective Offices: All were poor, but those who had the fingering of the publick Money. To be in Favour with the King, it was necessary to be without Honour or Conscience. None but Informers met with Encouragement. These Disorders forced many honest Men to resolve to quit the Kingdom and seek elsewhere that Tranquillity they could not find in their native Country. But even this Liberty, which they imagined they could not be abridged of, was denied them by an Edict, forbidding all Persons to go out of the Kingdom without the King's Leave.

Whilst England was in this wretched Condition, Malcolm King of Scotland, came to Gloucester, according to an Agreement made with William, to settle some Affairs that were left undetermined in the late Treaty. As soon as the King had notice of his Arrival, he sent him word, that he expected before all things, to receive his Homage. Malcolm replied, he was ready to do it on the Frontiers of the two Kingdoms, according to Custom. William, not satisfied with this Answer, let him know further, he would have it done in Gloucester, the Vassal not being to appoint where he was to do his Homage. Malcolm, looking upon this as a Pretence to affront him, returned home without seeing the King, provoked at the haughtiness shewn him. He was no sooner in Scotland, but he began his Revenge with invading Northumberland. This was the fifth time he had ravaged that Country, revenging on the innocent Subjects the Wrongs pretended to be received from the Sovereign. Robert de Mowbray was then Governor of the northern Parts. He was a Person of Courage and Conduct, and, finding the King's Forces were too remote, took upon him speedily to remedy the Evil, his Government was inflicted with. He drew together a Body of Troops with such Diligence, that he fell on the Scots when they thought themselves most secure. This unexpected Attack throwing the Scots into Disorder and Confusion, they ran away without making scarce any Resistance. Malcolm and Edward his eldest Son, vexed to see their flying Troops, and endeavouring to rally them, were both slain on the spot. The Scotch Historians pretend the English ow'd their Victory to a notorious Treachery (8). Perhaps it was because the Scots suffered themselves to be surprized. However this be, this fatal Battle was the occasion of numberless Evils to Scotland shortly after. Malcolm had with him a General called Walter, to whom, in Reward of his Services, he had given the Office of Steward Upon which Edward his Son falling too rashly upon the Enemy, received a Wound of which he soon after died. See Malcolm, p. 103.

1095. Sterling. The Count of Eu chusing to vindicate his Innocence in single Combat against his Accuser, and being overcome, was condemned to lose his Eyes, and be castrated. William of Arden accused of the same Crime, was sentenced to be hanged, though he protested his Innocence with his last Breath. All the rest were condemned to divers Punishments, not one escaping.

The King was no sooner out of this Trouble, but he fell into another, occasioned by the renewal of his Differences with the Archbishop of Canterbury. He had no great Regard to the Church's Immunities, which Anselm too haughtily supported. This Prelate had even presumed to acknowledge Urban II. for lawful Pope, though he very well knew the King was rather inclined to Clement his Antagonist. In vain was it represented to him, that by a Law made in the late Reign, no Person was to acknowledge a Pope without the King's Consent. This Argument was of no Force with him, who pretended the King had no Right to meddle with Ecclesiastical Affairs. But upon what Ground did he himself pretend to determine for the whole Church of England? The King, for his Part, was not willing to give way to his Subject, and as he began to treat him a little roughly, Anselm desired leave to go to Rome. William at first denied him, but at length, contented, being glad to be clear of him. However, not to let him depart without further Marks of his Displeasure, he sent an Officer after him, who overtaking him just as he was going to sail, ransacked his Baggage, and took away all the Money he could find, pretending it was against the Law to carry the Coin out of the Kingdom. After Anselm's Departure the King seized the Temporalities of the Archbishopric, and enjoyed them as long as he lived. This Prelate continued some time at Rome, where he did all that lay in his Power to stir up the Pope against the King. But at length, finding, Urban did not care to engage in his Quarrel, he retired to a Monastery at Lyons, where he remained till William's Death.

Urban II. was then going to discover the grand Design which he had been long revolving in his Mind. I mean, the famous Crusade, undertaken for the Recovery of the Holy Land out of the Hands of the Saracens (1). This great Affair is so well known, that there is no Occasion to defend to Particulars. It will be sufficient to remind the Reader, that Peter the Hermit first set this Project on Foot; that Pope Urban II. preached it himself at the Council of Clermont, and that numberless Persons of all Nations and Ranks in Europe zealously embarked in it. The Badge of those that engaged in this Undertaking was a Red Cross wrought in their Habit, and worn on the right Shoulder, from whence they were called the Croisiers [or the Crossed], and the Expedition, the Crusade. Their Motto was, It is God's Will. The Heads of the Croisiers were, Hugh of France (2), Godfrey of Bouillon, Raimund of Toulouse Count of St. Giles, Robert Earl of Flanders, Baldwin Earl of Hainault, Bohemond Prince of Tarentum, Tamercr his Nephew, and Robert Duke of Normandy (3). This last burned with a Desire of distinguishing himself in this War, which made so much noise in the World: But Money was wanting to defray the necessary Charge. The only Means he had to supply this want was to borrow a Sum of the King his Brother (4), and give him Normandy for his Security (5). William gladly received the Proposal. But as his Kingdom was exhausted by the great Levies of Money already raised, he was forced to recur to new Methods. The readiest way, as he thought, was to defire the richest of his Subjects, particularly the Nobility and Clergy, to furnish him with the Sum required. His Request being equivalent to a Command, such as were unwilling to comply were forced to it, without respect of Persons. This Compulsion gave the Lords a Pretence to treat their Vassals in the same manner, and oblige them to contribute to the King's Wants. Several Ecclesiasticks not having by them what was demanded, were, or pretended to be, under a Necessity of melting down the Church-Plate, and even the Shrines of the Saints (6).

Let us here reflect a Moment, on the different Temper of these two Sons of William the Conqueror. The first makes a Confidence of oppressing his Subjects to supply the Charges of an Expedition approved by all the World, chusing rather to mortgage his Dukedom than raise the Money upon them. The other makes no scruple to extort Money from his People, to acquire a Good, of no Advantage to them, but purely to gratify his Ambition. Hence we may judge how great an Injury the Conqueror did the English in preferring the younger, to the elder Brother.

As soon as Robert was gone, William taking possession of Normandy (7), demanded of the King of France the French Vexin (8), which he pretended belonged to the Dukedom. This Pretension occasioned a War, which, having nothing remarkable in it, ended the next Year in a Treaty of Peace.

The great Ease wherewith William had lately acquired Normandy, served only to inflame his Desire and set him upon the Conquest of Wales. To that end, he made, on some other Pretence, extraordinary Preparations, imagining he could not fail of Success, as he hoped to surprise the Welsh. He resolved to extirpate all the Males of that Nation, whose Neighbourhood had all along been very troublesome to the English. But the Honour of this Conquest was not reserved for him. Though by the Assistance of some Deserters, he penetrated a good way into that difficult Country (9), he lost more of his own Men than he destroyed of the Enemies. So that he was forced once more to desist from this Undertaking, without doing any thing considerable.

Shortly after, a new Revolution in Scotland, made him resolve to send an Army thither under the Command of Edgar Atheling. Donald, who was driven out of Scotland, finding means to re-enter, compelled Duncan to leave the Kingdom, and established himself in the Throne. The greatest part of the English Historians pretend, that William, as Sovereign Lord of Scotland, made himself Judge of this Difference. They add, that doing Edgar, eldest Son to Malcolm Canmore the Justice due to him, he ordered his Troops to march into Scotland, and put that Prince in Possession of the Crown. However this be, without staying to examine the Matter, I shall only say, Edgar Atheling by help of the English Army, placed young Edgar his Nephew on the Throne of his Ancestors. William could not undertake this Expedition in Person, the Revolt of the Province of Maine, obliging him to go thither (10) and lay Siege to the Capital.

During the King's Absence, Wales was again exposed to the Insults of the English, or rather Normans, who began to be confounded with the English. Owen, a Welsh Lord, Father-in-law of Griffith and Cadogan (11), Kings of Wales, having been disoblged by his Sons-in-law, privately invited the Earls of Chesler and Shrewsbury into his Country, promising them a great Booty. The two Earls levying some Troops, were received by Owen into Wales, where they committed unspeakable Cruelties. The two Kings surprised by this unexpected Attack, were forced to fly into Ireland, and leave the Country to the Mercy of the English. Their Flight giving their Enemies an Opportunity to continue their March, they penetrated as far as the Isle of Anglesey, where they destroyed all with Fire and Sword. Whilst they were exercising their Cruelties, Magnus King of Norway, who had lately made himself Master of the Isle of Man, advanced as far as Anglesey. As he offered to hand, the English endeavoured to hinder him, and the Earl of Shrewsbury (12) was slain in the Skirmish. His Death was looked upon as a just Judgment for the horrid Barbarities committed by him in the Isle. This Accident causing some Disorder among the English Troops, they were constrained to abandon the Shore. Magnus, landing in the Island and finding the English had left nothing to plunder, re-embarked, and the English retired laden with Spoil.

These little Advantages were not capable of balancing the Evils the English suffered this same Year. Besides a great Scarcity, occasioned by bad Weather, which lasted several Months, the King laid heavy Taxes upon them, so much the more grievous, as the Money was to be expended in Works that were unnecessary, or at least might have been deferred to some other Time. He not only rebuilt London Bridge, which had been carried away by an unusual Flood, but chose this time of Scarcity for other

How spacious soever this Hall was, William, at his return from Normandy, thought it too little, and said it hardly deserved to be called a Bed-Chamber, in comparison of the Extent he designed it. It is affirmed, he undertook this Building purely to raise Money, and for the same Reason resolved to pull it down and build it larger, but was prevented by other Affairs.

About Midsummer the next Year, William, as he was hunting in New Forest, was told by a Messenger that Helias Count de la Flesche, had surprized and taken the City of Mans, and was then besieging the Castle, which would soon be forced to surrender, if not timely relieved. This News obliging him to break off his Sport, he sent the Messenger back that instant, ordering him to tell the Besieged he would be with them in eight Days. At the same time, he turned his Horse's Head towards the Sea-side, crying out, He that loses me, follow me, and arrived at Dartmouth that very Day, where he would have embarked immediately. But the Wind was so contrary, that the Master of the Ship represented to him, he could not put to Sea without manifest Danger. Tybb, replied the King, set forward, thou never yet heardst of a King that was drowned: And compelling him to sail, he safely arrived at Barfleur. On the Morrow he sent for the Troops he had in Normandy, to attend him on the Road to Mans, and in a few Days marched to the Relief of the Besieged. By this extreme Diligence, he surprized the Besiegers in such a manner, that he not only relieved the Castle, but took the Count of Flesche Prisoner. Exulting at his Success, he could not forbear jelling on the Misfortune of his Enemy. But the Count, far from being cast down at what had happened, fiercely replied, He had no Reason to glory in an Advantage which he had gained by Surprize, adding, were he at Liberty again, he would let him see, it would not be so easy a matter to vanquish him another time. The victorious King, piqued with these bold Words, sets his Prisoner free upon the Spot, telling him, He desired no return, but exhorted him to do his worst. After this, returning to England (2) with the same Expedition, he went and pursued his Diversion, which this Affair had interrupted.

The same Year the Croisets took Jerusalem by Storm, and put forty thousand Saracens to the Sword. When they came to elect a King to govern the Country conquered upon the Infidels, the Majority of the Leaders of the Christian Army gave their Votes for Robert Duke of Normandy. But this Prince, for Reasons unknown, refused this Dignity (3). Whereupon, the famous Godfrey of Bouillon was chosen, who by his Valour and Conduct, had greatly contributed to the Success of that Expedition.

Fortune seemed to take a Pleasure in heaping Favours on William. After having acquired the Possession of Normandy by a happy Chance, which he had no room to expect, an Opportunity was put into his Hands of becoming also Master of the Dutchy of Guienne and Earldom of Poitou. William Earl of Poitiers, animated by the Example of so many Princes engaged in the Holy War, resolved to join them, and lead a powerful Reinforcement to the Croisets. As this Design could not be executed without great Expence, he applied to the King of England for the Sum he wanted, offering to mortgage his Dominions (4) for his Security. William readily cloving with so advantageous a Proposal, speedily raised the Money. He designed to carry it himself to the Earl, that he might at the same time, take Possession of his Dominions, consisting of Guienne and Poitou, two of the richest Provinces of France. Whilst he was preparing for his Voyage, he had a mind to take the Diversion of hunting in New-Forest, where an unforeseen Death put an End to all his Projects.

It is said, as the King was going to mount his Horse, he was told a certain Monk had dreamt a Dream which portended some great Misfortune to him. As he gave out little heed to such Prejages, he answered jestingly, he plainly saw the Monk wanted Money, so ordered him five hundred Shillings, but however sent him word to dream better Dreams for the future (5). Whether this is to be considered as an Omen, or the pure Effect of Chance, it was that very Day fulfilled. Towards the Evening William having wounded a Stag, was pursuing him full speed, when Walter Tyrrel, a French Knight (6), shooting at the same Stag, pierced the King through the Heart, upon which he fell down dead without speaking a Word (7). The Murderer, though he knew his own Innocency, fled for it however, without any body endeavouring to seize him. Every one was busy about the King, whose Body was laid in a Cart, which accidentally came by, and carried to Winchester, where it was buried the next Day. Henry his Brother, fearing the Measures, he had taken to secure the Crown, might be retarded, dispatched the Funeral as soon as possible, which was celebrated without much Ceremony, no one lamenting the loss of a Prince so little beloved.

Thus fell William Rufus on the second of August of the Year 1100, in the forty fourth Year of his Age, after a Reign of twelve Years, ten Months and twenty Days. His tragical Death, in the very Place where his Brother and Nephew (8) perished by no less extraordinary Accidents, gave occasion for many Reflections. It was publicly said that God was pleased to take Vengeance upon the Conqueror's Family for his destroying and laying waste the Country in so prodigious a manner to make the New-Forest. But there is no need to have recourse to the Father's Faults; enough might be found in the Son, not to wonder at his perishing by an uncommon Death. Accordingly Historians, without hesitation, rank William Rufus among those Princes, who are no great Ornament to the Throne of England.

This Prince had all the Vices of his Father without his Virtues. William I, balanced his Faults, by a Religious outdye, a great Chastity, and a commendable Temperance. But by the Description given of his Son by Historians, it appears, he was neither Religious, nor Chaste, nor Temperate. He was profuse to his Favourites and Soldiers, and Magnificent in his Buildings and Cloaths. It is said, his Valet bringing him one Day a new pair of Breeches which cost but three Shillings, he fell into a Passion (9), and ordered him never to bring him any but what cost at least a Mark. It is added, he was contented with a pair not worth so much, being valued to him at a Mark. If we may believe those who have writ his Life, he had neither Honour nor Confidence, nor Faith nor Religion, and that he took a Pride in appearing as such. It is related that one Day [fifty English] Gentlemen accused for hunting and killing the King's Deer (10), having passed through the Tryal of the Fire Ordeal untouched, he swore, He could not believe God was a just Judge, since he protected such sort of People. Eadmer, who liv'd in his time, says, the King took Money of the Jews at Ransom, to compel such as were baptiz'd to return to Judaism (11). Malinbury adds, William ordered some Bishops and Rabbies to meet together and dispute in his Presence upon Religion, promising the Rabbies he would be circumcised, if their Arguments seemed to him stronger than those of the Christians. Indeed, the Historian says, it is to be supposed this Promise was only in merriment. He is charged with denying a Providence, and openly maintaining that Prayers addressed to Saints were vain and impotent.

But to judge impartially of the Testimony of these Historians, who were all either Monks or Ecclesiasticks, it must be considered they may very possibly, have drawn

(4) The Monk dreams that he saw the King gave a Cross to his Teeth, and that as he was about to bite off his Legs, the Image spunk'd him to the Ground, and as he lay groveling on the Earth, there came out of his Mouth a Flame of Fire, with abundance of Smoke. Malinb.

(5) Ord. Vitalis calls him a rich native of Poitou, a valiant Knight, dextrous in Arms; and therefore very intimate with the King, by whom he had been invited over. See Malinb. p. 126. P. Blesensis, p. 310. After the Fact, he eloped into Normandy. Keston, p. 237. Tyrrel, p. 108, 109.

(6) The Circumstances of this Matter are thus related by Sir John Hayward. As the King was hunting at Chirvington in the New-Forest, he struck a Deer lightly with an Arrow; and they'd his Horse to look after the Deer, holding his Hands before his Eyes to keep off the Sun beams which dazzled his sight; another Deer crossing the way, Sir Walter Tyrrel shooting at it too carelessly, or too feebly at the King, hit him full in the Breast. Mr. Tyrrel observes, though Florence of Worcester, Malinbury, and Simon of Durham, (who wrote within forty Years after this Accident) do all agree in the Place and Person who had the Misfortune thus to kill this Prince, yet there are Authors of that very Age, who not only doubt, but positively deny that this Tyrrel had any hand in it. Eadmer says, Whether the arrows were shot at him, or, as most affirm, flew from his falling down upon it. His Tomb of Grey-marble (which was raised from the Ground) remains at this Day in the midst of the Choir of Winchester Cathedral. This Monument being broke open by the Parliamentarians in the Reign of Charles I, was found to contain the Dust of that King, some Relicks of Cloth of Gold, a large Gold-Ring, and a small Chalice of Silver. The Reader may for a Draught of this Tomb in Sandford's Gen. Hist. p. 23.

(8) Keston says, That he made the killing of a Deer a capital Crime; whoever killed a Hare was fined twenty Shillings, and a Rabbit ten Shillings. p. 471.

(9) This Story is thus related: A young Jew being converted, as is said, by a Vision of a Saint, his Father presented the King with fifty Marks, petitioning him to make his Son return to his old Religion. The King desired for the young Man, and commanded him to add to him, as he would, which he refusing to do, and wounding the King, who was a Christian, should propose such a thing to him, he was to be gone. The Father perceiving the King could do no good upon his Son, desired to have his Money again. Nay, said the King, I have taken pains enough for it; it is however, that thou wilt be bene kindly I will give thee, thou shalt have one half, and the other half thou shalt not be Conscience dry for my Part. Eadmer, p. 47.

him in blacker Colours than he deserved. For he was the first King of England that seized the Church's Revenues, without regarding the Clamours of the Clergy. This was unpardonable with them. Their strong Prejudices against him on that account, might perhaps make them think, that a Prince, guilty of so heinous a Crime, must have been without Faith or Religion. This Conjecture may be supported by observing that the Writers, who charge him with Prophaneness, produce no other evidence than some public Rumours. As for Incontinency, which he is also accused of, they allege no Instances, nor so much as name any of his Mistresses, though the Amours of Kings are not easily concealed. It is true, they father a Battard Son upon him, called Bertrand (1). But this alone would not have been sufficient to put them so much out of Humour, had not his other Actions, which more nearly concerned them, stirred their Choler. However, this is only a Conjecture, which the Reader may value as he pleases. Nevertheless, as I find in the Life of this Prince but few laudable Actions to balance these Accusations, I do not see how he could possibly be justified, since all the Historians unanimously agree in saying so much ill of him.

His ordinary Revenues were probably the same with his Father's. But as he ran into many more needless Expenses, he often increased them by extraordinary Impositions, which were very frequent in his Reign. To these were added the Profits of the vacant Benefices, which brought him very large Sums. At the time of his Death, he had in his Hands the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, the Bishopricks of Winchester and Salisbury, and twelve rich Abbies, besides many other Benefices of less value. When, after enjoying the Incomes some Years, he thought fit to dispose of the Benefices, he never regarded the Merit of the Persons, but only the Sum they bid for them. However, it is related, that one Day two Monks striving to out-bid one another for a rich Abbey, he perceived a third standing by, of whom he demanded how much he would give? The Monk replied, he had no Money, and, if he had, his Conscience would not suffer him to lay it out in that manner; whereupon the King told him, swearing by St. Luke's Race, his usual Oath, that he best deserv'd it, and should have it for nothing.

Ranulph Flambart, a Man of mean Birth, was his Treasurer, and the Contriver of most of the extraordinary ways practised by the King to extort Money from his Subjects. He was rewarded for his Services with the Bishoprick of Durham, conferred on him by the King a little before his Death.

Among his charitable Works are reckoned, the Hospital he founded at York, and a Church in Southwark for the use of the Monks called de Charitate (2).

This Prince was of a middle Stature, but being very fat, look'd shorter than he was. His Hair a deep yellow, inclined to red, his Eyes of two different Colours, speckled with small black Spots. He was generally of a very ruddy Complexion. Though he was far from being Eloquent, he talked a good deal, especially when angry. His Countenance was severe, and his Voice strong, which he would exalt sometimes on purpose to frighten those he was speaking to. He is said however to converse affably enough with his Courtiers, who easily found the way to soften his fierce Temper.

Historians relate several extraordinary Accidents in this Reign, as Earthquakes (3), Comets, and a Spring which ran Blood three Days together (4). But what caused the most Damage was, first a great Fire in 1092, which burnt down great part of London. In the next Place, the Sea rising to an extraordinary height (5), overflowed the Coast of Kent, and swept away abundance of People and Cattle. This Inundation covered the Lands that belonged formerly to Earl Godwin in the Reign of Edward the Confessor. This Place, called at this Day Godwin's Sands, is famous for Shipwrecks innumerable.

Malmibury observes of the Reign of William Rufus, that notwithstanding Men's Minds were turned to War, yet Excess and Sensuality prevailed in a very scandalous manner among the Nobility, and even among the Clergy. Vanity, Lust and Intemperance reigned every where, says that Historian. The Men appeared so effeminate in their Drefs and Conversation, that they shod themselves Men in nothing but their daily Attempts upon the Chastity of the Women (6).

(1) Bede is the only one (as far as can be found) that mentions this Child. But the Monks give King William a bad Character as to his Incontinency. Brompt. p. 900. M. Paris, p. 485.

(2) Also of an old Monastery in the City of York, he founded an Hospital for the support of poor Persons, and dedicated it to St. Peter. This Hospital was afterwards augmented by King Stephen, and by him dedicated to St. Leonard. Sir J. Hayward in the Life of Will. p. 220.

(3) In the Year 1089, it was followed by a Dearth.

(4) At Exchester in Devonshire, Malmib and other Historians say, it ran for a Fortnight together. Malmib. p. 124. Hornged. p. 278. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 225. affirms, it ran for three Weeks together. In 1091, there was so terrible a Storm at South-west, that it blew down above six hundred Houses, and several Churches in London. It took off the whole Roof of St. Mary le Bow Church, and carried it a good way. There were four Beams in it twenty six Foot long, that fell with such force in one of the Streets (which were not then paved, but a smooth Ground) that they sunk above twenty Foot in the Street. As they could not be pulled up again, People were forced to saw them even with the Ground. S. Dunelm. p. 217. Hornged. p. 462. See Straw's Survey, Vol. 1. p. 21.

(5) On Novem. 11. say the Sax. Ann. But Flor. Wor. places it on the 3d.

(6) The Places at which William Rufus is recorded to have held his Courts are as follows. In the Year 1087 at Christchurch, at London. (Sax. Ann. Hornged. p. 271. Brompt. p. 981.) In 1090, at Wimbourne, at Christchurch. (Sax. Ann.) In 1092, per more at Christchurch. (Radmer. p. 155. -20.) In 1093, at Christchurch, at Gloucester. (Sax. Ann.) In 1095, at Winchester, at Exeter; at Winton, at Winton; and at the same place again at Christchurch. (Sax. Ann.) In 1096, in the beginning of January, at Salisbury. (Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. p. 222. Radmer. &c.) In 1097, at Exeter, at Winton. (Sax. Ann.) In 1099, at Winton, in his new Hall at Wimbourne, for the first time; (Sax. Ann.) and at Christchurch at Gloucester. In 1100, at Winchester, at Exeter; and at Winton, at London, per more. (Sax. Ann. Brompt. p. 996.)

As there is but little to say of this King's Coin, it may not be amiss to show how the King's Revenue was paid in those ancient times. At first, the Tenants of Knight's Fees answered to their Lords by military Service; and the Tenants of Socage Lands and Demesnes in great measure by Work and Provisions: Afterwards, the Revenue of the Crown was answered in Gold and Silver, and sometime in Pelfrey, Drovers, Chafours, Leaves, Hay, &c. (that is, in Horses, Dogs and Birds of Game) and the like. Sometime in both together. When a Man paid Money into the Exchequer, it was laid in Teniers liberally so much; and the same Phrase continued to this Day. These Payments were made ad Scutum and ad Penam; and in Blank Silver and Numero by Tale. Ad Scutum was by paying Six-pence over and above each Pound or twenty Shillings, which at first was thought sufficient to make good the Weight. Ad Penam was the Person's making good the Deficiencies of Weight, though it was more than Six-pence per twenty Shillings. But as the Money might be deficient in Fineness as well as Weight, a third way of Payment was by Combustion, or melting down part of the Money paid in, and reducing it to Plate of due Fineness. When the Ferm was melted down, it was laid to be dissolved or blanch'd. As suppose a Ferm of a hundred Pound was paid into the Exchequer, after the Combustion it was laid to be a hundred Pound Blank. Frequently the twentieth Part or one Shilling was accepted in lieu of Combustion, to save Trouble and Charges. The Payment by Numero or Tale needs no Explanation. Payments, or at least Computations, were made by Marks, and half Marks; Ounces, and half Ounces of Gold; And in Pounds, Marks, half Marks, Shillings, Pence, &c. of Silver. The Mark of Gold was equal to a hundred and twenty Shillings of Silver. The Ounce of Gold was equivalent to fifteen Shillings of Silver. The Pound of Silver by Tale was twenty Shillings; the Mark thirteen Shillings and four-pence; and the Shilling consisted of twelve-pence; and a Penny was the twentieth part of an Ounce, equal to our three-pence.

The Coin of William Rufus are exceeding rare, if, as is justly believed, all those with the Full Face are to be ascribed to the Conqueror: However, several Authors place one with the Full Face to this King, inscribed PILLEM. REX AN. a Cross on each side the King's Head: Reverse, a Cross composed of double Lines, as in the Figure here annexed.

TH E English considered the Death of William Rufus as a great Deliverance, though the present Advantage reaped by it, was not to hold long. The Norman Yoke was not broken by the Death of this Prince, since there still remained two Sons of William the Conqueror, of whom one was soon going to be their Sovereign. Indeed this might have been a favorable Juncture, if they had designed to throw off this Yoke, or the two former Kings had left it in their Power to attempt it. But depressed as they were, and stript of their Estates, and all Offices, such a Thought could scarce come into their Minds. Their only Course was to be guided by the Proceedings of the Normans, who were Masters of the Kingdom. In all likelihood, these last were in great perplexity on account of the two Brothers, who might both claim the Crown. Robert Duke of Normandy, by his Birth, seem'd to have an incontestable Right, which was further strengthen'd by his late Treaty with William Rufus, wherein it was agreed that the Survivor should be Heir to all their Father's Inheritance. Besides, his mild and generous Temper, which had gained him a strong Party in England, seem'd to give him a great Advantage over his Brother Henry, whose Disposition was unknown. But on the other hand, his Slothfulness and Negligence, of which he had given too many Instances, form'd a disadvantageous Prejudice against him. His very Friends were backward to declare in his favour, fearing he was not ready to prosecute his Right. His departure from the Holy Land was known, but where he was at present none could tell. Nay, his Friends were in pain about him. Moreover, after his great Expence in his Voyage, it was reasonable to presume that, at his Return, he would find himself destitute of all necessary means to dispute the Crown with his Brother. On the contrary, Henry had the Advantage of being born in England (1) whilst his Father was on the Throne, which went a great way with some People. Then, his Pretensions were strengthened with his Presence, and positive Promise both to the Normans and English (2) to abrogate all rigorous Laws made since the Conquest, to restore the Government as in the time of the Saxon Kings, to abolish all unjust and arbitrary Taxes, to reinstate the Clergy in their Privileges, to fill the vacant Benefices, and recall the banish'd Ecclesiastics. But all these Promises would not perhaps have produced the Effect he expected, if his Diligence and Vigour at this Juncture had not added weight to his Reasons. Immediately after the Death of William he posted to Winchester, where the Crown and Sceptre were kept with the Royal Treasure, and would have taken possession, but was stoutly opposed by Roger de Breteuil (3), one of Robert's Adherents. This Lord alledged, they were bound by Oath to acknowledge the Duke of Normandy for King, in case William died without Heirs. That besides, the Law of Nature gave Robert a Right, which could not be justly disputed. During this Contest, several other Lords being come to Winchester, there was quickly a great Concurrence of People, flowing in from all Parts to know what was transacting. If the choice of a King had solely depended upon the Lords, then at Winchester, the Duke of Normandy's Right would doubtless have been preferred. But Henry gave them not time to take necessary Measures to execute such a Design. As he observed the People were in his Interest, he improv'd that Advantage, and drawing his Sword, swore, no Man should take possession of the Crown. The Dispute still growing warmer, the Lords that were present thought fit to retire into a private Room, to consult more calmly together what was to be done on this Emergency. Whilst they were debating, the People made the Name of Henry resound in their Ears by their loud Acclamations, and gave them reason to dread, it would be extremely dangerous to declare for Robert. So preferring their own Safety to Justice and Equity, they resolv'd; (in order to prevent a Civil War which seem'd unavoidable, if they persisted in asserting the Rights of the Duke of Normandy), to place Henry on the Throne. This was enough to satisfy the Prince that his Right was sufficiently established. Without staying for the Confirmation of the Estates, he set out immediately for London. On the Morrow after his Arrival, Maurice Bishop of that City (4), in consequence of this hasty and irregular Election, put the Crown on his Head, administering to him the usual Oath.

The short Space between the Death of William and Henry's Coronation (5) is used as an Argument by those that maintain the Right of electing the Kings was then confined to a few of the principal Lords. At least, they infer from hence that the Commons were not concerned in the Elections. Henry had it not in his Power to seize the Crown by meer Force. Neither can it be said to have fallen to him as next Heir, for his elder Brother was alive. He obtained it therefore only by Election. This being granted, to say he was chosen by the Nation represented, as at this Day, by a Parliament, it should be proved, such a Parliament was then sitting. But that is impossible. Much less can it be said, that in three Days space, the Estates could be summoned and assembled. This is a plausible Argument: But the truth is, nothing can be concluded from it, because there was yet no Regulation made since the Conquest about the Succession of the Crown (6).

As Henry's pretended Election interrupted the natural Order of the Succession, it was to be feared, it would make dangerous Impressions on the Minds of the People. It was therefore highly necessary he should enter upon his Reign in such Manner as might give his Subjects room to hope well of his Government. The Performance of his Promises being the Test that was to demonstrate the Sincerity of his Intentions, he began his Reign with that, in order to gain the People's Affection. He set about, in the first Place, reforming his Court, where the King his Brother had suffered many Abuses to creep in. The Courtiers, for the most part, sure of Impunity, were wont to tyrannize over People in a shameful Manner. Not content with oppressing them by unjust and violent Methods, and secretly attempting the Chastity of the Women, they publicly gloried in it, instead of dreading a Punishment. To cure these Disorders, Henry published a very severe Edict against all Offenders in general, but particularly against Adulterers. As for those that abused their Power in oppressing the People, he ordered them to be put to Death without Mercy. Some who were already notorious upon that Account, were driven from Court, and Ranulph Bishop of Durham, the detested Minister of the late King, was thrown into Prison (7).

If this first Proceeding of the new King gave the English a good Opinion of his Reign, what he added soon after was no less acceptable to them. To convince them of his real intent to perform what he had promised, he abolished the Cuivre-feu, which they could not but consider as a constant Badge of their Servitude (8). This Favor was followed by another of much greater Importance: I mean, a Charter, confirming divers Privileges enjoyed under the Saxon Kings, and renouncing all those unjust Prerogatives usurped by the two late Kings. By this Charter, Henry restored the Church to her ancient Liberties, and freed her from all those Oppressions, she had for some time been subject to, particularly during the vacant Sees and Abbacies. He contented that the Heirs of Earls and Barons upon 1101. soon as the Army was ready to march, the Archbishop came and called the principal Officers together, to whom he so sensibly represented the heinousness of breaking their Oath, that he confirmed them in their Duty; so that they unanimously promised to hazard their Lives and Fortunes in Defence of the King (1). Robert, who expected the contrary, plainly saw this Change would prove very prejudicial to his Affairs. He relied not on his own Forces, but on the Assistance of the Englsh. In expectation that the Majority would abandon the King and join him, he had proceeded so far as to threaten such as persisted to support the Usurper, as he styled his Brother. But when he found the Bulk of the Nation declared for the King, and the Army had just renewed their Oath of Allegiance, he perceived the Execution of his Design was impracticable. Thus, falling on a sudden from all his Hopes (2), he closed immediately with the Proposals of Peace sent him by the King. An Accommodation appeared to him so much the more necessary, as he saw the most zealous for him at first, began to waver. Matters standing thus, and the two Brothers equally wishing to come to a Treaty, the Lords of both Parties met together to consider of the Means. It was easy to see, Robert did not expect to obtain by Treaty a Crown, which he could not acquire by Arms. So, in consideration that Henry was already crowned, and born in the Kingdom after his Father was on the Throne, the Result of the Conference was, that he should keep possession of the Crown. He promised for his Part (3) to resign to Robert the Castles in Normandy garrisoned with Englsh, and to pay him the yearly Sum of three thousand Marks. It was stipulated also, that if one of the Brothers died without Children, the other should succeed him. This Agreement being signed and sworn to by twelve Lords of each Side, the Armies were disbanded (4). Robert laid two whole Months (5), at the Court of England, living in perfect Union with his Brother.

Sax. Ann.
M. Paris.

This Accommodation was very advantageous to the King in many respects. It not only secured him the Crown which he was in some Hazard of losing, but rendered him also more feared and esteemed, when it was seen that by his Prudence and Steadiness, he got clear of so dangerous an Affair. However, he could not forget the Peril he had been in. As he was apprehensive his Enemies might hereafter make fresh Attempts to dethrone him, whenever an Opportunity offered, he resolved to prevent them, by ruining them one after another. It was no hard matter for him to make them feel, by Turns, the Effects of his Resentment. Opportunities of being revenged are seldom wanting to those who have the Power in their hands. Soon after the Treaty, he attacked, on divers Pretences, Hugh de Grantsmeil, Robert de Pontfract, and some others, who easily perceived, their greatest Crime consisted in their Good-will to the Duke of Normandy. He was particularly exasperated with Robert de Belesme (6), because he had shown him the least Respect, and still continued to discover his Desire of exciting new Troubles. This young Lord, Son to the late Earl of Montgomery, publicly declared, Henry was an Usurper, and that it was dishonorable for the Normans as well as the Englsh to suffer him to take the Crown from his elder Brother. He was not satisfied with talking thus indiscreetly, but rendered himself formidable, by storing and fortifying his Castles in Shropshire (7). The King, who had determined his Ruin, was glad, he gave him so fair an Opportunity by these imprudent Proceedings. To complete his Destruction, Spies were set upon him, who, feigning to come into his Measures, observed all his Actions, and took care to talk to him, before scorned Witnesses, of things that served to render him criminal. When the King thought he had sufficient Evidence against him, he ordered him to be accused of five and forty Articles, the least of which was enough to condemn him. Belesme being obliged to appear in Court, desired time to prepare his Answer; which being granted, he took the Opportunity to make his Escape and retire to Shrewsbury, where he hoped to defend himself by the Assistance of the Welsh, who espoused his Cause. When he took this Resolution, he relied on the Assistance of several other Lords, who seemed to be entirely of his Sentiments. But when ther he was deceived, or not deemed a fit Person to be Head of such an Enterprize, he found himself abandoned by all, and thereby saw, though too late, the Vanity of his Projects. The King proclaiming him a Traitor, marched against him with so superior a Force, that in few Days he became Master of Shrewsbury, where the Rebel did not dare to expect him (8). After which, he took all his other Castles, and compelled him to relinquish whatever was held by the Earl his Father in England, and retire to Normandy, where he carried his ill Temper. Henry, who confiscated all his Lands, and involved his Brothers in the same Punishment, notwithstanding their Innocency, so desirous was he of expelling this Family out of his Dominions (9).

The Insolence of this Lord did not give the King so much Trouble, as the Haughtiness of Archbishop Anselm, with whom he had a Contest that threw him into great Perplexities. The Archbishop had conceived two Projects, which could not, in all likelihood, be accomplished without great Difficulties. The first was, to oblige the Clergy to live unmarried, and the second, to wrest from the King the Investiture of Bishops and Abbots. To attain his Ends, he convened a Synod, where, in the first Place, he caused all the married Priests to be excommunicated, though they were then very numerous in England. Henry, who was not much concerned in this Affair, being unwilling to give the Archbishop any distaste, the Decree passed in the Synod, notwithstanding the strong Opposition of the inferior Clergy, who in vain tried to ward off this Blow. An Historian remarks, that, although Anselm's good Intentions were generally applauded, it was thought to be a thing of dangerous Consequence, to compel the Priests to a Continency, of which many of them were not capable; and adds, it was justly feared, this Rigour would occasion their committing Uncleanliness of a more criminal Nature than the prohibited Marriage.

Anselm feeling his first Project succeed, undertook the execution of the second, and would have proceeded to excommunicate the Bishops invested by the King. But here the case was quite altered. The King was too much concerned not to oppose to the utmost of his Power the abolishing a Prerogative his Predecessors had quietly enjoyed. But how vigorously soever he exerted himself, he could not prevent some Bishops who had received their Investitures from him, from resigning their Bishopricks out of fear of Excommunication. On the other hand, Anselm refused to consecrate such as were nominated to their Sees by the King, unless he would give up the Right of Investiture. This new Claim, which the Archbishop, finding himself supported by the Court of Rome, very boldly asserted, occasioned a many years Quarrel between him and the King. As Henry would not depart from his Prerogative, Anselm pretended he could not submit without betraying the Cause of God. All hopes of Accommodation being taken away by the Obstinacy of both Parties (10), the Archbishop resolved to carry his Complaints to Papal II, who was then Pope. In all appearance, it was by his orders that he embarked in this Enterprize. He was attended in his Journey by the Prelates that had resigned their Bishopricks, and upon his Arrival at Rome instantly demanded of the Pope that he would be pleased to restore them by his Authority: Then, says an Historian, the Holy See, whose Clemency is open to all the World, provided care be taken to prepare it beforehand by a certain dazzling Metal, restored the Bishops, and sent them back to their respective Churches. The King being informed that Anselm was gone to Rome, sent also three Agents to plead his Cause, namely, Gerard Archbishop elect of York, Herbert Bishop of Thetford, and Robert Bishop of Chester, with William de Warlewast, an Ecclesiastic of great Learning, to assist them with his Advice (11). Though these Agents maintained the King's Cause with a great Zeal and Resolution, Papal would admit nothing of his Pretensions. The Affair was carried so far, that the King was going to be excommunicated. On the other hand, the Archbishop was deprived of his Temporalities, during his absence from the Kingdom. At length, after many Contests for near three Years together, the King and Pope happening to be in such Circumstances, as made them equally wish to see an 1103. End of the Quarrel; the Pope permitted the Bishops to do Homage to the King, and Henry gave up the Right of Investiture. Thus ended this Affair, which I have but just mentioned here, intending to treat more fully of it in another Place.

1104. Though the King's Contest with the Court of Rome gave him a great deal of Trouble whilst it lasted, it did not hinder him from minding his other Affairs. Robert his Brother, who was then in England (1), found by Experience how attentive this Monarch was to whatever might turn to his Advantage. The Reason of the Duke of Normandy's Visit was to press the Payment of his Pension.

But Henry knowing his Brother's mild and generous Temper, treated him in such manner, and gave him no good Words, that he infensibly drew him in to desist from his Demands (2). This unseasonable Generosity cost the imprudent Duke very dear, since it proved in the end the occasion of his Ruin. His easy and liberal Temper had always spoiled his Designs. We have already seen, in the beginning of the Reign of William Rufus, how ill he consumed the Money lent him by Henry, instead of employing it in keeping up his Party in England; by which indiscreet Management he lost the Crown for that Time. Afterwards, he borrowed ten thousand Marks of King William for his Voyage to the Holy-Land. This Sum not sufficing to defray the great Expence he was at, he contracted for many Debts during the Voyage, and since his Return, that he was forced to mortgage almost all his Demerits. He had nothing left but the City of Rouen, which he would have also mortgaged, if the Burgesses would have given their consent. His wants, which daily increased, soon made him sensible of his oversight in not insisting upon the Pension, he might justly demand of his Brother. He complained, his easy Nature was abused, and adding to his Complaints some imprudent Menaces, gave Henry a Pretence openly to act against him. The King did not want much solliciting to break entirely with his Brother. Ever since he found himself in peaceable possession of England, he began to cast a greedy Eye on Normandy, and was extremely desirous of annexing it to his Crown. Robert's ill Conduct strengthened his hopes of being one day Master of that Dukedom. And as he waited only for a favorable Opportunity to execute this Design, he did not fail to embrace the first that offered.

It has been related, that Robert de Belesme, after the Loss of his Estates in England, retired into Normandy. He was no sooner arrived there, but he endeavoured to be revenged on the King, by fiercely falling upon such of his Subjects as had Lands in that Country (3), under a Pretence of making himself amends for what the King had taken from him in England. The Duke's Indolence, who neglected to oppose these Outrages at first, rendered this Lord the more fierce and presumptuous. He committed to many Violences, that Complaints were brought against him from every Quarter. At length Robert, roused by the People's Murmurs, resolved to chastise him, and levied an Army to put a stop to these Disorders; but had the Misfortune to be defeated (4). The Rebel, exalted with this Success, carrying his Boldness and Ambition still farther, formed a Project of becoming Master of the whole Dukedom. Whilst he was pursuing this Design, he saw himself strengthened with the Assistance of another male-content Lord: Namely, William Earl of Mortagne, Son of Duke Robert, the eldest of William the Conqueror's Half-Brothers. This Lord not being satisfied with the Earldom of Cornwall, pretended, the King ought to give him also the Earldom of Kent, which his Uncle the Bishop of Bayeux had enjoyed. But meeting with an unexpected Denial, he fell into so great a Fury with the King, as even to threaten him. His insolent Behaviour caused the King to dispossess him of the Earldom of Cornwall, as a Punishment for his Rashness. Whereupon he retired, in great discontent, into Normandy. As soon as he arrived, he joined Robert de Belesme, and strengthened his Party in such a manner, that the Duke was obliged to conclude a Peace with them on Terms very dishonourable to a Sovereign Prince (5).

This Peace, instead of restoring Tranquillity to the Country, served only to increase the Insolence of the two Earls; who contemning the Duke's Orders, continued daily to commit Ravages insupportable to the Nobles and People. At length, some of the chief Men of the Country finding themselves thus oppressed by these two Tyrants, without any hopes of Protection from the Duke, resolved to apply to the King of England for Relief. Their Suit was very welcome to Henry, who only wanted a Pretence to interpose in the Affairs of Normandy, in order to have an Opportunity of seizing the Dutchy. But as this Design was in itself very odious, he endeavoured to give it a Colour of Justice, by pretending to act from quite another Motive. To this Purpose, he writ a Letter to his Brother (6), representing to him, that his Conduct gave the Normans just Cause of Complaint, since he protected Persons who ought to be deemed Enemies to the Publick: That the Peace he had made with them, leaving the Country exposed to their Ravages, his Subjects could no longer consider as their Sovereign, a Prince from whom they could expect no Protection: That he entreated him therefore to redress the Grievances complained of by the Normans, or not think it strange, that upon his Neglect, he should himself espouse the Cause of those that applied to him. To these Remonstrances, he added Complaints of certain Injuries, which he pretended to have suffered himself, and demanded speedy Satisfaction. He would doubtless have taken it very ill, if the Duke had thus meddled with his Affairs. But such is the unreasonableness of most Men, that they practise without scruple what they condemn in others, and fancy, the World is so blind as not to see the Injustice of their Actions, because they are artfully covered with the Cloak of Charity.

Whilst Henry feigned to have no other Design but to relieve the distressed Normans, he himself oppressed his own Subjects, by an exorbitant Tax. He pretended to be forced to go and wage War with the two Tyrants of Normandy, a War, wherein the English however were wholly unconcerned. Notwithstanding all his Promises to the People, this Tax was levied with all imaginable Rigour, even to the imprisoning and plugging various ways such as refused, or had not wherewithal, to pay it. As and peace soon as his Preparations were finished, he passed into Normandy with a numerous Army (7), carrying with him large Sums of Money, with which he bribed the Nobles and Governors of the Castles. He could the better do this, as Robert was not in condition to cross his Designs; or secure the Allegiance of his Subjects by the same Method. The present posture of Affairs favouring the King more than at any other time, he seized upon Caen and some other Cities (8). The Duke of Bretagne and the Earl of Anjou, even permitted him to garrison some of their Frontier-Towns, for fear of drawing upon themselves the burden of the War, designed against Robert: On the other hand, they that had invited him to their Assistance, plainly foreseeing, if the Quarrel was made up, it must be to their Prejudice, never ceased exhorting him to push his Conquests, and make himself Master of all Normandy. They represented to him, it was the only way to ease them of the Oppressions they lay under, since they could expect no Assistance from their Sovereign. The Bishop of Sees, sworn Enemy of the two Earls, who had turned him out of his Diocese, blew up the Flame to the utmost of his Power, and lost no Opportunity to excite Henry to pursue his Undertaking. One day, as he was with him in the Church of Carenton, he caused him to observe how full the Church was of Goods, brought thither by the People, to secure them from the plundering Tyrants. This afforded him a Pretence to make a long Speech representing to the King, that the Rise of all their Miseries was owing to the Carelessness or Connivance of the Duke; adding, that the Country would never be restored to its former Tranquillity, till they had another Master. In fine, he conjured the King to take upon him the Government, and free the Normans, the ancient Subjects of his Family, from the wretched State they were reduced to. Henry, who only wanted a Cloak for his Injustice, listened very attentively to this Speech; and pretending to be touched with Compassion for the Normans, promised to exert his utmost to procure the Relief they expected at his Hands. However, he expressed an extreme Concern that he was forced to deprive his Brother of his Dominions, who by his Incapacity was running headlong into Destruction. Pursuant to this Resolution, which he pretended to take purely out of Necessity, and in Compliance to the Intreaties of the Normans, he continued the War. Robert made but a weak Defence, for, not suspecting the King's Designs, he had no time to pre-1106. Sax. Ann. Edm. part. Wherefore, Henry, having put his Affairs upon a good foot, in this first Campaign, returned to England (1) with intent to raise, during the Winter, the Money and Forces, he wanted to finish the Work, so happily begun.

1106. R. cont. f. 10. M. Paris. Ord. Vital. Sax. Ann. Flor. Winc. The Duke of Normandy was then in a very deplorable Condition. He perceived at length, his Ruin was determined, but knew not how to prevent it. In this Perplexity, he resolved to repair to the King his Brother, and try to move him by his Submissions. As he was himself of a kind and generous Disposition, he could not believe but the King was too. Possessed with this Notion, he came to England (2), and sued for Peace, in a manner suitable to his Condition, but unbecoming the Son of William the Conqueror. Henry, who was not of so early a Nature, was deaf to all his Intreaties. He began to think himself of improving the present Juncture, to become Master of Normandy. Accordingly, nothing could more lessened his Pretensions. For this reason, he obstinately refused to enter into any Negotiation, and thought he dealt very kindly by his Brother, in permitting him to return. Robert despairing to prevail, departed, full of Rage and Vexation; and uttering great Threats, which Henry little regarded. An Historian assures us however, the King felt some Remorse for the Injury he was doing his Brother, who had never given him any just Cause of Complaint, and from whom he had already taken a Crown. But if he had any such Reflections, they were very short-lived (3). The only Effect they produced, was to inspire him with the Compassion of the English's Wrongs would move the Compassion of the English's, and revive the Affection they had formerly shewn for that Prince. This Thought giving him some Uncertainty, he judged it necessary to prepossess his Subjects in his favor, by renewing his Promises (4), and he convened the Great Council or Parliament (5), and endeavoured, in a studied Speech, to demonstrate the Justice of his Undertaking. He represented to them, "That Robert's refusal of the Kingdom of Jerusalem" had drawn down on his Head the Vengeance of God; "by whom, ever since that Time, he had been visibly forsaken, as a Prince unworthy of his Care, after despoiling to great a Favor (6). He aggravated the Oppressions, the Normans groaned under, and strove to make the English believe, it was incumbent on them to take in the Defence of a miserable People. He desired the Lords to consider his own peaceable Temper, and how patiently he had taken his Brother's Menaces, to which he had made no other return but brotherly and gentle Admonitions. He enlarged upon the Duke's ill Qualities. He displayed his excessive Profusions, which made him a continual Burden to all the World. Moreover, he accused him of extreme Arrogance, and of shewing on all Occasions an utter Contempt for the English Nation. He assured them, for his Part, he still persisted in his Resolution to govern by just Laws, of which the Charter, he had granted, was an undeniable Argument. In fine, he added, provided he was sure of the Hearts and Affection of the English, he valued not any thing, his Enemies could do against him." This Speech had the Effect he expected. All the Lords thinking themselves honoured by the Confidence he placed in them, and flattering themselves, that he would perform his Promises, unanimously declared they would live and die in his Service.

What Colour soever the King might give his Ambition, it was easy to discover the weakness of the Reasons, alledged in Vindication of his Undertaking. The Truth is, these Reasons were not so much as plausible. The pretended Refusal of the Crown of Jerusalem had no better Foundation than an uncertain Rumour spread in England, which, in all likelihood, was false, for the best Historians make no mention of this Fact (6). But supposing the Thing had been as true, as it was doubtful, Robert possibly might have refused the Crown, out of Modesty, as well as from a Principle of Pride or Irreligion. But 1106. he this as it will, Henry could have no Right from thence to deprive him of his Dominions. It was evident therefore the sole Motive that engaged the English Lords to assist him of their Affluence, was his solemn Promise to see his Charter observed, which had been hitherto very much neglected.

Henry made use of the Declaration of the English in his favor, to obtain a grant of fresh Supplies, by means of which he made a considerable Addition to his Troops, As soon as the Season permitted (7), he crossed the Sea with a numerous Fleet (8), in order to complete the Conquest of Normandy. He opened the Campaign with the Siege of Tinchebray, where the Earl of Mortagne, who had sided with the Duke, had thrown in a strong Reinforcement. As this Place was of great Strength, and well provided with Necessaries, it held out long enough for Robert to come to its Relief. Ever since the Duke parted from the King his Brother without being able to prevail with him, he had joined with the Earl of Mortagne, and Robert de Belsme, who had led all their Forces to his Assistance. The King of France had also sent him some Troops, and several Norman Lords (9) came to him with considerable Bodies, as soon as they perceived, Henry was not acting for them, but for himself. All these Succours enabling the Duke to give his Brother Battle, he marched towards him with that Resolution. The two Armies were almost equal in Number. Robert had more Foot, but not so many Horse as the King. So, each Side might flatter themselves with hopes of Success. However, the Battle, which was fought under the Walls of Tinchebray, did not last long. The Norman Host being put in Disorder at the first Onset, and the Foot not being able to maintain the Fight without their Aid, the whole Army was entirely routed, and the English had nothing to do but to kill or take Prisoners. The Duke of Normandy perceiving there was no possibility of rallying his Troops, and resolving not to turn his Back, chose rather to be taken than shew the least Signs of Cowardice. Edgar Atheling, the Earl of Mortagne (10), four hundred Knights, and ten thousand Soldiers had the same Fate. As the Battle of Hastings made the Normans Masters of England, so this, which was fought forty Years after, put the English in possession of Normandy. Prince Edgar, who had so often been the Sport of Fortune, was immediately released, and went and passed the residue of his Days in England, where he died of extreme old Age. The Duke of Normandy, and Earl of Mortagne, were not so favorably treated. The Earl was shut up in the Tower and put off of London, and the Duke in Cardiff-Castle in Wales, where he remained a Prisoner to his Death, which happened not till twenty six Years after. Some say, this unfortunate Prince attempting to make an Escape, Henry ordered his Sight to be taken away by applying a burning-hot Brafs Balon to his Eyes (11). But the silence of the best Historians render this Fact something improbable. I do not pretend to excuse the Mind-heartedness of the King, who ought to have called to mind Robert's Generosity to him, during the Siege of Mount St. Michael, though he had forgot he was his Brother. In vain does an Historian endeavour to justify him, by observing Robert never loved him during their younger Years, and had done him many Injuries. Such a Reason will scarce serve the Purpose, for which it is alledged by that Author.

The Victory of Tinchebray having acquired the King the Possession of all Normandy, he returned in Triumph to England (12). Upon his Arrival, his first Care was to make some Regulations for his Court, where several Abuses had long since crept in which called for Reformation. In the former Reign, when the King took a Progress, those who followed the Court, committed all manner of Outrages in the Places where they lodged. They shamefully extorted what they pleased from their Hosts, and attempted the Chastity of the Women, without any Restraint (13). Coyners of false Money were grown very numerous and bare-faced, being secure of the Protection of the Great, who set them at work in their Houses, where no Body dared to search for them. These Disorders not ceasing upon the King's Edict in the Beginning of his

The King ordered, that whoever dared to offend any Goods of those that attended them, or abused their Protection, should have their Eyes put out, or their Hands or Feet cut off. Edm.

1107. Reign, he published a second with still greater Penalties. Severity was necessary to check the License that was introduced into the Kingdom, by the Connivance that Offences of this Nature had hitherto met with (1).

1108. Before the War in Normandy, Henry had positively assured his Subjects he would govern according to Equity, and maintain them in their Privileges. But Prosperity made him forget his Promises. Immediately after his Return, he was observed to be grown more haughty, and less popular than before. He treated the Nobles with an intolerable Arrogance, even to the using, when speaking to them, very abusive Language. Besides, he little regarded his own Charter, nor corrected any Abuses that turned to his Profit. Anselm was the only Person he shewed any Value for. The Trouble that Prolate had given him, made him look upon all Occasions of quarrelling with him as so many dangerous Quick-fands, which he was resolved to avoid. But his Precautions served only to render Anselm more haughty and imperious than before the Contest.

The Archbishop perceiving the King, for fear of being engaged in fresh Disputes, refrained from meddling with Ecclesiastical Affairs, took the Opportunity to prosecute, with the utmost Rigour, the Priests who obstinately persisted in keeping their Wives. His Disgrace and long Absence made them hope, they should at length be freed from his Persecutions. But he quickly let them see, that when once he began a thing, he never left it unfinished. Some time after his Return, he called a Synod (2), where, at his Instance, severe Penalties were decreed against all Clergymen, who lived in the State of Matrimony. There were even some that were deprived of their Livings. But so far was this Rigour from having any good Effect, that it only proved the occasion of the Clergy's committing real Crimes, in order to avoid the pretended Excess they were engaged in before.

The King did not much concern himself in this Regulation of the Synod. It was indifferent to him, whether the Clergy married or lived single. And therefore he left the Archbishop to act as he pleased, without interposing in an Affair that concerned him not. He was going to have another upon his Hands more worthy his Regard. Lewis the Great, King of France, who had just succeeded his Father Philip, looking upon Henry, since his Acquisition of Normandy, as a very formidable Neighbour, was seeking means to humble his overgrown Power (3). To execute this Project, he designed to make use of William surnamed Crisse, Son of Robert, a young Prince of great Hopes, but under Age. How careful however he was to conceal his Designs, Henry had Notice of them, and passed suddenly into Normandy; where he ordered his Nephew to be taken into Custody (4), to prevent any Inturberation upon his account. Lewis, by this Proceeding, perceiving his Design had taken Air, deferred the Execution of it to a better Opportunity. Mean time, the young Prince having made his Escape, by means of his Tutor, was carried to Paris, and other Courts, where he in vain solicited for Assistance to recover the Duke his Father's Dominions. The neighbouring Princes stood too much in Awe of Henry to engage in such an Undertaking. As for the Normans, though many of them were well inclined to the Son of their Sovereign, and several even contributed privately towards his Maintenance, they durst however not openly declare in his Favour.

Henry having spent the Winter and part of the Summer in Normandy, returned to England (5), where soon after Ambassadors came to him from the Emperor Henry IV, to demand his Daughter Matilda in Marriage. He very joyfully received the Proposal, and as soon as the Articles were agreed upon, the Wedding was celebrated by Proxy. But as the Princess was very young, he continued in England till the Year following, when she was sent to the Emperor her Spouse with a magnificent Retinue, and a very considerable Sum for her Portion.

three Shillings on every Hide of Land. This Tax brought him in an immense Sum, if it be true, as some pretend to calculate it, that it was equal to 824,850 l. of our present Money. The Custom of raising Money for the Marriage of the King's eldest Daughter was introduced by this Prince, and very duly practised by his Successors, who found it too beneficial to suffer it to be lost (6). Hence may be seen how prejudicial to a free People such Innovations are, that become as a Law by one single Precedent.

Before the Marriage was solemnized, Death took out of the World Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury (7), a learned Prelate of that Age, but haughty and bigotted to the last Degree. 'Tis very reasonable to suppose that his Zeal for the Court of Rome, his Firmness in the Affair of Investitures, and his constant Endeavours, to establish the Celibacy of the Clergy in England, entitled him to a place in the Calendar. As soon as Anselm was laid in his Grave, the King seized the Revenues of the Archbishoprick, and kept them in his hands for five Years. The Clergy were in hopes, the Persecution they had suffered, during his Life, would end with his Death; but the Court of Rome was no less zealous to support what the Archbishop had done solely by her Orders. Besides, the King, who was very unwilling to break with the Pope, strictly enjoined the Execution of what was established. So that the Clergy were obliged to observe a seeming Continency, by being debarred from marrying. But they privately made themselves amends for this Restraint, in the Commission of the most enormous Crimes. At least, this is what the Authors of that Age make no scruple to lay to their Charge.

The Year 1110 was memorable for the Revival of Learning at Cambridge (8), from whence it had been long banished. According to general Opinion, Edward the Elder had formerly founded an University there. But the Town had suffered so much by the Danish Wars, that the Learning fell to decay, and never flourished again till the time we are speaking of (9).

The following Year Henry crossed the Sea (10), to stop the Progress of Fulk Earl of Anjou, who had caused the City of Constance in Normandy to revolt. Elias Earl of Maine, having espoused the Interest of Fulk, and being taken Prisoner in a Battle, was put to Death (11). Henry thought this Instance of Severity necessary to strike a dread into the Normans, whose Revolt he was apprehensive of; well knowing, France would be ready to protect them.

Before the King went to Normandy, he admitted into England great Numbers of Flemings, who by the Inundation of the Sea in their own Country, were compelled to seek for new Habitations. He planted them at first in the waste parts of Yorkshire (12). But upon the Complaints made to him after his Return, he removed them to the Country conquered from the Welsh, about Ros and Pembroke. Their Posterity continue there to this Day, retaining so much of their old Customs and Language, as distinguishes them plainly from the Welsh, and shews they are of foreign Extraction.

Henry had not time to make a long stay in England (13). The Year after, he was obliged to pass into Normandy, where the King of France had kindled a fresh War, by persuading the Earl of Anjou to take up Arms against. This War gave him some Trouble, but he happily surmounted all Difficulties. Lewis had even the Mortification to see the Earl of Anjou desert him, who, by that Defection, reaped the Advantage of marrying his Daughter to Prince William, Son of King Henry. During the King's stay in Normandy, he had the Satisfaction of having his most inveterate Enemy Robert de Belesme fall into his hands, who was sent into England, and kept Prisoner all his Life (14). These Troubles being over, Henry returned to England (15), where he lived in Peace the five following Years, without any Disturbance, except from the Welsh, who now and then made some Incursions.

During this Calm, the Pope and Clergy (16) at last prevailed upon him to permit the Vacancies in the Church to

The Wills growing more and more troublesome on the Borders, Henry determined not to chastise them only, but root them out entirely. To execute this barbarous Resolution, he entered Wales with a numerous Army, divided into three Bodies, in order to surround them on all sides. But upon his Approach, they having retired to their Mountains, it was not possible for him to attack them. However, he kept them long invested, but at last finding there was no drawing them from their Retreat, contented to make Peace. At his Return to London, he received News of the Confirmation of his Daughter Matilda's Marriage, and her Coronation at Mentz.

Shortly after, Henry passed once more into Normandy (1), where he caused the States to swear Fealty to Prince William his Son, who was then twelve Years of Age. The next Year (2), he took the same Precaution with regard to England, in order to secure the Crown in his Family. To this end he summoned a General Assembly at Salisbury, where all that were present promised to acknowledge Prince William for their Sovereign, after the Death of the King his Father, and accordingly took their Oath to him. From this Assembly, some pretend to date the Original of the Right of the Commons sitting in Parliament. They maintain, that in Imitation of what was practised in Normandy, Henry summoned the Commons as well as the Nobility and Clergy; and that this was the first time the Representatives of the People were admitted to sit in Parliament (3). Others affirm, the general Assemblies of the Nation had been diffused before this. In fine, there are who assure us, this Assembly was the first that was styled a Parliament. Of these three Opinions the first can never be proved, the second is evidently false, and the third very uncertain (4).

Ever since Lewis the Graft came to the Crown of France, he had never ceased to disturb Henry, either by countenancing the Male-contents in Normandy, or stirring up the neighbouring Princes against him. Though he generally took care to act unobtrusively, yet Henry was not ignorant that this Prince was the sole Support of all these little troublesome Enemies, and therefore, to be even with him, undertook to combat him in his own way. Thobald Earl of Blais, his Nephew, Son to his Sister Adela, being displeased with the King of France, Henry excites him to Revenge; and persuading him to take up Arms, lends him a powerful Aid. Lewis, on his Part, invested William Cris, Son of Robert, with the Duchy of Normandy, promising to assist him with all his Forces to take possession. Supported by France and Baldwin Earl of Flanders, the young Prince attempted to wrest Normandy from the King his Uncle (5). Lewis did not now proceed unadvised, but openly. He claimed, as Sovereign Lord of Normandy, a Right to dispose of that Duchy, and especially in favour of the only Son of Duke Robert, unjustly detained in Prison. His Army being reinforced by a considerable Body of Troops, brought him by the Earl of Flanders, he entered Normandy with design to put William in possession.

As soon as Henry was informed of his Enemies Projects, he made great Preparations for the War, of which the English were obliged to bear the whole Charge. When all was ready, he crossed the Sea (6), and joining Forces with the Duke of Breigne (7) and Earl of Blais, he advanced towards the Enemies to give them Battle. But Lewis not thinking proper to expect him, chose to retire (8), covered with Confusion at his own Measures, and the ruin of his Project by Henry's Diligence (9). Instead of maintaining what he had undertaken, he sent Proposals of Peace to Henry, which were accepted on condition he restored Gisors, then in his Hand. After signing the Treaty, Henry speedily returned into England (10), to prevent the entrance of a Legate, sent by the Pope without his Permission. Queen Matilda died some Months after (11), lamented by all the English, as well for her Merit as Descend from their ancient Kings.

Mean time, the King of France had still his former Lew. Project in view. Henry neglecting to demolish the Castle of Gisors according to the late Treaty, Lewis took occasion from thence suddenly to invade Normandy, and commit great Ravages. However Henry remained quiet in England (12), seeming to take no notice of this Insult. All the World was amazed at the Carelessness: Nay, many ascribed it to want of Courage. At length, one of his Courtiers taking the Freedom to reprove to him, how much he wronged his Reputation; he mildly answered, he had learnt of the King his Father, that the best way to vanquish the French, was to let them vent their first Fury. But to shew his slowness was not the Effect of Fear, he soon after passed into Normandy (13) with a powerful Army, and offered his Enemy Battle. Lewis accepting the Challenge, the two Armies engaged. During the Fight, a French Cavalier, named Crispin, personally attacked the King of England, and struck him twice on the Head with such force, that notwithstanding his Helmet, the King was all over Blood. However he continued this single Combat. The fight of his Blood rousing his Courage, he discharged so furious a Blow at his Adversary, that he tumbled him from his Horse and took him Prisoner. This Action raised such Emulation among his Troops, that at last, after a sharp Engagement, the Enemy was obliged to quit the Field (14). The Standard of France was taken and sent in Triumph to Rean (15). Some time after, the two Kings came to a second Battle (16), the Success whereof was doubtful, both sides pretending to the Victory. In a word, this War proved very sharp, and not a little troublesome to the two Monarchs.

While Hostilities were continued on both Sides with equal warmth, Lewis endeavoured to take Advantage of the Ref. Council of Pope Calixtus II, then in France, to embroil his Enemy in new Troubles. He was in hopes, the Pope, being of the House of Burgundy, would be easily induced to favour his Designs. And therefore, without discovering his Intentions, he prevailed with him to convene a Council at Rheims, to which the English Bishops were summoned. Henry not mistrusting any thing from that Quarter, readily permitted them to be present at the Council. He only ordered them, when they took their leave, to salute the Pope in his Name, to hearken to his Apostolical Precepts, but to take care to bring none of his new Inventions into the Kingdom. The Council consisted mostly of French Bishops, some of whom being intrusted with their King's Secret, made heavy Complaints against Henry. They even proposed to excommunicate him, for unjustly detaining the Person and Dominions of the Duke of Normandy his Bro-

But this is nothing like a Parliament. *Polid. But what troubled Henry most, was, that a Conspiracy was formed against him, wherein one of his Favourites, and some of the Officers of his Bed-Chamber were concerned. See *P. 1125. tended Licentiousness, though the King strictly enjoined their observance. But Henry's Aim was not so much to prevent the Clergy from marrying, as to obtain of the Pope, by this seeming Zeal, a Power to execute the Decrees of the Councils on this article, as it happened in the Year 1129. When once he was invested with this Authority, he gave the Priests leave, without scruple, to keep their Wives, upon Payment of so much Money for a Dispensation (1).

1127. The King, had now, for six Years, been expecting in vain that God would bless him with Children by his second Wife. When he found, after so long a time, there was no likelihood of obtaining what he desired, he was quite out of Hopes. However, to secure the Succession in his Family, he resolved to have his Daughter Matilda, who since the Emperor's Death was returned to England (2), acknowledged the presumptive Heir to the Crown. The Advantage, this Princess had, of being descended by the Mother's Side from the ancient Saxon Kings, endeared her to the English, who were not yet inured to the Norman Yoke. On the other hand, for want of a Prince of their own Nation, it was the Interest of the Normans to place on the Throne a Grand-daughter of William the Conqueror, to whom they were indebted for all their Possessions in England. The Case standing thus, the King was in hopes to succeed in his Design, and assembled all the immediate Vassals of the Crown (3). Among the Lords, present at this great Council, were, Stephen Earl of Boulogne, the King's Nephew, and David King of Scotland (4), on account of the Fiefs he held in England (5). All the Members of the Assembly consenting to the King's Proposal, David and Stephen were the first that took the Oath to Matilda, in case the King her Father died without Issue Male.

This Affair being transacted to the King's Satisfaction, he married the Empress to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Son of Fulk Earl of Anjou (6), who had resigned his Dominions to his Son, in order to go and take possession of the Crown of Jerusalem, upon the Death of Baldwin II. his Father-in-law. The King, in making choice of Earl Geoffrey for his Daughter, consulted his own Interest more than Matilda's Inclination. This Princess, Widow to an Emperor, thinking it a Disparagement to marry the Earl of Anjou, very unwillingly gave her consent, and was not without some compulsion from her Father. As he was in continual Apprehensions that William Crito his Nephew, would take Normandy from him, he thought he could not do better than secure Geoffrey in his Interest, that he might be always ready to assist that Duty in case of Attack.

If Matilda showed some Reluctance to comply with her Father's Will, the English and Norman Barons seemed no less dissatisfied with this Alliance. They imagined, they ought to have been consulted in an Affair, which was to give them a King. Moreover, some had secretly flattered themselves with one Day mounting the Throne, by marrying the Empress. It was easy therefore to foresee, that the Oath by which the King meant to bind them, would be of little Force after his Death. But besides that he imagined none would venture to break it, his dread of the King of France and William Crito, caused him to consider only the present Advantage procured him by the Marriage of his Daughter.

1128. He was very justly apprehensive of a League between Lewis and William Crito. The King of France no longer concealing his Design of putting the young Prince in possession of his Father's Dominions, had now invested him with the Earldom of Flanders, the better to enable him to wage War with the King his Uncle. To prevent his Enemy's Designs, Henry used two Methods with equal Success. The first was, to carry the War into France. The second, to engage the Flemings to rise against their new Earl, and join with Theodoric of Alsatia, who pretended to Flanders. Pursuant to his Scheme, he entered France with a powerful Army, whilst, on the other hand, the Towns of Flanders openly declared against his Nephew. Most was the first, William undertook to reduce to Obedience by a Siege, which lasted long enough to give his Rival time to come to its Relief. William having Intelligence of Theodoric's Approach, went to meet him, and gaining a complete Victory, returned to carry on the Siege. The Defeat of the Land-grave of Alsatia would have disabled the Besieged to hold out any longer, if in one of their Sallies William had not S. Dunelm. received a Wound (7), of which he died in a few Days. This young Prince was endued with Courage, and several other good Qualities. But, to avoid the Mistortunes, the Duke his Father had drawn upon himself by his Profuseness, he ran into the contrary Extreme (8). This Failing, joined to some Acts of Violence committed by him in Flanders, and his immoderate Love of Women, gained him the hatred of the Flemings, and disposed them to listen to the Solicitations of the King his Uncle. The unlucky Accident of this Prince's sudden Death, and the Presence of the English Army in France, obliged Lewis to desist from his Projects and conclude a Peace with Henry. From that time to the Day of his Death, the King had no more Quarrels with France. Neither do we find in the Residue of his Reign, which lasted six Years longer, but very few Occurrences worth Notice, the principal of which I am going to relate.

In the 30th Year of his Reign, being likewise the 30th of the Century, Henry went over to Normandy, where he spent the best Part of a Year. His main Business was an Interview with Pope Innocent II. whom at length he Malm. owned for the true Pope, though Anacletus his Rival was Master of Rome. The chief Difficulty of this Affair, consisted in the Acknowledgement of Innocent by France, and, in Henry's inclining, for that Reason, to Anacletus. But Innocent managed him so artfully, that he was owned by him for Pope, which did not a little turn to his Advantage.

Henry, when he returned to England (9), brought with him his Daughter Matilda, who upon some Dispute was parted from the Earl her Husband. Upon his Arrival, he called a General Assembly (10), where the Oath of Fealty to the Empress was renewed, after which she went back to her Husband, who desired her Company.

The Year 1132 was remarkable for the founding of an Episcopal See at Carlisle, and the burning great Part of London. As the Houses were mostly built of Wood, this City was frequently subject to the like Accidents.

The next Year, a new occasion of Joy blotted out the Remembrance of this Misfortune. Matilda was brought to bed of a Prince, named Henry after his Grand-father. Immediately after the Birth of this Prince, the King assembled all the great Men, and caused them to renew the Oath of the Succession, in which the new-born Prince was included. This was the third time he made them take this Oath, which however was never the better observed. Matilda had two Sons more, namely, Geoffrey and William, of whom I shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

Towards the latter End of the Summer, the King went over for the last time to Normandy. The Day he embarked, there was an Eclipse of the Sun, and two Days after a great Earthquake, Flames of Fire issuing from the Clefts of the Earth with great Violence. Some will have these Accidents to be Prefages of the King's Death, which however did not happen till two Years after. Robert his eldest Brother died before him at the Castle of Cardiff, where he had been Prisoner twenty six Years (11). He was a Prince of great Courage, and for some time, of great Reputation. His easy, careless and profuse Temper, made him lose twice the Opportunity of acquiring the Crown of England, which he had a better Claim to, and perhaps was more deserving of than his Brothers. He was surnamed Courte-hofe, either for wearing his Breeches very short, or because his Legs were not long enough in proportion to the rest of his Body (12). Some give him the Surname of Courtois, mistaking the meaning of the Word Courte-hofe, and because that Name was suitable to his generous Temper.

1133. He was buried at Gloucester in the Choir of the Cathedral, where his Tomb is still to be seen (1).

1135. The Death of Robert was quickly followed by that of the King his Brother. About the latter End of August, 1135, he was seized with a violent Illness, which carried him off in seven Days. It is said, he was the Occasion of it himself, by eating to Excess of some Lampreys, of which he was very fond. He was then at the Castle of Lyon near Rean, a Place he much delighted in. When he found, he was near his End, he sent for the Earl of Gloucester his natural Son, and earnestly recommended to him the Concerns of the Empire his Daughter, without mentioning the Earl of Anjou his Son-in-law, with whom he was displeased. After this, he made his Will, leaving to his Domesticities above sixty thousand Pounds Sterling. He ordered his Debts to be punctually paid, and all Arrears due to him to be remitted. He died on the second of December, (2) in the sixty eighth Year of his Age, and the thirty sixth of his Reign. His Body was cut in Pieces in order to be embalmed (3), after the rude Manner of those Days, because he was to be buried in England, in the Abbey of Reading (4).

We find in this Prince a great Mixture of good and bad Qualities. He was very courageous, and of a great Capacity, both in Military and Civil Affairs. His Prudence in the Administration of his Government appeared chiefly in that during his frequent Voyages to Normandy, there was never any Insurrection in England, though the Kingdom did not want Malecontents. He was exceeding regular in his Diet. Never was he known to be guilty of any Excess in eating or drinking, except that which cost him his Life. He was inexorable to all Malefactors, being persuaded, Severity was absolutely necessary to curb the Licentiousness introduced in the late Reign. His Education was the reverse of that of William Rufus: Whereas this last had no Learning at all, Henry was brought up to Letters, and made great Progress in his Studies. Hence he acquired the surname of Beau-Clere, that is, the Scholar, for in those Days none but Ecclesiastics troubled themselves about Books, and Princes least of all others. He retained all his Life long a relish for the Sciences, imbibed in his Youth. He had even built a Palace at Oxford, where he often retired to divert himself with the Conversation of the Learned. His handsome Face, his sweet and serene Looks, his free and open Countenance, his affable Carriage and agreeable Conversation, prepossessed at first Sight all the World in his Favor. These fine Qualities would have rendered him an accomplished Prince, had they not been filled with many Faults, among which, Cruelty, Avarice, and an inordinate Love of Women, were most predominant. The first appeared in his barbarous Usage of his elder Brother. The second, in his exorbitant and frequent Taxes on the People. The third, in the great Number of Bastards by several Mistresses. I shall not stay to remark here his Usurpation of the Crown; because it may be objected, Robert's Claim was not incontestable, by reason of the Diversity of Opinions of that Subject. But for his Injustice to his Brother, in depriving him of his Dominions, and detaining him Prisoner twenty six Years, I think nothing can be alleged to excuse it. In order to repair in some measure his Misdemeanours, he founded the Episcopal Sees of Ely and Carlisle, and the Abbeys of Reading, Hyde, Cholsey, with the Priory of Dunstable (5). This was the Method of atoning for Offences, much in vogue in those Days, which being very easy for the Rich and Powerful, was long in use and is still practised to this Day. The Charter this Prince granted the Nation upon his Accession to the Crown, is one of the most remarkable Particulars of his Reign, during which England enjoyed a prodigious Plenty of all Things. For a Shilling might be bought as much Corn as would serve one hundred Men a Day; and for a Groat, which was also the Price of a Sheep, as much Hay and Oats as twenty Horses could eat in the same Time. It is true indeed, Money was then much scarcer than at present.

Henry left only one legitimate Daughter, namely, the Empress Matilda, and twelve natural Children. Among whom Robert Earl of Gloucester made the greatest Figure (6), as well on account of his personal Merits, as for his steady Adherence to the Empress's Sister, as will be seen in the following Reign (7).

The

(1) He lies in the middle of the Choir, where, not long after, was erected for him a Tomb of Walnut in the form of a Chert, with his Image thereon cross-legged, carved to the Life in heart of Oak. Upon the Pannels of the Chert are pencilled the Arms of several of the Worthies, and at the Foot, the Arms of France and England Quarterly, which show Elothouses to be painted since the Reign of Henry IV. The Parliament Statutes in Charles I. time are in place, but the Pannels (ready to be burnt) were bought of the Soldiers by Sir Humphrey Traynor of Stamway, and after the Restoration, put together again, and bountiful at his own Charge, and defended with a Wire-screens. Stamford. Huntingdon says he died at Grid for being forced to wear a call-off Coat of the King his Brother.

(2) Rapin by mistake says September. He died about Midnight of the first of December, being Sunday.

(3) Gervase of Leicester gives us the barbarous manner of embalming the King's Body. They cut great Gashes in his Flesh with Knives, and then pouring it well with Salt, wrapped it up in tanned Ox-hides to avoid the Stench, which was to last till a Man who was hired to open his Head died presently after.

(4) Though there is no mention of this King's Monument, the Monks of Reading are thought to erect a Tomb answerable to the Dignity of their Founder. Upon the Suppression of the Abbies, his Bones are said to be thrown out to make room for a Sable of Harris. The Monastery is now a dwelling House. Stamford.

(5) Among his other Buildings was a magnificent Palace at Woodstock, to which he adjoined a large Park, inclosed with a Stone Wall, which is affirmed to be the first Park in England. Though there were afterwards so great a Number, that there were computed more in this Kingdom than in all the Christian World besides.

(6) The rest of his natural Children were: II. Richard by the Widow of Anselm a Nobleman in Normandy. He was drowned with Prince William. III. Robert created Earl of Cornewall in the Year of Stephen, by Sibyl Daughter of Robert Count of Altois in Normandy. IV. Robert by Editha, Daughter of a northern Gentleman. V. Gilbert, mentioned without any particulars by W. Gmet. VI. William de Tracy, so named from a Town in Normandy. VII. Henry, by Ngla Daughter of Rhes ap Iudor, Prince of South Wales (Wife afterwards of Girald of Windsor, Constable of Worcester, Wells, and Andover of the Earls of Kildare in Ireland). He was born and bred, and lived and married in Wales, having two Sons Meilir and Robert. He left his Life in the Conflict between Margaret Son of the King of Normandy, and Hugh Montgomery Earl of Shrovetbury, 1197. VIII. Maad, Wife of Retro Earl of Perch. She was drowned with Prince William. IX. Another Maad married to Conan the Gruff, Earl of Bretagne. X. Julian married to Eustace de Beauvais, natural Son of William de Breteuil, eldest Son and Heir of William, and eldest Brother of Regis Earl of Hereford in England. XI. Constance natural Wife of Refulin, Viscount Beaumont (a Town of Normandy in France) and by him Mother of Richard Viscount Beaumont, Father of Emmery Queen of William King of Scotland, and of Constance de Beau, to whom King John confirmed the Estate of her Grandmother Constance. XII. Elizabeth, by Elizabeth Sister of Walter Earl of Morbay, married to Alexander King of Scotts. These, with two other legitimate Daughters, are mentioned by Gmet c. 13. s. c. 29.

HENRY imagined he had taken so just Measures to secure the Succession to the Empire his Daughter, that he could not believe they would ever fail. The triple Oath, by which he had bound the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, seemed to him a sufficient Fence against their Ambition. At least, he could not think, that supposing, some one should irreligiously violate so solemn Engagements, the rest would be willing to favour his Designs. And yet, this Tie, which appeared so strong, could not hinder those whom he least mistrusted, from contriving, even before his Death, how to render all his Precautions ineffectual. We may have observed, in the three foregoing Reigns, with what Partiality Riches, Honours, and Places, were bestowed upon Foreigners, particularly upon those that had any Relation to the Royal Family. These three last Kings, by excluding the English from their Favours in order to lavish them on the Normans, were in hopes, by that means, to secure the Crown in their Family. But on the contrary, by heaping Estates and Honours on their Relations, instead of gaining their Children Friends, they created them Rivals. By strengthening the Foreigners against the English, they unadvisedly cherished the Ambition of the former, and put it out of the Power of the latter to support the Royal Family, when most in need of Protection.

Among those that shared the late King's Favours, Stephen Earl of Boulogne his Nephew, was the most considerable. Adala his Mother, Daughter of William the Conqueror, brought the Earl of Blis her Husband four Sons, of whom Theobald, the second, succeeded his Father, the eldest being incapacitated by some natural Defects. Stephen, the third Son, was sent into England to the King his Uncle, Henry the youngest, was a Monk in the Monastery of Gligni. Stephen's noble Qualities soon gained him the Esteem and Affection of the King, who took a Pleasure in making him rich and powerful. Besides, he poltrolick thought he could do no better than enable his Nephews to support his Family. With this view, he conferred on Stephen the Lands, taken from the Earl of Mortaign, and sending for Henry from the Monastery of Gligni, made him Abbot of Glasenbury, and, some time after, Bishop of Winchester. The King's Favour gaining the two Brothers great Credit and Interest in England, they formed to strong a Party, that they thought themselves able to take advantage of the Disaster befallen the Royal Family, in the Death of Prince William. It is true, when the late King was desirous to secure the Crown to Matilda, Stephen was the first that swore to that Princess. But, besides that he could not be excused, it was not yet time to discover his Designs. Perhaps too he hoped the King out of Affection, might give him his Daughter. However this be, his hopes, if he had entertained any, vanishing with Matilda's Marriage with the Earl of Anjou, he turned his Thoughts to the accomplishing of his Project. By means of secret Emiliaries, he fomented the Discontent caused by this Marriage among the Nobility, and made sure beforehand of the Assistance of those, who were best able to place him on the Throne after the King's Death. He acted however with so much Caution, that his Uncle never once suspected his Intentions. On the contrary, a little before his Death, he gave him a fresh Mark of his Affection, by marrying him to Matilda, only Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Boulogne, by which he became more powerful and in greater Credit than ever.

As the King's last Sickness appeared at first very dangerous, Stephen, who attended him into Normandy, sent speedy notice to the Bishop of Winchester his Brother, that he might renew his Intrigues to procure him the Crown. This Prelate had now gained to his Interest the Archbishop of Canterbury and Roger Bishop of Salisbury, who had both a great Influence on the Clergy. The last was the wealthiest Subject in England, having had Opportunity to amass vast Riches in the Administration of Affairs Ecclesiastical and Civil, which the late King had entirely entrusted him with. The Occasion of his Rise was something particular. Whilst he was only a Parish-Priest in Normandy, Henry, who had then no Prospect of mounting the Throne, chanced to come into the Church, where he was saying Mass. The great Care wherewith the Priest performed the Service, pleased the King so, that he desired to have him for his Chaplain (1). Roger did not want much Intreaty to accept of an Honour he so little expected. Though he was no Scholar, he was naturally of so pliable a Disposition, and so much a Courtier, that he quickly gained the good Graces of his Patron, who loaded him with Favours. As soon as he came to the Crown, his first care was to prefer his Chaplain, by promoting him to the See of Salisbury. But not stopping there, he committed to him afterwards the Management of all important Affairs in Church and State, and made him his Chief Justiciary. This high Post furnished the Bishop with an Opportunity of heaping up immense Riches, which he expended not so much in Acts of Charity, as in building stately Palaces, and keeping as splendid an Equipage almost as the King himself.

It was a great Advantage to Stephen to have for him three Prelates, whose Interest secured him the Suffrages of all the Clergy. This Body was then so powerful, that the Lay-Lords that were not in the Plot did not think themselves able to oppose the Design, which they saw was entirely formed, of placing Stephen on the Throne, since all the Bishops declared in his Favour. Not one attempted to speak for Matilda; so great an Influence had the Example and Authority of the Clergy over the Minds of the Nobles and People. In the mean time, Henry dying in Normandy, Stephen forthwith repaired into England to back his Pretensions with his Presence (2).

rum Defens, or Exchequer of Egger, and the Statutum St. Michaelis, or Exchequer of Michaelmas, which were the general Terms for the Sheriffs and other Accountants to pay in their Fermes or Rents, and other Issues of their Bailiwicks. This was the ordinary Process, but upon urgent occasions the King sometimes issued special Writs to the Sheriffs and others concerned in collecting the Revenue, commanding them to levy Debts, &c. with all speed. Secondly, As to the manner of issuing the King's Money: This was done several ways. Whilst the Money remained in the Hands of the Sheriff, Fermes and others, it was usual for the King, his Chief Justiciary, Great Officers of his Court, Treasurer or Baron of the Exchequer, to order them by Writ, to make Provisions and Payments out of the Money in their Hands. This Writ was sometimes called Warrantum, the Sheriff's Warrant, for upon producing it, he had Allowance made to him of sums upon his Account. Sometimes the King's Money was issued by way of Precept or Imprest, of Precept, either out of the Receipt of Exchequer, the Wardrobe, or other the King's Treasuries. Imprest seems to have been of the Nature of a Conduictum or Accomptum, and when a Man had Money imprested to him, he became accountable to the Crown for the same. In the fifth Year of King Stephen, an Accompt was rendered at the Exchequer of certain Money, imprested to the Accountant, when the Emperor came into England. Mag. Rot. 5. Steph. According to antient usage, the King's Treasure was to be issued by Virtue of a Writ or Mandate under the Great or Privy-Seal, and directed sometimes to the Chief Justiciary and Baron of the Exchequer, but most commonly to the Treasurer and Chamberlain of the Receipt. And the Writ was founded upon a Bill or Certificate from the Exchequer, Wardrobe, or other Master of Record. But the usual Writ for issuing the King's Money out of the Exchequer, was the Liberate, so called from that Word used in Writ directed to the Treasurer and Chamberlain. This Writ was of two sorts: a Liberate for paying a Sum due one way; and a Liberate Current or Demand for paying in Continuance or more than once. The Reader may see Instances of all these Things in Madox's Hist. of the Excheq. ch. vi. c.

1135. Supported as he was, he found no great Difficulty to carry the Prize from an absent Prince, whose capricious and haughty Temper had already formed a great Prejudice against her. If the Nobility had really that Attachment for Religion, which they affected to shew, their repeated Oaths to Matilda would have been an insuperable Obstacle to Stephen's Election. But they were then as well skilled, as now, in the Art of evading the most solemn Oaths by Distinctions and Mental Reservations, which render the use of an Oath of no Effect. The Archbishop of Canterbury affirmed, the Oath taken to Matilda, was null and void, as being directly contrary to the Customs of the English, who had never suffered a Woman to reign over them. The Bishop of Salisbury maintained, the Oath was not binding, because Matilda was married out of the Realm, without the Consent of the Barons, whose Intest, when they swore, was, not to give themselves a King, but of the Race of William the Conqueror. In fine, to remove all Scruples, Hugh Bigod, the late King's Steward, swore on the Holy Evangelists, that Henry before he died disinherited Matilda, and nominated his Nephew Stephen for his Successor. This was sufficient to palliate the Disloyalty of the Barons. On these weak Grounds they rejected Matilda's Right, which they had thrice sworn to maintain, and crowned Stephen the 26th of December (1), twenty-four Days after Henry's Death. Thus this Prince saw herself deprived of the Crown, by those whom the King her Father thought most firmly engaged to stand by her. So true it is, that the Precautions suggested by human Prudence are very little to be relied on (2).

Stephen was then one and thirty Years old, and in great Esteem with the Nobility. But his Age and noble Qualities were no Addition to his Right. His Title was so weak, that, to engage the Barons to support it, he was forced to promise them more Privileges under his Government, than they had enjoyed in the Reigns of the Norman Kings his Predecessors, and doubtless, more than he ever intended to grant. This was the sole Motive of their concurring so heartily to his Election. They imagined, his being indebted to them for the Crown, would always dispose him to be grateful. But they could not expect the like from Matilda, who, having a clearer Title, would not think herself under the same Obligations. Stephen therefore, willing to spare nothing for a Crown, that might so justly be disputed with him, promised to reform whatever was amiss in the three foregoing Reigns; and the Bishop of Winchester his Brother, passed his Word for him. This Juncture was too favourable for the Barons to let it pass without Improvement. When the Oath came to be administered to the new King, much more was required of him than of his Predecessors. The Import of the Oath was, "That he would, without such a Time, fill the vacant Bishopricks, and leave the Temporalities in the Hands of some Ecclesiastick, who should take Charge of them till the Vacancy was filled. That he would not seize the Woods of any Clerk or Layman, upon frivolous Pretences, as his Predecessors had done; but be content with the Forests, which belonged to the two Williams; and make Restitution of such as Henry had usurped. Lastly, that he would abolish Danegeld, which was insupportable to the Nation, and being taken away by King Edward, was restored by the Norman Kings." The Bishops, on their part, took an Oath which was no less uncommon, for they swore Allegiance no longer than he should continue to maintain the Church in her Privileges. The Lay-Lords acted with the same Caution, if we may judge by the Oath of the Earl of Gloucester, natural Son of the late King. He swore Fidelity to the King, but on condition he would preserve his Estates and Honors entire, and observe the Covenants made with the Barons. Stephen promised to do whatever was required of him, and moreover to grant an authentick Charter for the Security of the Liberties of the Nation, and the Privileges of the Church.

The Coronation being over, the new King posted to Winchester, to take Possession of the Treasure of the late King, which amounted to a hundred thousand Marks (3), besides Plate and Jewels. With this Money he levied an Army of Britons, Picards, Flemings, and other Foreigners, whose Assistance he thought he might want, not having yet any great Confidence in his own Subjects. At his Return from Winchester, he went to meet the Corps of the late King, which was coming from Normandy, in order to be interred at Reading, according to his own Directions.

Hitherto Stephen had met with no Opposition (4). But he plainly foresaw it would be otherwise hereafter. It was very likely Matilda and Geffrey her Husband would not fail to attempt the Recovery of a Crown taken from them. It was requisite therefore to endeavour to gain the Good-will of the People; and the most proper means to that end, was to shew, he really intended to perform his Promises. With this view, he convened a General Assembly at Oxford, where he signed the promised Charter; the chief Articles of which were as follows: "He acknowledges his being elected King, by the Assent of the Clergy and People. He confirms all the Liberties, Privileges and Immunities of the Church, and consents that all Ecclesiastical Causes and Persons shall be tried by the Clergy. He promises, not to meddle in any manner with the Temporalities of vacant Bishopricks, or Estates belonging to the Ecclesiasticks. He abolishes all Laws relating to Hunting and the Forests enacted since the Conquest (5). Lastly, to gain entirely the Affection of the English, he revives the ancient Saxon Laws." This Charter was very advantageous for the People, had it been punctually observed. But, as an Historian remarks, as the English elected Stephen purely for their own Interest, so this Prince granted all they required, rather to amuse them, than to bind himself with these Parchment-Clains. The Solidity of this Remark is visible in the Behaviour of the King a few Months after. The Archbishoprick of Canterbury becoming vacant by the Death of Corbet (6), the King seized the Revenues, and kept them in his Hands above two Years. Neither did he rest there. As the Archbishop died intestate, he seized his Effects, pretending it was the Preogative of the Crown. It is true, he only followed the Example of three former Kings. But, supposing he was possessed of that Right, he had promised to positively give it up, that this Proceeding could not be considered but as an express Breach of his Charter and Oath.

The beginning of this Reign was very peaceable: But this Tranquillity lasted not long. The Subjects, grown insolent, set too high a value on the Service they had done the King. There were some also, who, being forced to comply with the Sentiments of the Majority, were waiting for an Opportunity to take away the Reproach the Nation lay under for the Breach of their Oath. The King, who was not ignorant how Matters stood, did all he could to gain the People's Affection, for whom he foresaw he should soon have occasion. With this view it was that he conferred Titles and Honours on several Persons, and alienated abundance of the Crown-Lands to such as might be serviceable to him. Mean time, this Bounty had not the Effect he proposed. Those that partook of his Favours, considered them as their due Reward; whilst others that were neglected, entertained a Jealousy, which in the end proved very fatal to him. But his greatest oversight was suffering the Barons to fortify their Castles (7), which put it in their Power to revolt whenever they pleased. In a little time, there were above a thousand fortified Castles in divers parts of the Kingdom.

The Insolence of Baldwin de Redvers (8) Earl of Devonshire, quickly made Stephen sensible of his Error. The Earl taking it as an Affront, that the King should deny him some Favor, openly declared he would obey him no longer. Pursuant to this Resolution, he furnished his Castle at Exeter, where he acted as Sovereign, exercising a tyrannical Power upon the Citizens. This Revolution was the more dangerous, as the Welsh at the same time made an Irruption into the Frontiers, and carried away a great Booty. The King, judging Baldwin's Affair to be of greater Importance than the Inroads of the Welsh, went and laid Siege to Exeter, which took him up a considerable Time. At length, becoming Master of the Place, he pursued the Rebel to the Isle of Wight, and compelling him to fly from thence, banished him from the Realm (9), but pardoned all the other Offenders. This 1136. Indulgence proved very prejudicial to him, as it served to imbolden the discontented Party.

The Welsh War ended not so successfully. In a Battle fought near Cardigan, the King's Troops were so roughly handled, that very few escaped (1). It is said, the English Soldiers were struck with such a Pannick, that they suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners by the very Women.

1137. Whilst the English Arms were employed in Wales, David King of Scotland made an Incurtion into the northern Counties of England, under pretence of revenging the Wrong done to the Empress's Niece. He immediately became Master of Carlisle and Newcastle, and pushing his Conquests, advanced as far as Durham. As soon as Stephen could get clear of the Welsh, he marched into the North (2), to repel the King of Scotland. The Particulars of this War, of little Moment in themselves, are variously related by the Historians of the two Nations, who agree in nothing but the Conclusion. They unanimously tell us, it ended in a Treaty of Peace, whereby the King of Scotland was to have Carlisle, and Prince Henry his Son the Earldom of Huntington (3), for which he did Homage to the King of England. The reason of the Son's being invested, was, because the Father refused to accept it on that condition, alleging he had sworn to acknowledge no other Sovereign in England but Matilda, in case King Henry died without Issue Male (4).

Stephen was no sooner returned from his northern Expedition, but he fell into a Lethargy, which made it thought his Death was at hand. The supposed certainty thereof caused in England as well as in Normandy, such Troubles as were not easily allayed. The King's Friends were disheartened, and Matilda's Party considerably increased, by the Rumour of the King's having resigned his last Breath. On the other hand, the Welsh, looking upon this as a favorable Juncture, renewed the War; whilst the Earl of Anjou entered Normandy, to take possession of that Part of the King's Father-in-law's Inheritance. But, for what Reason I know not, this Prince was become so odious to the Normans, that, to avoid falling under his Government, they called in Theobald Earl of Blais, Stephen's elder Brother. Theobald, taking them whilst they were in this Mind, came to Lisieux, where the Earl of Gloucester delivered him the Keys of Falsaj (5). This Earl remembering the last Commands of the King his Father in behalf of Matilda, had with great Reluctancy taken the Oath to Stephen. But as it was not in his Power to support alone the Empress's Right, he chose to differ in expectation of a favorable Opportunity to declare in her favor. He believed he had found one by introducing the Earl of Blais into Normandy; imagining this Prince, who looked with an envious Eye on his Brother's Greatness, would raise such Troubles, as might turn to Matilda's Advantage.

Mean time, Stephen being perfectly recovered, found his Affairs in the utmost Confusion. The great Men, who had depended upon the King's Death, were already entered into several Factions, from whence he foresaw, it would be difficult to disengage them. Theobald his Brother, creating him most Uneasiness, he resolved to attack him first, before he was strengthened with the Assistance of the King of France, who alone was able to support him. To this End, he went into Normandy (6), carrying with him large Sums of Money, with which he prevailed upon the chief Men of the Country to abandon the Earl of Blais. This change ought not to have surprized the Earl, since the Normans had not called him in but on supposition that Stephen was dead or dying, and to avoid being subject to the Earl of Anjou.

The Normans thus deserting the Earl of Blais, was a great Advantage to Stephen. But, to deprive him of all Support, the King employed Part of his Money in gaining the French King to his Interest. This Expedient succeeding to his Will, he made an offensive League with France, which put it out of the Power of his Enemies to hurt him. However, as Levis could not, without some Uneasiness, see England and Normandy in the Hands of the same Person, Stephen resigned the last to Engleze Earl of Boulogne his eldest Son, who did Homage to the King of France for it. Theobald finding he was not strong enough to stand against the two Monarchs, thought fit to retire. However, he sent word to the King his Brother, that although he was forced to give way, he did not desist from his Pretensions, as eldest, both to Normandy and England. But he acted not according to this stout Message. For shortly after he renounced his pretended Right for the annual Pension of two thousand Marks (7).

The Union of the two Kings had the same Effect with regard to the Earl of Anjou, whose Pretensions, as Husband to Matilda, were much stronger. It is true, he made some farther Attempts upon Normandy. But after trying in vain to gain it by way of Arms, he was forced to accept, as a Favor, a Pension of five thousand Marks.

Matters being thus settled in Normandy, Stephen hoped to enjoy some Repose in England, when Advice was brought him that the King of Scotland had made an Irruption into Northumberland (8). Nay he was made to fear, and very justly too, that he was invited by the English Barons to support the Empress's Right. For whilst David was ravaging the northern Borders, some English Lords had seized Bedford, and probably, did not intend to stop there. Upon this News Stephen speedily returned into England; and though it was in the midst of Winter (9), laid Siege to Bedford, never quitting it till he was Master of the Place (10). After which, he marched towards Scotland, where David was retired.

Whilst he was employed in revenging on the Scots, the Mischief they had done the English, he was recalled (11) by an Insurrection of almost all the Barons. This News surprized him; though one would think he should not wonder at the Barons breaking their Oath, since he himself had done the same with regard to Matilda. The Malecontents complained, he had violated his Promises in many Particulars relating as well to the People as the Church. But this was only a Pretence to cover their private Recriminations. The true Reason of their Discontent was, their not being rewarded in the Manner they expected. Ever since the King's Accession to the Crown, they had continually teased him with their Requests, though he endeavoured one while by Arguments, another while by Promises, and very often by actual Grants, to satisfy the most Importunate. But all this was not able to secure their Allegiance, which was wholly grounded upon the Expectation, all had of obtaining the same Honours, the same Estates, the same Poss, which was impossible.

At the head of the Revolters was Robert Earl of Gloucester (12), who had artfully improved these Dispositions to form a Party in favour of the Empress's Sister, strong enough to place her on the Throne. He is said to embark in this Enterprize at the Instances of certain Monks, who represented to him how much he hazarded his Salvation in obeying an Usurper, contrary to his Oath to Matilda. Hence it is evident, the Monks were deeply concerned in the Plot, and the Earl of Gloucester probably, was not the only Person to whom they had made the like Remonstrances. Some Historians add, the Earl acted on this occasion from a Motive of Revenge for the King's attempting to poison him. But if it be true that Stephen had such a Design, it is not likely, it was before the Earl had taken Arms against him. Be this as it will, as soon as Robert was sufficiently supported, he went to the Empress and informed her of what he had done for her. After that, he wrote an abusive Letter to Stephen himself, upbraiding him for the Breach of his Oath to Matilda, and charging him with drawing him, by his Seducements, into the same Crime. To this Letter he added a Manifesto, calling Stephen an Usurper, and declaring War against him. The 1138. King returned him no Answer, but confiscated all his Estate in England (1).

Mean time, Matilda's Party daily growing stronger by the Junction of the most powerful among the Barons, the Earl of Gloucester came into England (2), and got possession of Bristol (3). At the same time other Lords (4) seized upon several Castles that the former Kings had caused to be fortified for the Security of the Crown, but, on this occasion served only to put it in danger. Stephen finding himself thus forced to wage War with his own Subjects, retook and razed several of these Castles. Though he had great Reason to fear in this general a Defection, yet he supported himself with his Army of Foreigners (5); shewing on all occasions an extraordinary Courage, and a steady Resolution to lose his Life with his Crown. He thought it strange, that the very Persons who had shewn the most Zeal to raise him to the Throne, should be the first to pull him down (6). As one is always inclined to flatter one's Self, he could not see any thing in his Conduct that deserved this Return, and therefore ascribed it wholly to the Caprice and Fickleness of the Barons. Nevertheless, their Complaints were not entirely groundless. Besides that the King had not punctually observed his Charter, the extraordinary Favours bestowed on the Foreigners, particularly on William of Tyre his Favourite, gave his Subjects a very plausible pretence to complain. The Severity also he used, upon the breaking out of the Rebellion, in seizing the Persons and Estates of some of the Barons on bare Suspitions, added fresh Fuel to the Fire that was already too much kindled. In fine, the diffension grew to that height by mutual Reproaches and daily Acts of Hostility, that the Male-contents felt Matilda word, they were ready to own her for Sovereign (7), according to the Promise made the King her Father.

The King of Scotland fomented these Troubles in favour of the Emperess his Niece, though he was also Uncle to Stephen's Queen (8). When he found Matters ripe, he once more entered Northumberland, and cruelly ravaged that Country, which generally felt all the Effects of the Quarrels between England and Scotland. As Stephen could not then leave the Heart of the Kingdom, to go to the Relief of the North, Thurstan Archbishop of York undertook to oppose this Invasion (9). He assembled the Barons and Gentlemen of the northern Parts, and represented to them, That in this Emergency, they were to depend upon themselves, it not being in the King's Power to send them Assistance. This Consideration having the Effect he expected, they unanimously engaged to exert their utmost to repulse the Enemy. Shortly after, each appearing with his Troops at the general Rendezvous, they all ranged themselves under the Command of Walter de Espec and William Earl of Albemarle (10), and advanced as far as Alverton (11). Having resolved to expect the Enemy in that Place, they set up a Mast, on the top of which they placed a Silver Pix, with a consecrated Host, and the Banners of St. Peter and St. John of Beverly, to serve as an Ensign where they were to meet again and rally in case of need. Hence this War was called the War of the Standard. Alfred Abbot of Rievall has given a particular description of the Battle; but, as it seems to me of little Moment, I shall only relate the Success. The Scots, much superior in Number, attacking the English in their Intrenchments, were repulsed with the loss of twelve thousand Men (12). Though the King of Scotland and Henry his Son gave on this occasion astonishing Proofs of their Valour, they could not prevent their Army from being entirely routed. It is said a Bishop's (13) Harangue to the English, promising Heaven to all such as were slain in the Battle, did not a little contribute to the Success of that Day.

Whilst his Affairs were thus prosperous in the North, Stephen spread the Terror of his Arms in the heart of the Kingdom. The Male-contents not daring to keep the Field, gave him time to reduce their Castles one after another without opposition (14). These Conquests joined to his late Victory over the King of Scotland, astonished the Earl of Gloucester. He expected quite another Issue of this War, but when he saw his Party daily diminishing, he had no other refuge but to go and solicit the Emperess to come into England and encourage her Friends by her Presence.

The Retreat of the Earl of Gloucester, and the Flight of some other Lords of his Party, procuring the King some Respite, he resolved to pursue the Scotch War, so successfully begun. To that end, he advanced towards the North, and in his way took the Castle of Leeds; after which, he continued his March to Scotland, where David retired after his Defeat. His Intent was to give the Scotch King Battle. But as David was unwilling to run any hazard in his own Country, he carefully avoided all opportunities of fighting. However, fearing he might be at length compelled to it, he resolved to sue for Peace. At any other Time, Stephen would have made him pay dear for it, but at that Juncture did not think proper to stand off. The truth is, the Advantages he could expect from that War were not comparable to the Mischiefs his Absence might occasion: And therefore he concluded a Peace with David (15), whereby Prince Henry of Scotland was put in possession of the County of Northumberland, and Earldom of Huntingdon. In return for these Advantages, David swore never more to concern himself in the Quarrel between Stephen and the Emperess.

The War being thus ended, the King returned into his Dominions, attended by the Prince of Scotland, who by his noble and generous Carriage, had won the Heart of Stephen, that he loved him as if he had been his own Son (16). The King's Careless to the young Prince, raised the Jealousy of the Earl of Chester and some other Lords, who, on pretence that the King placed him above them at his Table, retired from Court. But, supposing Henry's Birth did not require that distinction, yet his Merit deserved the King's particular regard; for, according to all the Historians, he was an accomplished Prince. Stephen continued therefore, notwithstanding the Jealousy of the English, to shew him Marks of his Esteem, particularly in a case, which demonstrated his Sincerity. This young Prince, who had accompanied the King to the Siege of Ludlow, approaching too near the Walls, was like to have been pulled from his Horse by an Iron Hook at the end of a Rope, if Stephen, with the hazard of his own Life, had not rescued him. An Action which redounded as much to the Honour of the King, as of the Prince for whom he testified so great an Affection.

This same Year Alberic, the Pope's Legate in England, called a Synod, where Theobald Abbot of Bec was elected Archbishop of Canterbury, to the great Satisfaction of the English, who beheld the Metropolitan See vacant for two Years.

Stephen's late Peace with Scotland, and his Advantages over his domestick Enemies, procured him a Tranquillity which seemed likely to continue. And probably, it would not have been disturbed, if an unseasonable Quarrel with the Clergy, had not hurled him down from the height of Grandeur and Glory, to the most deplorable State a Sovereign could possibly be reduced to. The Bishops had been very instrumental in placing him on the Throne. From that time their Power was so much increased, that it was no less dangerous for the King to make them his Enemies, than it was advantageous to have them in his Interest at the time of his Election. Nevertheless, his Jealousy of their Power, suffered him not to confider, with his wonted Prudence, the danger he exposed himself to, in resolving to humble them. Roger Bishop of Salisbury had two Castles as strong as they were lately, one at the Devizes (17), and the other at Sherburn, and was building a third at Malinsbury. Alexander his Nephew, Bishop of Lincoln, had built one at Newark; not scrupling to declare openly, it was designed as much for the Security as the Dignity of his 1038. Church. Nigel, Bishop of Ely, another of Roger's Nephews, imitating the State of his Uncle and Cousin, affected a Magnificence in his Retinue and House, that excited the Envy of some, and the Indignation of all. When these three Prelates came to Court, they were attended with many armed Followers, as if they designed rather to brave the King, than to pay him their Respects. This Pomp and Grandeur procuring their abundance of Enemies, there were some that took occasion to whisper in the King's Ear, that he could not be safe as long as the Bishops were so powerful. His Suspicions were further confirmed by the Rumour of Matilda's preparing to come into England, where she had a strong Party. Though the Bishop of Salisbury had been a principal Instrument of Stephen's Election, yet he fancied him the Pride of and in this Belief formed a Design to humble the Pride of the Bishop and his Nephews. It was not long before an opportunity offered. In a General Assembly held at Oxford (1), the Retainers of the Bishop of Salisbury quarrelling with those of Alan of Bretagne, Earl of Richmond, one of the Earl's Knights chanced to be killed in the Scuffle, and many wounded on both Sides (2). The Bishop's Men had the Advantage, being assisted by those of the Bishops of Ely and Lincoln, and of the Chancellor, who passed for Roger's Nephew, though in Truth he was his Son (3). The King, willing to improve this occasion to mortify the whole Family, summoned them all four to appear at his Court, and answer for this Riot of their Domesticks. This Summons was just and legal, but the Satisfaction demanded by the King was excessive. He was not content with the Penalty enjoyn'd by the Law in the like Cases; but insisted upon the Bishops delivering into his Hands all their Castles, as a Security for their future Allegiance. This Demand seeming too exorbitant to the Prelates, they desired time to consider of the Matter. Whilst the King waited for their Answer, the Bishop of Ely absented himself, and retired to Roger's Uncle's Castle at the Devizes. This Flight breaking off the Accommodation, the King went immediately and laid Siege to the Castle, where was also Matilda, Wife or Concubine of the Bishop of Salisbury. This Place being very strong, the King, who foresaw the difficulty of the Siege, bethought himself of an Expedient to put an end to it without loss of time. He ordered the Bishop of Salisbury and the Chancellor (4) to be led up close to the Wall; and sent word to Matilda, unless she delivered up the Castle, the Chancellor should be immediately hanged, neither should the Bishop eat or drink till it was surrendered. These Threats producing the Effect he expected, the delivered up the Castle (5), where he found forty thousand Marks in ready Money. The Bishop of Lincoln purchased his Liberty, by surrendering to the King his Castle of Stasford. Shortly after, Stephen became Master likewise of the Castles of Salisbury, Malmesbury and Sherborn. With the Money, found in these Places, where the Bishops kept their Treasures, he purchased the Friendship of the King of France, and made an Alliance with him. This Alliance was cemented by the Marriage of Eustace, Son of Stephen, with Constance Sister to Lewis the Young, who succeeded Lewis the Grose, his Father.

The King's Severity to the Bishops very much displeased all the Clergy, who made loud Complaints. The Archbishop of Roan, being then in England, was the only one not offended at it. He was of Opinion that, without striking at the Immunities of the Church, the King might dispossess the Bishops of their fortified Castles, which concerned not their Privileges as Churchmen. But which concerned not the Bishop of Winchester, lately made Legate for England, was not of his Mind. This Prelate was secretly displeased with the King his Brother, for not admitting him into the Administration of Affairs (6). He expected otherwise, when he laboured so heartily to place him on the Throne. But finding there was no likelihood of his having for the future any share in the Government, he eagerly embraced this Opportunity of creating him Trouble, under Pretence of maintaining the Rights of the Church. To that Purpose, he called a Synod at Winchester, and summoned the King to appear and give an Account of his Actions. At the opening of the Synod, 1039. he aggravated in a virulent Latin Speech all that Stephen had done against the three Bishops. He extorted the Prelates vigorously to maintain the Rights of the Episcopal Dignity, and the Privileges of the Church. Preaching he would put in execution the Decrees of the Council, though it cost him the Friendship of the King, the Life of his Estate, and even Life itself. Stephen had sent to St. Peter, the Council some Lords, with Albert de Vere a famous Civilian (8). As soon as the Legate had ended his Speech, these Lords demanded, why the King was summoned thither. The Legate answered, to give a Reason of his imprisoning the Bishops, and despoiling them of their Estates; a Crime, added he, hitherto unheard of in the Christian World. Albert, taking him up, said, the Prelates were punished not as Bishops, but as the King's Servants. The Bishop of Salisbury not relishing that Distinction, roundly told him, the Bishops could not, in any respect, be considered as the King's Servants. The Majority of the Synod being much of the same Opinion, the Archbishop of Roan, who thought the Episcopal Dignity did not render a Subject Independent, endeavoured to set them right. He demanded, whether they could clearly prove by the Canons, that Bishops ought of Right to have fortified Castles? But, suppose (says he) you can prove such a Right by the Canons, ought you not to commit your Castles to the King's disposal, when the Kingdom is threatened with an Invasion? Is it not the King's Business to take care of the Safety of the State? And can Subjects refuse to admit him into their Castles without incurring the Guilt of Rebellion? These Arguments not prevailing with the Bishops to desist from their Pretension, the Legate moved to excommunicate the King, and send Deputies to Rome to carry their Complaints to the Pope. The Lords sent by the King, thought it time to speak in a higher Tone. They declared, if the Synod offered to excommunicate the King, the Bishops would soon have cause to repent; and it any premeditated to go to Rome, on such an occasion, their return would be very difficult. This Declaration made such Impression on the Bishops, that none of them were willing to expose themselves to the King's Retenement, to gratify the Legate. Accordingly, the Synod being satisfied with ordering a Deputation to the King to demand a suitable Reparation, broke up (9) after a three day Session. Pursuant to this Resolution, the Legate and Archbishop of Canterbury went to the King, and earnestly besought him to prevent a Rupture between the Ecclesiastical and Secular Powers. Which was, in plain English, requiring him to make ample Satisfaction to the Clergy, otherwise a Rupture was unavoidable: for this was the real meaning of their Words. It cannot be conceived on what other Foundation the Clergy then pretended to be Independent of the Crown, than their being grown so powerful that they thought, the King could not stand without them. Formerly, during the Empire of the Saxons, the Bishops thought it an Honour to be ranked with the Thanes, that is, with the King's Servants. After the Norman Conquest, William I. threw the Bishops into Prison upon bare Suspicions: Some he banished, others he deprived of their Bishopricks, without any one's daring to stir, and the People looked on unconcerned. But in the Reign of Stephen, it was an unheard of Crime to dispossess the Bishops of their Castles, and an unpardonable Rashness to file them the King's Servants. For some time past, the Clergy had established it as a Maxim, that the main of Religion consisted in upholding the Church in all the Privileges and Immunities she herself was pleased to assume. Be this as it will, the People were all in Combustion upon this Occasion, as if themselves had been deprived of their Liberties. The whole Kingdom swarmed in an Instant with Male-contents, who only wanted a Leader to command them. In fine, the Clergy's Faction was so strong, that most of the Lay-Lords came over to their Side and espoused their Cause. The Emperess thinking this a favorable Juncture, resolved to improve it and go into England (10), though she had but one hundred and forty Men to accompany her. This was a very inconsiderable Troop for the Undertaking, she was meditating; but she relied on a powerful Aid from the Male-contents. She took up her first Quarters at the Castle of Arundel, belonging to the Queen Dowager, as Part of her Dowry (1). The Earl of Glocester, who came with his Sister, thinking her life in a Place where she was received with all the Respect due to her Rank, left her and went to Bristol (2). Mean while, Stephen, who was besieging Marstonburgh, being informed of Matilda's Arrival, suddenly raised the Siege and marched towards Arundel. Upon the King's Approach, the Queen Dowager repented of admitting Matilda, fearing it might occasion the Loss of her Castle, with all the Privileges he enjoyed in England. On the other hand, Honour and Honesty would not suffer her to deliver her Guest into the hands of her Enemy. To get clear of this Perplexity, she sent the King word, if he insisted upon the delivery of the Empress, she was no less bent, on her Side, to protect her, till some or other came to her Relief. But withal desired him to confider, she had not entertained her as an Enemy to the King, but as her Daughter-in-law, Widow of a great Emperor, to whom she could not be excused from paying the Respect due to her. That her Intent was not to countenance her Designs against him, but only to prevent any Ill from befalling her whilst under her Roof. In fine, she proposed to the King, that Matilda might have leave to retire to some other Place, where it would be as easy to besiege her as in Arundel Castle. That by this Generosity he would oblige a Queen, Widow of a great Monarch, his Uncle and Benefactor, without the least Detriment to himself. Whether Stephen was sensible it was not in his Power to take the Castle before it was relieved, or thought himself bound to oblige the Queen so far, he gave his Word, Matilda should be safely conducted to Bristol; which was accordingly done (3). But he had too much reason to repent afterwards of his being so generous. Matilda, after some stay at Bristol (4), removed to Glocester (5). Whilst she remained in these two Cities, she so artfully managed in her favour, the Discontents of the Clergy and Nobility, that she gained them both to her Interest, and by their Means, almost the whole Body of the People (6). There adhered to the King only a few Barons and his foreign Army, which though ill paid, served him faithfully (7).

I shall not undertake to relate the Particulars of this Civil War, which, like the rest of that Kind, furnishes more Instances of Treachery and Cruelty, than of glorious Actions. I shall content my self with observing the principal Events. Whilst it lasted, the whole Kingdom was divided, every City, County, and Person siding with the King on the Empress, according as they were swayed by Passion or Interest. The Lords, nearest in Neighbourhood and Blood, fell upon one another in a cruel Manner, burning the Houses, and pillaging the Vassals of each other, so that a terrible Confusion was quickly spread over the whole Kingdom. In this fatal Anarchy, the Barons, acting as Sovereigns, grievously oppressed the People, and were so presumptuous as to coin their own Money. On the other hand, the King and Matilda instead of redressing, connived at these Proceedings, fearing the calling their Friends to account would make them change Sides. Moreover, the foreign Soldiers, of whom Stephen's Army entirely consisted, occasioned still further Disorders. As the King was not able to pay them duly, he was forced to suffer them to plunder the poor People (8), who, though innocent, felt the greatest share of the Calamities such a War brings with it (9).

Mean time, the Bishop of Winchester, being at last sensible of his Error in raising a Storm, which he forew saw would infallibly overwhelm the King his Brother, suddenly changed Sides. He reflected, that being Brother to Stephen, he himself would certainly be involved in the same Ruin with him, and consequently, it was his Interest to support him, instead of promoting his Defraction. And therefore, desirous of regaining the King's Confidence by some important Service, he drew to Winchester a good Number of Lords, Friends to Matilda, and detained them Prisoners, till they delivered their Castles to the King.

Amidst all his Difficulties, Stephen showed a Firmness that kept many from deserting him, which, doubtless, they would have done upon the least Signs of Faint-heartedness. For it is always the Case, when, on the like Occasions, Princes seem to distrust their Fortune or Abilities. Instead of being daunted at the violent shocks, he received, Stephen daily endeavoured to remedy, by his Valour and Prudence, the Evils, he suffered by the Revolt of his Subjects. He even hoped to put an End to them at once, by laying Siege to Wallingford, where Matilda and the Earl of Glocester were shut up. But meeting with more difficulties in this Siege than he imagined, he turned it into a Blockade (10). He was no sooner retired, but the Earl of Glocester got out of the Castle, and went and seized Worcester, whilst the Barons of his Party ravaged the Counties of Chesler and Nottingham.

Mean time Matilda, being too closely pent up in Wallingford, found means to get from thence and retire to Lincoln. As soon as the King had Notice of it, he formed the Design of surprising her; well knowing, Lincoln, where he had many Friends, could not be defended by the few Troops, Matilda had with her. He would have taken his Rival in that Place, which held out but a few Days (11), had he not contrived to escape, whilst the Articles of the Capitulation were drawing. Stephen missing his Aim, retired without leaving a Garrison in the Town for fear of weakening his Army. He was hardly gone, when he was informed that the Earl of Chesler (12), Son-in-law of the Earl of Glocester, was come thither with his Wife and Brother (13), to keep their Christmas. His great Desire to have these three Persons in his power, made him march back with such speed that the Earl had but just Time to retire into the Castle, which was immediately invested. However, he found means to escape and get to the Earl of Glocester, to desire him to come to the Relief of the Besieged, who could not hold out long. The Earl of Glocester, willing to deliver his own Daughter, drew all his Troops together, and marched to Lincoln with that Speed, that he was like to surprize the King, who never imagined him so near. Having forded the River Trent, a thing the King thought impracticable, he came on a sudden so close to the Royal Army, that neither Side could possibly avoid Fighting. The two Armies being drawn up, the Battle begun, which for a long Time was fought on both Sides with equal Bravery (14). But at length the King's Horse, consisting of Flemings and Brabans, giving ground, they were so vigorously pressed, that they could never rally more. The Earl of Glocester improved this Advantage, not to pursue the flying Horse, who were incapable of hurting him, but to fall on the King's Infantry, who being destitute of the Assistance of the Cavalry, took to Flight also.

Mean time Stephen, who could not bear the Thoughts of flying, was left almost alone, and on foot, in the midst of the Field of Battle, assaulted by Multitudes, bit resisting all their Efforts with an astonishing Valour. If the Horse had rallied in the mean while, he might have freed himself from this Danger, to his immortal Fame. But destitute of all Assistance, he was forced at length to yield to Numbers, being surrounded on all Sides. However, it was not till the last Extremity; for his Battle-Ax breaking by the Force of his Blows, he drew his Sword, and defended himself for a considerable Time, foaming with Rage to see himself thus abandoned by his Army. At length, after performing more than could naturally be expected from a single Person in his Condion, his Sword flying in pieces, and little more than the Hilt remaining in his Hand, he was knocked down on his Knees with a Stone. Whereupon William de Kains a valiant Knight ran in, and seizing him by the Helmet presented his Sword to his Throat, threatening to kill him unless he yielded himself Prisoner. Notwithstanding the extreme Danger he was in, he refused to surrender to any but the Earl of Gloucester, who by good fortune was near at hand. As soon as the Earl had him in his Power, he conducted him to the Empress, (1), who ordered him to be confined in the Castle of Bristol, where he was ignominiously laid in Irons (2).

Whilst this unfortunate Prince was in so deplorable a Condition, Matilda improved the Advantages lately gained by her Arms. All England deserted the captive King, except London and Kent, where he had still some Friends left by the means of the Queen his Spouse, Eustace his Son, and William de Ypres his Favorite. The Barons that preserved their Allegiance, retired to London, where they had Interest enough to gain Admittance, and prevail with the Citizens to make a Confederacy with them in favor of the King. Normandy soon followed the Example of England. No sooner had the Earl of Anjou received advice of the King's Imprisonment, but he repaired to Normandy, to cause the Empress his Wife to be acknowledged, which he easily accomplished. At the same time, the King of Scotland breaking the late Treaty, invaded the northern Counties, under pretence of assisting the Empress, but in reality for his own private Advantage.

The Victory of Lincoln seemed at once to place Matilda on the Throne: But there was one Obstacle more to surmount, before she could hope to enjoy the Fruits of her Success; which was, to gain the Bishop of Winchester. This Prelate, who, by his Dignity of Legate was at the Head of the Clergy, might possibly set that powerful Body against her, whose Example had great Influence upon the Nobles and People. She deemed it necessary therefore to endeavour before all things to win him from the King, and with this view went to him at Winchester. He made some Difficulty at first to hearken to her Proposals. But upon her offering him the disposal of all the Church-Preferments, he threw up the Cause of the King his Brother, and promised to use his Endeavours to procure Matilda the Suffrages of the Clergy. He even took his Oath to her beforehand (3), but with this Limitation, that it should be binding no longer than the kept true to her Promises. On the morrow, he received her with great Pomp in the Cathedral Church, where he solemnly excommunicated all the King's Friends, and absolved all those that should abandon his Party and come over to the Empress. Shortly after the Archbishop of Canterbury swore likewise to Matilda (4). But he was so squeamish as to procure the King's Consent first, which he went to ask himself of Stephen in Prison.

There was nothing more wanting to Matilda but the Seal of publick Authority to be really Queen of England. But, though she was sure of the Consent of the Temporal Lords, she was apprehensive of meeting with Opposition from the Clergy, who, probably, would be more scrupulous on account of their Oath to the King. The Legate taking upon him to accomplish this Affair, called a Council at Winchester, where all the Bishops and Abbots were present, with the Archdeacons as Representatives of the Inferior Clergy. The Day before the opening of the Synod, the Legate privately conferred first with the Bishops, then with the Abbots, and lastly with the Archdeacons. It is not known what passed at these private Conferences, but it was plain, next Day, what use the Legate was willing to make of them. As soon as the Council was assembled, he made a long Speech, endeavoring to show that the Male-Administration, Infincerity and Tyranny of Stephen, had been the sole Cause of all the Troubles in the Kingdom. He owned that indeed he had pledged his Faith for him, when the Necessity of Affairs had, as it were, compelled the English to place the Crown on his Head: Adding, he was deceived the first, and with extreme grief saw himself obliged to revoke his Engagement. He insisted upon his former Oath to Matilda, adding it was more reasonable to regard the Orders of his eternal Father, whose Will it was that Justice should be done the Empress, than the Interests of a natural Brother. Then he said, he had done all that lay in his Power to make Stephen sensible of his Errors, even to the summoning him before a Synod, but that all his brotherly and kind Admonitions had proved ineffectual. That this Obstinacy was a clear Evidence to the English, what Calamities they would have been exposed to under the Government of such a Prince, if it had not pleased divine Providence to give Sentence against him by suffering him to be imprisoned. In fine, since God's Judgments were now fallen on the King whom they had elected, they were to atone for their Fault, by restoring the Crown to the Princess, to whom of Right it belonged. I have therefore, continues he, convened you, by virtue of the Apostolic Power committed unto me, to consult about the Means of appeasing the Troubles of the State. This Affair was debated Yesterday in the Presence of the greater Part of the Clergy, who beyond all Dispute have a principal Share in the Election of the King. And therefore, after mature Deliberation, we have determined to acknowledge Matilda, Daughter to the incomparable King Henry, for Queen and Sovereign of England (5).

Most of those that were present, and not in the Secret, were extremely surprized at this Speech; and much more to see an Election transacted in private by the Clergy, after an unprecedented manner. Nevertheless, every one keeping a profound Silence, for some were gained, and others dared not to oppose it openly for fear of not being conceded, this Silence was interpreted for an Approbation. The Legate told them further, he had summoned the Magistrates of London, and that they had promised to send their Deputies. And indeed on the morrow the Deputies arrived, but instead of consenting to what the Council had done, they declared they were ordered by the City and the Barons that were retired thither, to petition the King's Liberty. The Legate replied, it became not the Londoners to side with the Barons, who had basely deserted their King in Battle, and were endeavouring to embroil the Kingdom in fresh Troubles. This Answer, so far from the Point, not being satisfactory to the Deputies, they demanded one more direct, but in vain. The Legate did not think fit to re-examine a thing, which he pretended was already decided. Before the end of the Synod a Chaplain to Stephen's Queen (6), offered to the Council a Letter, which he delivered to the Legate. But because the Prelate, after perusing it himself, would not communicate it to the Assembly, the Chaplain boldly took it out of his Hand, and read it aloud. This Letter, wherein the Queen earnestly intreated them to let the King at Liberty, proving of no Effect, the Council broke up, after excommunicating all Stephen's Adherents (7).

This Affair being thus ended, the Empress wanted only the Consent of the Londoners, in order to her Coronation. For that purpose, she was obliged to enter into a Negotiation with the City, which lasted some time. Mean while, Matilda advanced as far as Reading, where Robert de Oly Governor of Oxford came and offered her the Keys of his Castle, humbly intreating her to honour that City with her Presence. She readily complied with his Request, and, after receiving the Oath of the Inhabitants of Oxford, and the adjacent Country, removed to St. Albans, where she waited for the Resolution of the Londoners. The City was then overrun with Troubles and Confusion. Some were for continuing steadfast to the King, though a Prisoner: Others for giving way to the times, and recognizing Matilda. These last prevailing at length, the Empress came to London, where she was magnificently received amidst the great Numbers of Barons that attended her. The City of London declaring thus for Matilda, there was no farther Opposition, and now the Preparations for her Coronation were begun. Mean while Matilda was every where acknowledged for Sovereign (8).

During this Interval, Stephen's Queen came to the Empress, to try to prevail with her for some Condescension to her Husband. As she departed of ever seeing him 1147. on the Throne again, she desired nothing more than his Liberty. She promised, in the Name of that unhappy Prince, that, content with living as a private Person, he would renounce the Crown, and, to remove all Suspicion, depart out of the Kingdom, and pass the Residue of his Days in a Monastery. He even offered to swear never to return more, and give Hostages for the Performance of his Promises. But such were the Times, that there was no Reliance on Words or Oaths, there having been so many late Instances of the ready Violation of both. Accordingly Matilda rejected all these Proposals with great Haughtiness, forbidding the unfortunate Queen ever to come into her Presence again.

The Bishop of Winchester became also a Petitioner to her, but had as a little Reason to be satisfied with her Generosity. He imagined, the Service he had lately done her, highly deserved some Return. Accordingly, he desired some Favour for Eustace his Nephew, which was proudly denied him (1). This was sufficient to stir up the Bishop to a Revenge. He was in hopes, the new Queen would be guided by his Councils: But plainly saw, she looked upon him as an Enemy. His turbulent and vindictive Temper not suffering him to rest under these Circumstances, he began from that Instant to plot against Matilda, burning with Desire to make the ungrateful Princess know, it was no less in his Power to pull her down, than to set her up. But perhaps he would have found it difficult to accomplish his Project, if the Empress herself had not furnished him with the Means, by her extreme Pride, which made her regard her Subjects as so many Slaves, Fatal Policy! Which created her many Enemies, at a time when she ought rather to have laboured to gain the English by mild and popular Methods. She drew upon herself chiefly the Hatred of the Londoners, by refusing to grant the only thing they petitioned, and which the King her Father had positively promised, namely, to mitigate the Severity of the Norman Laws, and revive those of King Edward. This ill-advised Princess thought herself so far above all Contradiction, that she neglected to imitate the Conduct of her Predecessors, in amusing her Subjects with Promises at least, till her Authority was more firmly established. Her haughty Carriage soon wrought a great Change in the Minds of the English. They began to be sensible what Danger they were in, of being unhappy under her Government, unless timely Care was taken to prevent the impending Evils. The Bishop of Winchester cherished to the utmost of his Power, these Discontents; and, by secret Emulations at London, stirred up the Citizens to revenge the Contempt Matilda had shown them. His Cabals were carried so far, that he drew them into a Plot to seize the Empress's Person. What care soever was taken to conceal this Design, he had timely Notice of it, and left the City in such haste and in so great a fright, that her Palace and Goods were exposed to the Fury of the Populace (2). Though the Legate mistook his Aim, he thought, he had not a little forwarded the Execution of his Project, in engaging the Londoners against Matilda. Secure of their Assistance, he privately concerted Measures with the Queen his Sister-in-law. After which, he sent word to Eustace to be ready to march with the Kentish-men, promising him, he should soon be at the Head of a more considerable Army. Having taken these measures, and secretly gained to the King's Party, several Lords that were displeased with the Empress, he ordered the Castle of Winchester, and some others that were at his Disposal, to be stored with Provisions and Arms.

As all this could not be transacted without Matilda's Knowledge, she put herself at the Head of her Troops, attended by the Earl of Gloucester (3) and the King of Scotland, who was come into England to assist at the Coronation (4). As soon as she approached Winchester (5), she sent the Bishop word, she had something to communicate to him, and therefore desired him to come to her. The Prelate suspecting, she was informed of his Proceedings, easily perceived this was only an Artifice to ensnare him. Accordingly, instead of waiting upon her, he sent her an ambiguous Answer (6). At the same time he stole out of the Town at an opposite Gate, and drew his Friends together, who only waited his Orders to put themselves in Motion. As they were all ready, they were quickly in Arms. The Kentish-men joining the Londoners, Stephen's Queen, Eustace his Son, and William d' Ipre headed them, and marched to Winchester with the utmost Speed. They had like to have surprized the Empress, who scarce had time to retire into the Castle. As the Inhabitants of Winchester appeared a little too zealous in her Cause, the Bishop out of Revenge, set Fire to the City, though the Capital of his Diocese. Twenty Churches were burnt to Ashes, with a Nunnery, which bore the Name of St. Grimbald (7).

The Bishop's care to provide the Castle well with Ammunition, rendered the Siege very long and difficult. The Besiegers applied themselves closely to it for two Months (8), in hopes of putting an End to the War at once, by taking the Heads of the contrary Party. The same Reason obliged the Besieged to think of their Safety. When they found there was no possibility of holding out any longer, they resolved to hew themselves a passage with their Swords, and run all Risks to secure the Empress's Person. To that purpose, they fellied out in good Order, Matilda and the King of Scotland marching in the Front (9), and the Earl of Gloucester bringing up the Rear (10). They were no sooner out, but the King's Troops closely pursued, endeavouring by frequent Attacks to retard their March, whilst the rest of the Army was advancing to surround them. In all these little Skirmishes, the Earl of Gloucester vigorously opposed his Enemies, and gave signal Marks of his Conduct and Valour. But his Efforts, which indeed were very serviceable to Matilda, as they gave her time to retire, proved fatal to himself. As the Empress's Danger made him neglect his own Safety, he would march the last through a narrow Defile, where his Troops were hard pressed by the Enemies, and himself unfortunately taken Prisoner (11). William de Ipre, to whose Charge he was committed, ordered him to be forthwith conducted to Rocheſter in Kent, where the King had more Friends than in any other Part of the Kingdom.

Mean time, Matilda making all possible Speed, escaped with a few Followers to the Castle of Lutgerſhall, and from thence to the Devoize. Here she repulsed herself a little, thinking she had time enough to reach Glouceſter. But when she came to pursue her Journey, she had Intelligence, the Road was lined with the King's Soldiers. If we may believe a Historian, much given to the Marvellous, she escaped their Vigilance, by being carried to Glouceſter in a Coffin, which no Body would ever have thought to search. Be this as it will, it is certain she found means to avoid this Danger.

Whilst the Empress was devising Expedients to resist her Enemies, the Bishop of Winchester and the rest of the King's Friends, were endeavoring to disengage the Earl of Glouceſter from his Sister's Party. But all their Solicitations, and the Considerations of his present State, could not shake him. He firmly persisted in his Allegiance, he had sworn to her, and would not even dissemble to procure his Liberty. In fine, after six Months Imprisonment, Matilda, who had a tender Affection for him, and very justly, and besides could not well proceed without him, consented he should be exchanged for the King (12). In vain, were Endeavours used, on this occasion, to make Peace between Stephen and the Empress. As the thing they both claimed was of a Nature not to admit of Division, there was no possibility of succeeding. The Exchange therefore was all that could be done, each being left at Liberty to pursue the War.

After the Bishop of Winchester refused to abandon the Empress, he writ to the Pope, to entreat him to authorize his Proceedings in behalf of the King his Brother. As the Pope had no Information of what passed in England, but from his Legate, he did not fail to answer him ac-

1143. accompanied by Eleanor of Guyenne his Queen, Heiress of the House of Poitiers, with whom he had the Earldom of Guyenne, with its Appurtenances, and all Poitou. During the Voyage, which lasted near two Years, Lewis fell out in such a manner with his Queen, upon some Suspicion, well or ill-grounded (1), that he resolved to divorce her as soon as he returned to France.

1149. Since Matilda had in a manner relinquished all Pretensions to England, Stephen thought only of reaping the Fruits of his Labours, and repairing the Mischief, the Kingdom had suffered by a long War. But a new Rival, who was preparing to dispute the Crown with him, soon made him sensible, he was still far enough from the Tranquillity he had flattered himself with. Henry, eldest Son of Matilda by the Earl of Anjou, a young Prince of sixteen Years of Age, and of a lively and enterprising Genius, thought he should not be discouraged by the Difficulties which the Empress his Mother met with in England. He did not question but the Persons that supported the Right of the lawful Heir, would always continue in the same Mind, and a new Leader of more Youth and Vigour inspire them with fresh Courage. In this Belief, he resolved to go to the King of Scotland his great Uncle, and concert Measures with him to accomplish this Design (2). David, having notice of the Prince's coming, met him in Northumberland (3). After conferring with him about their Affairs, he knighted him according to the Custom of those Days, when this Ceremony was deemed necessary for all that took upon them the Profession of Arms (4). Mean time, Stephen, who had received Intelligence of this Interview, fearing they had some Design upon Tork, speedily marched thither and reinforced the Garrison (5). Upon his Approach, the two Princes parted, David returning to Scotland, and Henry to Normandy (6). He was scarce arriv'd at Rouen, when Geoffrey his Father departed this Life (7), leaving him the Earldom of Anjou, till the Empress his Mother's Death should put him in Possession of Normandy, after which he was to resign Anjou to Geoffrey his younger Brother.

1151. Lewis had deferred parting with Eleanor his Wife only till he had brought her back to France. Immediately after his Return, he put his Resolution in practice, and generously refused to her Guyenne, Poitou, Saintonge, with all the Dominions he had brought him in Marriage, providing also for the two Daughters he had by her. As soon as this Divorce became publick, Henry, who with his Mother's Consent had assumed the Title of Duke of Normandy, considered how to secure the Possession of this rich Heiress (8). The matters were carried on with such Secrecy, that the first News Lewis heard, was, that the Duke was gone to the Queen at Bourdeaux, where their Nuptials were solemnized with extraordinary Magnificence. This was a great Mortification to that Monarch, who could not bear to see another deckt with his Spoils, tho' voluntarily relinquish'd by himself. Besides, he was sensible how formidable Henry would be to France, in case he should one Day add to his present Dominions the Kingdom of England, to which he had so just a Claim. On the other hand, this same Marriage made Stephen no less uneasy, who could not behold this Increase of Power in his Rival, without dreading the Consequences. The Jealousy of these two Monarchs being rous'd on this Occasion, it was not long before they made an Alliance, the Design of which was to humble a Prince who was grown very formidable to both. Lewis rais'd him Disturbances in Anjou by means of Geoffrey his Brother, who thought he had a Right, by Virtue of his Father's Will, to take possession of that Earldom. At the same time he invited once more Eustace, Son of Stephen, with Normandy; that Henry, attacked from two Quarters, might afford the King of England time to establish himself in the Throne. On the other Side, Stephen took all the Measures he thought capable of ruining the Duke's Party in England, in order to destroy his Hopes of ever coming to the Crown. The most proper means to this end was, in his Opinion, to cause his Son Eustace to be crown'd before-hand (9). But he met with unexpected Obstacles. The Archbishop of Canterbury flatly refused to comply with his Request, and his Reason was still more offensive than the Denial itself. He told him, the Pope had expressly forbidden him to crown the Son of a Prince, who, contrary to his Oath, had usurp'd the Kingdom. If the Pope really gave any such Orders to the Archbishop, his Sentiments were very different from those of his Predecessor Innocent II. But, very likely, this Prelate, as well as the rest of the Bishops, made use of this pretence to cover their Engagements with the Duke of Normandy. Be this as it will, the King incens'd at the obstinate Denial of the Bishops, caus'd them all to be shut up in one House, resolving to keep them there till they complied with his Will. This was a very extraordinary way to obtain his Desire; accordingly it proved unsuccessful. The House, where the Bishops were detained, not being carefully guarded, the Archbishop found means to escape and fly into Normandy. By his Flight, the King's Project entirely vanish'd.

Stephen was extremely offended with the Clergy's Presumption, who claimed a Power of Making and Unmaking Kings as they pleas'd, or as it suited with their Interests of such as govern'd the rest. As he did not question but the Duke of Normandy had gain'd the Bishops to his Party, and did not dare to attack them directly, he thought to bring them back to their Duty, by seizing some Castles, still in the Hands of the Duke's Friends, in order to deprive the Clergy of that Protection. At the same time, he sent his Son Eustace into Normandy to join the King of France and invade that Dutchy. Stephen's Aim was to prevent Henry from coming into England, to the Assistance of his Friends. But this War lasted not so long as he expected. Henry, by his extraordinary Courage and Diligence, drove out of Anjou his Brother Geoffrey, who was become Master of some Places. Then he march'd back to Normandy, where he found means, by making him some satisfaction, to conclude a Peace with the King of France. After that, it was easy to drive out Eustace, who was not yet firmly settled in that Dutchy. Eustace finding no farther refuge there, returned to England, and joined his Father, who was then besieging Wallingford. This was one of the strongest Places in the Kingdom. Accordingly, the King press'd so much time in the Siege, that the Duke had leisure to come to his relief, after settling his Affairs in Normandy.

The young Duke, perceiving of what Importance it was to relieve his Friends in England, led over (10) so considerable a Number of Forces (11), that he gave new Life to his Party, which, since Matilda's Departure, seem'd to be quite discouraged. Several Barons immediately joined him, and put into his Hands thirty fortified Castles, whose Garrisons he reinforced (12). Then he hasten'd to the relief of Wallingford, which was vigorously press'd, through the Absence of the King, who was gone to London to make fresh Preparations. Henry approaching the Town, and finding it very difficult to assault the Besiegers in their Intrenchments, contented himself with securing the Avenues, through which they were supplied with Provisions. This Precaution would soon have been fatal to them, had not Stephen post'd to their Succour. He approach'd the Duke of Normandy, and without attacking him, brought him into the same Straits, as the Besiegers had some Days labour'd under.

It was scarce possible for the Armies to part without fighting. Accordingly the two Leaders were preparing for Battle with equal Ardour, when, by the prudent going to Advice of the Earl of Arundel, who was on the King's Side, they were prevented from coming to Blows. He represented to the King the Miseries the Kingdom was under going to be expos'd to, by a Battle, which must be very bloody, and almost as fatal to the Vanquishers as Vanquish'd. Adding, it would be more becoming Christians to try, whether Matters could not be adjust'd by a Treaty,

In fine, he plainly told him, it was not reasonable, a whole Nation should be exposed to the greatest Calamities, on account of two Princes who aimed more at gratifying their own Ambition, than at the Happiness of the English. Whether Stephen was moved by these Remonstrances, or apprehensive of being deserted, in case he was bent upon fighting, he consented that an Accommodation should be proposed to the Duke. The young Prince, who had prepared for Battle, was with difficulty brought to hearken to the King's Proposal. But perceiving, the English Lords pressed him very earnestly to it, he thought proper to yield to their Importunity, and consent to the Interview desired by Stephen. In a short Conference between these two Princes on the opposite Banks of the Thames, which is very narrow at that place, they agreed upon a Truce, in order to have time to negotiate a Peace.

1153. Earl Eufrase could not see this Truce without trouble, knowing it would probably end in a Peace which must be prejudicial to him. And indeed, it was not to be supposed, that the Duke of Normandy, being unconquered, would depart from his Pretensions to the Crown. To be excused from signing the Treaty, or perhaps to try to obstruct it, Eufrase suddenly left the Army, and retired into Suffolk (1). Shortly after (2), as he was going to sit down at Table in the Abbey of St. Edmundsbury, he fell into a Frenzy, and died in three Days, being eighteen years of Age. He was buried in the Abbey of Feverham with the Queen his Mother, who died a few Months before (3). Constantia his Widow, Daughter of Lewis the Græffe, was afterwards married to Raymond Earl of Toulouse.

Stephen was extremely concerned for the Loss of his Queen and Son, which seemed to portend some farther Misfortunes. And indeed, the Nobility openly abandoned him and went over to the Duke of Normandy. As there were few Barons but what were guilty of disloyalty, their Dread that the King might think of being revenged, made them judge it necessary for their Safety to put themselves under the Duke's Protection. Their Suspicions were confirmed by what had lately happened to the Earl of Chester. This Earl waiting on the King to offer his Service, was taken into close Custody, from whence he could not free himself but by the delivery of Lincoln Castle into the King's Hands (4). It was not however without Cause that the King was willing to secure himself against the Earl, who was entered into private Engagements with the Duke of Normandy, as appears from a Charter in the Collection of the Public Acts, where Henry promises him the possession of certain Lands. It is probable therefore, Stephen had some Intelligence of this Matter (5). But whether he neglected to publish the Reasons of his suspecting the Earl, or could not convict him, this Action was considered by the rest of the Barons, as a Preface of what they themselves were to expect. And indeed many of them, having entered into the like Engagements with the Duke, believed it safer to declare for him openly (6), than expose themselves to the King's Retribution by staying at Court.

David King of Scotland died this Year (7), leaving only some Grandchildren by Henry his Son, who died before him (8). Malcolm and William, the two eldest, successively mounted the Throne, and David their Brother was Earl of Huntington.

The Truce between Stephen and Henry was renewed several times, by reason of the great difficulties which occurred in the Negotiation of the Peace (9). The main Obstacle sprung from Stephen's desire to settle the Succession on his Son William, to which Henry would never consent. He was willing, Stephen should enjoy the Crown during his Life: But after his death, insisted upon succeeding him. Nay, he thought he had yielded very much in obliging himself not to disturb a Rival, who was not yet fifty years old. In fine, Stephen reflecting on the State of his Affairs, and seeing the great Obstacles in his way, resolved to purchase Peace by relinquishing his design. He was sensible, the Duke's noble Qualities, and a Title to the Crown, a Title powerfully supported, were difficulties that could not easily be surmounted. The Inclination of the Nobles and People gave him further occasion to dread, they would not stay for his Death, to put the Scepter into the Hands of the young Prince. These Considerations induced him at length to consent to the Peace, as proposed by Henry (10). As soon as it was signed, Stephen performed the Ceremony of adopting the young Duke, who paid him the Respect due to a Father. On the other hand, William the King's Son, did Homage to the Duke, who promised on his Part to maintain him in the possession of the Estates of his Family (11), and of those granted him by the King his Father, since his Accession to the Crown (12).

This Treaty was concluded and signed at Winchester (13), in an Assembly, convened for that purpose, of all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal. After this, the two Princes made their public Appearance together in the principal Cities, where they were received with great Demonstrations of Joy. The People could not sufficiently express their Satisfaction at seeing Peace and Tranquillity at length restored to the Kingdom, after so many years of Troubles and Confusion. An Historian affirms, that amidst these Rejoicings, Henry discovered a Conspiracy against him by William the King's Son (14); and adds, the Plot would have been executed, had not William accidentally fallen off his Horse (15) and broke his Thigh. To this he attributes the sudden departure of the Duke of Normandy; who, without shewing any signs of mistrust, took his leave of the King, and returned to his Dominions, till Stephen's Death should put him in possession of the Throne of England. Another Historian does not scruple to assert, Henry was Stephen's Son, with whom the Empress had lived too familiarly before her second Marriage. But we are by no means to trust to this Author's Account, since, by his own Confession, it was cautiously grounded on common Report.

Although, after his Agreement with Henry, Stephen could have no hopes of leaving the Crown to his Son, he was so touched with the Miseries, the Kingdom endured, that he resolved to use all his Endeavours to repair them. He even seemed to take proper Measures to that end. But Death, which surprised him unawares, prevented him from executing so generous a Design. He died (16) in the fiftieth Year of his Age, on the 25th of October (17) 1154, eleven Months after the Treaty with Henry. He was buried by his Queen and Son Eufrase, in the Abbey of Feverham, which he himself had founded (18).

If this Prince's Character be considered in general only, he may be said to be worthy to live in better Times, and his good Qualities to outweigh his Defects. However, it would be very difficult to justify all his Proceedings in acquiring the Crown, and particularly the Breach of his Oath. Accordingly, though the consent of the Barons may seem to be of some weight, yet as the Crown was procured by unjust Practices, many are of opinion, he ought, for all that, to be deemed an Usurper. His breaking his Word on certain occasions, is moreover a stain to his Memory. Perhaps the Circumstances of the Times and Affairs hurried him beyond his natural Inclination. But however, the Commendations due to his Valour, Clemency, and Generosity, cannot be denied him. The first of these Virtues appeared chiefly at the Battle of Lincoln, where he was taken Prisoner. The other two must be owned, when it is considered that throughout his Reign there is not a single Instance of Severity to be found, though several of the Barons, whom the Chance of War

1154. had put in his Power, had given him but too much Reason to use them with Rigour. It is true, there are Historians, that made it their Business to blacken his Reputation. But, it must be observed, most of them wrote in the Reign of Henry II. or his Son's. As for William of Malmesbury, who was Cotemporary with Stephen, he is known to be the Earl of Gloucester's Creature, to whom he dedicated the last Part of his History. This alone should make us read with Caution, what he relates to Stephen's Disadvantage. After all, it is not easy to determine whether the Crown justly belonged to Matilda, or Stephen's Election entitled him to take possession. What may be said with more Certainty, is, that after the Conquest, the Saxon Laws were no longer observed, and it does not appear that the Normans had yet any settled Rules concerning the Succession to the Crown.

The Troubles during this Reign furnished the Clergy with a favourable opportunity to exalt the Mitre above the Crown. The Court of Rome improved also these Junctions, to introduce into England new Laws, which the English doublets would have opposed at any other Time. The Canon-Law compiled by Gratian in 1151, by the Authority of Eugenius III. was brought into England, on occasion of the Contests between the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester about the Legatship. These Differences gave the Italian Canonists opportunity to settle in England, and introduced by degrees the Study of the Canon-Law into the University of Oxford, where Vacarius was the first Professor (1).

Stephen left one legitimate Son, called William, who was Earl of Boulogne in Right of the Queen his Mother. He had also one Daughter named Maria, who after she had put on the Veil, was, notwithstanding, married to Philip of Alsace; but upon the Death of her Husband returned to the Nunnery (2).

A natural Son of Stephen's, called also William, has given occasion to some, deceived by the likeness of Names, to affirm this Prince left behind him only a Bastard Son (3).

De regum genere Pater hic Gervasius erat, Monstrat defunctus, mores ipse canit generis. Sandf. General. p. 44.

I. The Places at which King Stephen held his Court or Parliaments, are as follow: In 1135, at Clarendon, at London or Westminster. (Huntingd. p. 588. Annal. Waverl. p. 152.) In 1136, at Ely, at Winchester. (R. de Dicet. p. 595. Brompt. p. 1044. Huntingd. Ann. Waverl. 1135.) In 1137, at Dunstable. (Gervais. p. 154. Huntingd. Ann. Waverl. p. 152.) In 1140, in Lent, at London. (Ann. Waverl. p. 153.) In 1143 was held a Council at London, in Lent; (Ann. Waverl. p. 153. Huntingd. p. 593. Hoved. p. 488.) and the same Year again at St. Albans. (Ibid.) In 1146, at Northampton; (Ann. Waverl. p. 155. Hunt. p. 594.) and at Clarendon, at London. (Gervais. p. 156. Brompt. p. 1044.) In 1152, at London. (Huntingd. p. 595. Gervais. p. 157. Ann. Waverl. p. 157.) In 1153, at Winchester. (Ibid.) In 1154, at Oxford. This Reign having been full of perpetual Troubles and Commotions, no regular Parliaments can be supposed to have been h'd in every Year of it. This the Annals of Waverl. expressly observe under the Year 1140: Jam quippe Curia solennis, et senatus regii senatus profus evanescit, p. 153. The few here set down are the only ones extant upon Records.

II. The most remarkable Occurrences in this Reign were these: In 1136, there was a great Fire in London, which consumed part of that City, from Aldgate to St. Paul's Church; and also the Bridge, which was then of Timber. In 1137, June 3, the Cathedral of Rochester was burnt down: As was also, the next Day, the whole City of York, with the Cathedral, and thirty-nine Churches: And so was also the City of Bath, on the 27th. Strutt's Chron. p. 144. In 1150, and 1151, there was a great Famine in England. Ann. Waverl. p. 157.

III. Having shewn before, how the Money was paid in and used out of the Exchequer, it may not be amiss now to set down the particular Branches of the Royal Revenue; namely, I. The Demesnes of the Crown. II. Ekeheats. III. Feodal and other Profits arising out of the Demesnes and Ekeheats. IV. The yearly Farms of Counties and Towns. V. Fines and Amerciaments. VI. Aids, Scutages, Tallages and Customs. VII. Casual Profits of various Kinds. These Particulars will give great Light to several Parts of the English History. First, Of the ancient Demesne of the Crown: It appears, at the time of the Conquest and afterwards, the Demesne Lands were considerable for Extent and Income. Domesday Book shews what they were in the Reign of Edward the Confessor, and serves to distinguish the King's Demesnes from his Ekeheats and other Lands, and from the Lands of other Men. II. The second Branch of the Revenue arose by Ekeheats, under which Term are comprehended not only those Lands most properly so called, but those also which at sundry times after the Conquest became vested in the Crown, either by Devolution, Escheiture, Seizure, or perhaps by some other Title. By the Revenue-Rolls of the Reigns of Stephen and Henry II. (which next to Domesday are the most ancient Rolls of Records now extant) and likewise by those of the next succeeding Kings, we find the Crown then in possession of several great Houses, Barons and Lords, of that sort, which are usually said Honor, Barony, or Terra of such a one, with the Addition sometimes of quæ est in manu Regis, without expressing what Title they became vested in the Crown. These great Ekeheats were antiently committed, usually by the King, to certain Persons in Ferm or Custody, who answered at the Exchequer yearly for the Issues or Ferm thereof. Besides these greater Fees, the Lands of lower Persons, and sometimes of hereditary Offices and Serjeants, with the Lines appertaining thereto, became forfeited to the Crown. As the King had the full Dominion in all these Ekeheats, after they had been long vested in the Crown, they were hardly to be distinguished from the King's antient Demesne. About the latter end of Henry II.'s Reign, they began to form an Ekeheats, which in subsequent times was managed by Officers called at first Custodes Ekehatie, and afterwards Ekehatarii. However, some of the smaller Ekeheats were usually held by the Sheriff. When Ekeheats first came to the Crown, the Justices itinerant took care within their several Circuits, to have them seized to the Crown, and put in charge to the Sheriff or other Officers to the King's Profit. III. Some Revenue likewise accrued to the Crown from vacant Bishopricks and Abbies of royal Foundation and Patronage. For in antient times, when such Bishop or Abbot happened to die, the King used to seize the Temporaries into his Hands, and receive the Profits till the Vacancy was filled. Ordericus Vitalis assigns this Practice first to William I. He says, before the Norman Invasion, the Bishop of the Dioceses took care of the Revenues of a vacant Abbey, as the Archbishop did those of a Bishoprick till full. In 1164, (to Henry II.) by the Constitutions of Clarendon, an Archbishoprick, Bishoprick, Abbey, or Priory of royal Foundation becoming void, the same was to be in the King's Hands, and he might receive the Issues thereof as if he had held them in Demesne. And so, it seems, the Usage was, both before and after the Council of Clarendon. In the 3th of Stephen, the Mannors of the Bishoprick of Durham then vacant are said, in the Roll, to be in Demesne Regis, and therefore discharged of Dues-geld. In the Statute de Provisiis (25 Edward III.) it is declared, That the Kings, Earls, Barons, or Lords and Advocates, had and ought to have the Custody of vacant Prelacies, &c. This Power was often abused by the King, as well as private Lords and Patrons, by keeping the Benefice void several Years together. However this be, the Crown was wont to take into its Hands the Temporaries of vacant Bishopricks and Abbies, which were at first committed to a Custos, who accounted to the Crown for the same. And afterwards, when the Office of Ekehaty was settled, the Ekehatarii used, upon a Vacancy, to seize them for the King, and answer for the same as part of their Ekehaty. The succeeding Bishop could not meddle with the Temporaries thus seized, without a Writ to give him Possession, called a Writ of Redhibition of Temporaries, which continues in use to this Day. The Kings, in five or six Successions after the Conquest, made a considerable Revenue this way, as appears by the Revenue-Rolls. The rest of the Branches will be continued in the following Coun-Notes.

In King Stephen's Time there seems to have been a great deal of Money coined. For thus writes William of Newbury: "Exant in Angliâ quædam modo rex Reges, vel potius Tyranni, quod Dominus Castellorum, habentes singuli percussuram propriam numismatis et prædictum subditis Regis more de cunctis." And yet we have very few Remains of their Treasures. His Penny, in Spain, is no larger than his Predecessor's. It is the first of the Conquest that's half-faced, with this Inscription, STEPHEN. EI. and, on the Reverse, SPTIDETS: DN. V. which Nicolson takes to be the Monarch's Name of some of his above-mentioned royal Lords. Different from this is another which gives both his Eyes, though even here the Face is somewhat followy. The Crown is much the same with Henry I. only the Flowers are raised higher. Tassier met with one, which instead of the King's Head, bore two Angels with STEPHEN RE. with a Rosette like that of William the Conqueror. Mr. Thoresby has one with both the Figures of Stephen and Henry, and likewise of EUSTATHIUS (Eustachius Son of Stephen) with a Harle on one Side, and a large Cross or Flower-de-lis on the other. Another of Eustachius, with a Sword in his Hand a Reverse, EBORACLED, T.S. a Pellet in each quarter of a Cross, surrounded with a Rose. (See the Figures above.)

DURING THE

Reigns of WILLIAM I. WILLIAM II. HENRY I. and STEPHEN.

The different Character of the Saxon and Norman Kings, with regard to the Church.

THE Revolution in England by the Norman Conquest introduced a great Change both in Church and State. More especially, the Pope and Clergy were considerable Losers by it. Instead of the devout and submissive Saxon Princes, who were ready to embrace all Opportunities, of augmenting the Privileges and Revenues of the Church, there arose in England a Race of Norman Kings of a quite different Character. Solely employed in grasping at arbitrary Power, they could not bear any Distinction between the Clergy and Laity as to point of Obedience. They challenged an equal Authority over both. What Schemes soever the Church of Rome had formed to render the Clergy independent of the Crown, the Reigns of the two Williams were not thought to afford any favorable Opportunities to hasten their Execution. The Normans, out of Interest, were entirely attached to their Sovereigns, and the English, in their low Condition, were no proper Instruments to promote the Cause of the Court of Rome. Matters standing thus in England, the most vigorous Efforts of the Popes to enlarge their Power, would have been ineffectual. This probably was the reason that obliged Gregory VII. with all his Haughtiness, to stoop to the resolute and steady Temper of William the Conqueror. This Monarch not content with boldly refusing the Homage required by Gregory, openly contemned the Papal Decrees. He governed the Clergy of his Kingdom like the rest of his Subjects, with an absolute Sway. If he suffered the Pope's Legates to preside at a Council, it was only to be freed with more ease from some Bishops that gave him Disturbance. But when he found this same Synod unwilling to come into all his Measures, he exerted his absolute Power. By his sole Authority, he banished or imprisoned such Bishops as he did not like, without staying for a Canonical Sentence. On the other hand, whilst the Pope was thundering out Anathema's against the Emperor, and compelling him to dishonourable Homage, William peaceably enjoyed, in his Dominions, the right of Investiture, which was the subject of the Quarrel between the Emperor and the Court of Rome. He made the Church-Lands liable to the same Services with the Lay-Fees. He seized the Gold and Silver deposited in the Monasteries, and spared not even the Consecrated Vessels. Nothing was transacted in the Church but by his Direction, and the Synodal Constitutions were no longer in Force than during his Pleasure. He went still further, and set himself, in some measure, above the Popes, by forbidding his Subjects to receive their Orders, or acknowledge their Authority, without his Permission.

William Rufus had no greater Regard to the Church's Immunities. All the Pope's Menaces were ineffectual to prevent him from keeping the vacant Bishopricks and Abbacies in his Hands, and to dispose of them afterwards to the best Bidder. I do not pretend to excuse the Conduct of the two Monarchs in all these Respects. My Design is to shew by these Instances, that the Court of Rome owes the Progress and Growth of its Power purely to its political Prudence. The Popes wisely gave way to Princes of Resolution and Stediness, whilst at the same time they vigorously proceeded against such, whose Circumstances would not permit them to oppose their Designs. We have a plain Instance of this Policy in the different Behaviour of the Court of Rome with regard to the four first Norman Kings. After yielding to the two Williams, she struggled a long time with Henry I. But when she saw, he was not to be conquered, she contented herself with what she would have scorned, in the beginning of the Contest. She compounded the matter with that Monarch, and consented the Bishops and Abbots should do him Homage; at the very time she obstinately refused the same Terms to the Emperor, whose Affairs were not in so prosperous a State. As for Stephen, she knew how to improve the Troubles in his Reign, by the help of the Bishop of Winchester. As she was ready to make use of all the Advantages that offered, she took occasion from these Troubles to appoint a Legate, different from the Archbishop of Canterbury, which she durst not have done at any other time. This Inroad seemed at first of little Consequence, but had afterwards too great an Influence upon the Affairs of England. By the Means of these Legates it was that at length she set her Foot on the Necks both of the Kings and the Clergy. I say of the Clergy, since 'tis manifest, she aimed no less at humbling the Bishops and Archbishops than the Sovereigns.

We have a remarkable Proof of this Design in the haughty Treatment of Lanfranc by the Court of Rome, when nominated to the See of Canterbury, upon Stigand's Deprivation. Lanfranc was a Prelate of distinguished Worth, equally esteemed by the King, the English, and the Normans, and consequently of very great Credit in England. And yet, he could never prevail to be excused going to Rome in Person, to receive the Pall at the Pope's Hands. Hildebrand, then Archdeacon of Rome, and afterwards promoted to the Papal Chair, under the Name of Gregory VII. wrote him a Letter on that subject, endeavouring to soften the Refusal. He told him, if there had been any Instance of the like Favour being granted to his Predecessors, it would not have been refused. But, either he was not well versed in the Ecclesiastical History of England, or else, supposed Lanfranc not to know of the Pall's being sent to Austin, Justus, Honorius, all three Archbishops of Canterbury. It was not therefore from a Scruple to introduce a new Custom, that Lanfranc was denied this Favour, but for fear, the Archbishops should by Degrees forget their Dependence on the Pope. We shall frequently see in the Course of this History, how much the Roman Pontiffs abused their exorbitant Power over the Clergy of England. It is not yet time to insist on this Point. But, in order to give a general Knowledge of the most material Ecclesiastical Affairs in England during the Interval we have passed through, it is necessary to shew the Rise of the Dispute between the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. This long Contest is one of the chief Articles of the Ecclesiastical History of England.

Whilst Lanfranc was preparing for his Journey to Rome, Thomas, Canon of Bayeux, one of William the Conqueror's Chaplains, was nominated to the See of York. Shortly after, the new Prelate came to Canterbury to be consecrated according to Custom. But Lanfranc requiring him to make a Profession of Canonical Obedience to him in Writing, he refused to comply, and went away without Consecration. This Contest making a great Noise, the King wanted to be informed of the Matter, suspecting Lanfranc had carried his Prerogatives too high. But after several English Lords had shewn that Lanfranc had Custom on his Side (1), William, without taking upon him to decide the Dispute, found an Expedient to satisfy the two Archbishops. This was, that Thomas should return to Canterbury, and deliver a written Profession of Obedience to Lanfranc, as Senior; and that the settling the Rights of the two Sees should be referred to the Pope (1). This Expedient being approved of, the two Prelates set out together for Rome to receive the Pall, and cause both this Controversy and another concerning the Jurisdiction over the Sees of Lincoln, Lichfield and Worcester, to be decided. Alexander II., who was then Pope, received Lanfranc with particular marks of Respect. As soon as he saw him, he rose up from his Chair to embrace him, declaring however, he did not treat him thus on the account of his Dignity, but for his Merit. Thomas met with a very different Reception. The Pope voided his Election, because he was incapable, as being the Son of a Priest, to hold any Church Preferment. However, a few Days after, he was restored by the Mediation of Lanfranc. As for the Differences between the two Archbishops, as he was not perfect Master of the Case, he referred the Decision to the English Bishops and Abbots.

(1) Lanfranc came himself to the King's Court, (or Great Council,) and there gave his Reasons, which being attended by the English that were present, for and the King. Monasticon Anglo-Britannicum, l. 1. p. 200.

This Affair not being decided at Rome, the two Archbishops returned to England. As they were equally desirous to see the Issue of their Difference, at their Arrival they waited upon the King at Windsor, where, on account of the Paschal Solemnity, most of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal were assembled (2). The Cause was argued before the King with great Warmth on both Sides. Lanfranc founded his Claim upon the following Reasons.

1. That the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was to be considered as if the See was at London, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, facing Gregory I. designed to fix it there. 2. That the Church of Canterbury was the most ancient in the Kingdom, and the Mother of all the rest. 3. He alleged the Constitutions of several Popes, granting the Privilege in question to his See. 4. He maintained that the Archbishops of Canterbury had exercised Jurisdiction within the Province of York. To this Purpose he produced the Example of Theodore, who had been deprived several Bishops in the Kingdom of Northumberland. 5. Lastly, he added, the Archbishops of York had made to his Predecessors, a Profession of the Canonical Obedience, which Thomas refused. In proof of this, he instanced in Eadulfus, who made no scruple to profess Obedience to Adelard.

The Archbishop of York replied, It was true, Gregory I. did design to fix the Archbishoprick at London, but was very far from intending to give that See any Pre-eminence over York. To prove his Assertion, he cited the Authority of Bede, who says, in express Terms, Gregory decreed, that after the Death of Austin, the two Archbishopricks should be independent of each other. Thomas inferred from thence, that, supposing the Archbishoprick at London, it would be no Advantage to Lanfranc. 2. He said, it was not true, that the Church of Canterbury was the Mother of that of York, since every one knew, the Church of York was founded by the Scottish Monks, who had no Relation to the Church of Canterbury. 3. As for the Jurisdiction exercised by Theodore in Northumberland, he maintained, that Prelate took Advantage of the Troubles, then in the Church of that Kingdom, to extend his Authority; and a Right could not be built on a manifest Usurpation. Lanfranc would have found it difficult to answer the Argument brought by Thomas, from Gregory's Regulation concerning the Independency of the two Archbishops, if the Constitutions of several Popes had not been for him. Moreover, he supported his Right by Custom, for which the English gave Testimony. And by this it was that he carried the Cause. It was judged that the Popes, Successors to Gregory, had power to annul his Constitutions, and therefore the King and Lords thought it just that the Archbishop of York should make Profession of Canonical Obedience to the See of Canterbury. The other Controversy about the three Bishopricks, was decided likewise in favour of Lanfranc, and the Archbishop of York acquiesced in both these Sentences. But, to avoid any future Disputes, there was drawn up, in the Name of the two Archbishops, a form of Canonical Obedience, adjusting their Differences. Thomas was made to own, he was in the wrong, to dispute Lanfranc's Superiority and Jurisdiction over the whole Church of England. Declaring that as Archbishop of York, he owed Canonical Obedience, not only to the Person of Lanfranc, as his Senior, but to all the Archbishops of Canterbury, as such. He dropped also his Pretensions to the three Bishopricks in question.

Lanfranc, on his Part, yielded to the Archbishops of York, the Jurisdiction over all the Sees North of the Humber, to the farthest Parts of Scotland. It was likewise agreed, that if the Archbishop of Canterbury should call a National Synod, the Archbishop of York and his Suffragans, should be obliged to make their Appearance, in what part soever of the Kingdom the Synod should be held. The two Archbishops further covenanted, that upon the Decese of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York should repair to that City, and with the Assistance of the Suffragans of the Southern Province, should consecrate the Primate-Elect. And that the Person nominated to the See of York should be obliged to come and be consecrated within the Province of Canterbury. In fine, Lanfranc omitted nothing that could establish the Superiority of his See over that of York. As for the Oath, Lanfranc required of Thomas, it is said in the Writing, that the King desiring it should be dispensed with, Lanfranc readily consented, reserving however a Right, to require this Oath of all future Archbishops of York (3).

Thus the Controversy between the two Metropolitan Sees was, for at least seem'd to be, determin'd; for it was afterwards frequently renew'd. Indeed, this was not a Regulation made by a Synod, but an Agreement between the two Archbishops, authoriz'd by the King. Accordingly the Archbishops of York us'd this Pretence to revive the Dispute. They alledg'd, as the Sentence was not Synodical, their Right remained intire. In the time of Eadmer, Anselm, another Thomas, nominated to the See of York, was refused to take the Oath, but at length was constrained to it.

Notwithstanding these two Precedents, Thurstan being elected Archbishop of York in the Reign of Henry I. refused to make the customary Submissions to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But the King gave him to understand, he must either comply, or renounce his Archbishoprick. Thurstan, however grievous it might be to him, chose the latter. Nevertheless, he caused the Chapter of York to send Deputies to Paschal II. to represent the Wrong done to their See. These Deputies remonstrated, the King had exceeded his Power, in compelling Thurstan to renounce his Election, for refusing to subject the See of York to an Obedience, which was never canonically enjoined. This Argument prevailing with the Pope, he writ to the King, exhorting him to restore Thurstan; adding, that in case the Archbishops had any Dispute about Privileges, he himself would equitably decide it. Paschal being dead, and Gelasius II. succeeding him, the Archbishop of Canterbury sent his Agents to Rome to found the new Pope's Sentiments concerning this Contest. These Agents reported, that they found by what the Pope said, he design'd to send a Legate into England to decide the Controversy. But he was prevented by Death, which surpriz'd him as he was travelling to France.

Calistus II., Successor to Gelasius, repairing to Rheims to hold a Council, Thurstan obtained the King's Leave to go thither; but upon condition, he would not receive Consecration from the Pope or any other Bishop. However, the King not confiding altogether on this Prelate's Word, sent a Letter to the Pope, protesting, if Thurstan was consecrated by any but the Archbishop of Canterbury, he should never more set foot in England. Notwithstanding this Protestation, Calistus himself consecrated Thurstan in the Presence of the Council. The Archdeacon of Canterbury would have oppos'd it, but was told by the Pope, he design'd no manner of Injury to the See of Canterbury. Henry not having been able to prevent Thurstan from being consecrated, banished him the Kingdom with his whole Family. But he did not long remain in Exile. The Pope, willing to stand by what he had done, threatned the King with Excommunication, and his Kingdom with an Interdict (4). The Pope's Resoluteness caus'd Henry to yield at length, that Thurstan should be installed, without making the customary Submission to the See of Canterbury. It is true, to save the King's Honour, this Prelate promised, not to perform any of his Archbishopric Functions out of the Diocese of York. Thus the See of York recovered, in some Measure, part of the Ground it had lost. This Contest was afterwards revived several Times: But there is no Necessity of pursuing this Subject any farther. What has been said is sufficient to shew the State of the Cause between the

(3) Henry II. was not at all content with the Supremacy of Canterbury, by a Decree, which is in Epistol. Carol. V. l. II. p. 6. [if not forced]. This Decree was "that the King and Queen, Henry the Pope's Legate, the two Archbishops, thirteen Bishops, and eleven great Abbots. The King and Queen put the Cause before them, according to the Canon Custom.

Primates of the Church of England, were looked upon as the natural Legates of the Popes, who generally entrusted them with the Execution of their Orders. But as they had for the most part two opposite things to manage, namely, the Interest of the Church of England, and that of the Pope, and as these very often clashed, it frequently happened that they gave the Preference to the former. This was the Reason that the Popes so earnestly sought occasions of sending other Legates, who should have no other views but their Master's Interest. Accordingly, when, in the Reign of Offa King of Mercia, Lichfield was going to be erected into an Archbishoprick, the Pope embraced that opportunity. As it was not proper to commit the Archbishop of Canterbury, whom it was intended to deprive of part of his Jurisdiction, the Court of Rome easily obtained the King of Mercia's Consent to receive Italian Legates, to facilitate the Execution of their Design. This first Instance however was not followed by any other, till the time of Edward the Confessor, that is, for above two hundred and fifty Years. In the Reign of that Prince, Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, lying under the Church's Censures, the Pope took occasion to send into England two Legates, to execute a Commission, which Stigand could not be charged with. William the Conqueror, wanting to be rid of this Stigand, and some other troublesome Bishops, sent himself for Legates, to preside at a Council, where he designed to have these Prelates deposed. It is thus that Princes, to gratify their Passions, have all along been subservient to the Growth of the Papal Power, without troubling themselves about the Consequences. We find moreover that in the same Reign, Gregory VII. sent a Legate into England called Hubert. But as this was done on account of some political Affairs, the English were not alarmed at it, never imagining, such a Legateship could any ways tend to their Prejudice. But the Court of Rome had other Aims. In process of time, these few Precedents were deemed a sufficient Ground for sending Legates, whenever the Pope should think fit. This Right however lay dormant during the Reigns of the two Williams, the Temper and Character of these Princes affording the Popes no Prospect of Success in their Undertakings.

Henry I. was hardly warm in his Throne, when the Pope sent Guido Archbishop of Vienne to reside at London, with a Legantine Power over all Great-Britain. The Clergy of England looked upon this Commission as an attempt upon their Privileges; neither could the King and Council be prevailed with by former Precedents to allow the Legate to exercise any part of his Office in the Kingdom. Alfred the Jesuit, who has writ the Ecclesiastical History of England, plainly perceiving the great Difficulty of reconciling this Refusal with the Papal Authority, is forced to have recourse to a precarious Supposition, in order to clear this Point. He will have it that the Legate's Commission was rejected, because his Powers were not penn'd with a Non obstante to the Privileges of the Archbishop of Canterbury. But as he cites no Authorities in support of his Assertion, we are not obliged to believe him on his bare Word. Cardinal Baronius gets clear of this Difficulty more dextrously, by taking no notice at all of this Legateship.

Henry I. had some farther Contests with the Court of Rome upon the same Occasion. Paschal II. sending into France a Legate, called Cons, this Prelate convened several Councils, at which he pretended, the Bishops of Normandy were obliged to be present; and upon their refusing to obey his Summons, excommunicated them. Henry, offended at the Legate's Rashness, sent the Bishop of Exeter to complain to the Pope. In all likelihood he received some Satisfaction, since the Historian, who mentions this Particular, says not a word of the Success of the Embassy.

In the Year 1116, King Henry being in Normandy, Abbot Anselm, Nephew to the Archbishop of the same Name, came to him and produced a Commission from the Pope for Legate in England. But the King would not suffer him to go over in that Character. The English Bishops, whom the King consulted on this occasion, unanimously declared, this Legateship was contrary to the Privileges of the Church of England. They desired the Archbishop of Canterbury, as the Person most concerned, to wait upon the King with their Answer, and, in case the King should think proper, to go on to Rome, to remonstrate against these Encroachments. The Archbishop actually set out for Rome; but hearing the Pope, had pressed by the Arms of the Emperor, was retired to Be-neventum, pursued not his Journey. He contented himself therefore with representing to him in a Letter, what he designed to tell him by word of Mouth. The Circumstances of Pope Paschal's Affairs at that time, would not permit him to insist on his pretended Right, as he would doubtless have done at any other time. He was unwilling to disoblige the English; but on the other hand, could not resolve to give up the Privilege of sending Legates, when he should think proper. He chose therefore to return an ambiguous Answer, which, without binding him to any thing, might afford them a seeming Satisfaction. This Answer, which was not directly to the Point, was not satisfactory to the Bishops. But the King, taking advantage of the Pope's Circumstances, understood it in a Sense the most favorable to the Church of England, and prevented the Legate from executing his Commission. Nevertheless, as he saw the Pope's Answer was too general, to be able from thence to infer that he desisted from his Pretensions, he demanded one more precise. At an Interview some time after with Calixtus II. at Gisors, he very earnestly pressed the Pope on this head; but to no purpose. All the Satisfaction he could obtain, was, that the Pope gave his word to send no more Legates into England, except in a Case of Necessity.

Some Years after, Honorius II. sent Cardinal John de Crema into England with the Character of Legate. However it was with great Difficulty that he was received as such, after waiting a long time in Normandy. This Legate summoned a Council at London, as hath been said, on account of the Priests Marriages. In his Summons to the Bishops, he says in express Words, this Council was convened by the order and Concurrence of the Archbishop of Canterbury. This appears by a Citation still extant, addressed to the Bishop of Landaff. Though the Legate might plainly see he was not very welcome to the English, he affected, in the exercise of his Function, a haughty Demeanour, which very much increased their Dislike. He would officiate in the Cathedral of Canterbury, in the Place of the Archbishop, though he was only a Presbyter. In the Council of London, he ordered his Seat to be raised, like a sort of Throne, above the two Archbishops and all the Nobility that were present at the Synod. This proud Carriage gave great Offence to the English, who were not wont to see the Pope's Legates exalted to high. They openly shewed their Regret for their Condescension to this Legate, well knowing, of what dangerous Consequence Precedents were in things where the Court of Rome was concerned. However, this did not prevent in the Reign of Stephen, Albrie, Bishop of Offia, from being received in England in Quality of Legate. Stephen was not firmly enough fixed in his Throne to venture to disoblige the Court of Rome. During this Reign, the Pope conferred the Dignity of Legate on the Bishop of Winchester, the King's Brother, in Prejudice of Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury. This Distinction occasioned between the two Prelates a Contest, of which the Court of Rome made great Advantage. For, on this Occasion it was, that the two Parties frequently appealed to Rome, a thing very rarely practised in England before. At length, after long Disputes, the Legateship was taken from the Bishop of Winchester by Pope Gelgeline II. and given to the Archbishop of Canterbury, not as his Right, but as the free Gift of the Holy See. Thus the Popes artfully improved all occasions to extend their Authority. The Reader will see in the Course of the History, the reason of my insinuating thus on the Affair of the Legates. For by their Means chiefly it was, that, in some of the following Reigns, the Popes rendered England liable to numberless Oppressions.

The Court of Rome would doubtless have run greater Schisms Lengths in her Usurpations, if the frequent Schisms in those Days had not caused her to lose a great deal of Ground. To gain or preserve the Obedience of the Christian Princes, the Popes were often forced to pass by many things, which they would not have done in other Junctions. However, when they could not help making Concessions to their Disadvantage, they seldom failed, of adding some ambiguous Clause, which left room to explain them in their own Favour at a more proper Season. I have related an Instance in the Proceeding of Calixtus II. when he promised to send no more Legates into England, except in case of Necessity: For the Popes themselves were afterwards Judges when it was necessary. If all the Kings had been like the two Williams, they would have put their own Construction upon these Clauses. But as some were weak or superstitious, and others, that had more Resolution, often embroiled in Troubles, which obliged them to keep fair with Rome, the Popes never failed of improving these Junctions. We are now going to see in what manner the four first Norman Kings behaved with regard to the Pope, during the Schisms which happened in their Reigns.

England acknowledged Gregory VII. who came to the Papacy in the Reign of William the Conqueror. And yet, the Election of the Anti-pope Clement III. was no sooner over, but William resolved to stand Neuter, till the Affair was decided. On occasion of this Schism it was, that he forbid his Subjects to own any Pope without his Permission.

This

This Neutrality of England evidently appears in Langfranc's Answer to Cardinal Hugo Candidus, who solicited him to side with Clement III. The Letter runs thus in Baronius.

Baron.
Ann. 1093.

"I received your Letter, but can by no means approve of part of the Contents. Your Invektives against Gregory, whom you affect to call Hildebrand, and the strange Names you give his Legates, is what I don't understand. On the other hand, your excessive Commendations of Clement; and the extraordinary Character you give him, are doubtless carried too far. It is written, It's not to pronounce a Man happy before his Death, neither are we to detract from our Neighbour. The Merit of Men is a thing that lies out of Sight: And therefore we cannot pronounce with Truth upon their future Condition. However I am persuaded, the Emperor would not have embarked in so great an Undertaking without having good reasons, nor could he have thus prospered, without the signal Blessing of the Almighty. As for the Voyage you design to take into England, I would not advise you to it, unless the King's Leave can be first obtained. For as yet we have not entirely disclaimed Gregory, nor declared for his Competitor. But when the Cause of both Sides shall be maturely examined, we shall then be better able to come to a Resolution."

Baron.
P. 25.

Gregory VII. was succeeded by Victor III. who died in 1087, about a Year before William the Conqueror. Urban II. was chosen in his room, and presently after William Rufus ascended the Throne of England, whilst the Schism still continued between Urban and Clement. The English may be said to be for some Years without a Pope, since they recognized neither of the two Competitors. When Anselm would, by his own Authority, have owned Urban II. William opposed it, 'till by an Artifice, mentioned hereafter, Urban gained him to his Obedience. This Step being made, England remained under the Jurisdiction of this Pope, and his Successors Paschal II. Gelasius II. and Honorius II. After the Death of this last, a schism was formed, by the double Election of Innocent II. and Anacletus. These two Popes, having each their Adherents, divided all Europe. Innocent stood in need of all the Credit and Eloquence of St. Bernard to be acknowledged in France, where was a strong Party against him. It was a long while before that Kingdom, as well as England, declared for either of the Rivals, so difficult was it to judge which had the best Title. Each alleged Reasons, which served rather to destroy his Adversary's Right, than support his own. It may be easily guessed, that during the Uncertainty with regard to these Popes, recourse was had to neither. A galling Circumstance to those that affect the necessity of a Pope in the Church.

Crusades.

If the Popes lost ground by these Schisms, the Loss was amply repaired by the Crusades, which furnished them with Opportunities of extending their Authority. 'Tis foreign to my purpose to examine what Right the Christian Princes of Europe had to Palestine, conquered by the Saracens upon the Emperors of Constantinople. It suffices to say, that the Project of wresting from the Infidels the Country bedewed with the Blood of Christ, seemed so noble and meritorious, that all the Princes of Christendom gloried in promoting it with their Wealth and Forces, and some even with their Persons. The People, in Imitation of their Sovereigns, blindly engaged in this Undertaking upon Peter the Hermit's (1) setting forth the Miseries to which the Christians in Palestine were exposed under the Empire of the Saracens. Urban II. was the first that formed the Project of uniting all the Christians in Europe to attempt the Deliverance of their Brethren in the East from Servitude, and to that purpose, preached in 1095, the first Crusade at the Council of Clermont. His Exhortations were so surprisingly effectual, that in a short time was seen marching towards the Holy Land a prodigious Army, the Success of which is known to all the World. The Saracens were driven out of Palestine, and a Christian Kingdom founded, which lasted but fourscore and ten Years. The Infidels becoming Masters of the Country again, the Popes never ceased exhorting the Christians, to recover what the Church had lost in those Parts. This occasioned several fresh Crusades, which procured the Popes many Advantages. In the first place, as they declared themselves Head of these Expeditions, they took into their Protection all that were willing to embark in the same. By this means they had opportunity to interpose in all Affairs, there being few of any moment, but what some one of the Croisiers were concerned in. In the second place, as these Expeditions could not be undertaken without an immense Charge, the Popes took occasion to impose on the Clergy, under the Name of Taxes, Taxes, of which they had the whole Disposal. In the next place, after once they were possessed of the Privilege of publishing a Crusade whenever they thought fit, they drew from thence a Consequence of very great use to them. They pretended, the Extirpation of Heresies, tended as much to the Glory of God as that of Infidels. Now as they assumed to themselves the Power of declaring what was Heresy, the moment any Prince offered to oppose their Encroachments, they pronounced him Heresetic, excommunicated him, and published a Crusade against him. Of this we shall meet with several remarkable Instances in the Course of this History. It is no wonder then, the Popes stirred up and cherished this frenetic Zeal for Crusades, since they turned it so much to their Advantage. Thanks be to God, the Blindness of Christians in this respect has long since been cured.

In proportion to the Growth of the Pope's Authority, the Power of the Bishops, Archbishops, Provincial or National Synods, visibly decreased. The Reason is, because their Decrees and Canons were liable to be annulled upon the least Appeal to the Pope. Accordingly in the Interval I am now going thro', we find but very few Councils worth notice.

The First was held at Winchester in 1070. Hermen- fred Bishop of Cisterion, John and Peter, Cardinal Priests, prelided as the Pope's Legates. As nothing material was transacted in this Synod, besides the depriving Stigand and some other Bishops, it is needless to say any more of it. I shall only take occasion from this Council to remark, that in those Days a Bishop was above a Cardinal, since in the Acts of this Synod, the Bishop of Cisterion is always nam'd before the Cardinals his Col-legues.

In 1075, Langfranc called a Synod at London, where it was ordain'd, that for the future, Provincial and Diocesan Synods should be held more frequently, the use of them being discontinued since the Conquest. The Pre-cedency of the Sees was also regulated according to the Decrees of the VIth Council of Toledo and others, and every Prelate was to take Place according to the Priority of his Ordination. It was agreed, that in the Councils, the Archbishop of York should be seated on the Right, and the Bishop of London on the Left Hand of the Archbishop of Canterbury (2), and the Bishop of Winchester next the Archbishop of York (3). Some Canons were also pass'd; the most remarkable are as follow.

The Vth forbids all Persons, Bishops and Abbots excepted, to speak in the Councils without leave from the President.

By the VIth, Marriage is prohibited to the seventh Degree, for which the Authority of Gregory the Great is vouch'd. But we have seen that, according to the Testimony of Bede, this Pope in his Answer to Austin's Questions, limits the Prohibition to the second Degree only.

The VIIth is against Simony. This Canon, for some time, had pass'd in all the Councils. In all appearance this Disorder was become very common; or perhaps 'twas to prepare the way for the Prohibition of taking the Investiture of Benefices from the Hands of Laymen, to which Simony serv'd for pretence.

The VIIIth is levelled against Sorcery and Divination, and the like superstitious Practices.

By the XIth, no Ecclesiastic is to give his Vote to sentence a Person to die, or lose his Limbs.

In the following Year 1076, the same Archbishop convened a Synod on occasion of the Marriage of Priests.

In 1094, a Synod was held at Rockingham on occasion of the Contest between William Rufus and Anselm.

Eight Years after, in 1102, in the Reign of Henry I. Anselm summoned a national Synod, to which the temporal Lords were invited, to be Witnesses of the Proceedings. Some Canons were pass'd, the principal of which are:

The Ist against Simony.

The IVth forbids Archdeacons, Priests, Deacons, and Canons to marry, or to live with their Wives, if already married. This was the first general Prohibition against the English Priests keeping their Wives, which was disapproved by many People.

(1) He was a French Priest, and had travelled in Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where he was extremely afflicted with the Malaria the Climate bred. He met with a young man, who offered to lead him to a Desert, and showed him the way to Canterbury, and showed him the way to Canterbury.
(2) Because he is Death of the See of Canterbury.

garius was condemned for differing from the common Opinion, and for alledging, in his Letter, the same Argument, formerly used by Scotus against Paschasius. Lanfranc, who was present at the Synod, was obliged to purge himself of the Suspicion of holding too close a Correspondence with this pretended Heretick. However, as Berengarius was condemned unheard, the Pope held another Synod at Perpignan, and summoned him to appear. He came not in Person, but sent two Ecclesiasticks to make his Defence, who, as Lanfranc testifies, gave up their Matter's Cause. Berengarius was therefore condemned a second time, and Scotus's Book, from whence he had borrowed his Arguments, involved in the same Sentence. Instead of submitting to the Decision of these two Synods, Berengarius wrote in Defence of Scotus, and dropped some fatuous Expressions against Paschasius, the Pope, and the Church of Rome. His Arguments appeared to convincing, that several openly declared for his Opinion, and even wrote in his favour. It is true indeed, all those Writings were suppressed; but the Fact, for all that, is not the less certain. An ancient Author remarks, all France was in combustion on account of Berengarius; many learned Men disputing for and against him, both by word of Mouth and in Writing.

The Doctrine of Berengarius must needs have spread it self in several places, since Victor II. Leo's Successor, thought it necessary to hold another Council at Tours, to decide this Controversy. Berengarius not being able to avoid appearing at this Synod, held in his Neighbourhood, it is pretended, he durst not maintain his Opinion, but acquiesced in the Decisions of the two former Councils. But we have only his Adversaries word for this. However, if he did recant, he repented of it afterwards, and continued, as before, to maintain his Opinion. Whereupon he was cited by Stephen X. to a Council held at Rome in 1050. Berengarius appeared, and it may be believe the remaining Historians, most of whom were his bitter Enemies, he durst not defend his Cause. Nay, he fabricated a Writing, wherein he is made to say, that the Body of Jesus Christ was broken in a sensible manner by the Priests, and ground by the Teeth of the Communicants. Afterwards, he was compelled by Threats, to burn with his own Hand Scotus's Book, from whence it was pretended, he had sucked his Errors. It must be observed, that though some say he durst not defend his Cause, yet others affirm, he disputed a good while with Lanfranc and Alric a Monk of Mount Cassin. However, his signing the Writing was not so much owing to his Adversaries Arguments, as to his being over-awed by their Threats. You did not do it (says Lanfranc to him in one of his Letters) for the sake of Truth, but to avoid the Death you were threatened with. Accordingly we find afterwards his Heart conformed not to what his Hand had done, since, notwithstanding all many Recantations, he persisted in his old Opinion to his dying Day.

In 1063, a Council was held at Roan upon the same Occasion, and another at Paliers in 1075. Berengarius was present at the latter, and even ran some risk of his Life, which served only to give him a worse Opinion of the other Party. At last Gregory VII. coming to the Papacy, and being desirous by all means to end this Affair, which was so often renewed, held a Council at Rome in 1079. Before the opening of the Synod, he proclaimed a Fast for thirty Days, to beseech God, that he would be pleased to grant this Council the Grace to discover the Truth. It is somewhat strange, after so many Decisions, conformable, as it is pretended, to the Doctrine of the Church in all Ages, they should still be in suspense what to believe in this Matter. Berengarius made his appearance, and signed a Recantation more full and explicit than any of the former. He declares, that the Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, are substantially changed, by the miraculous Operation of the Words of our Saviour, into the true, visible, and living Body of Jesus Christ, not figuratively, and sacramentally, but truly, properly, and substantially. This Recantation was as far from causing him to alter his mind, as the others. This appears from his being cited once more to a Council at Bourdeaux, where he came and was condemned. He passed the rest of his Life in Retirement [near Tours,] where he died in peace in 1088.

These particulars afford Matter for several Reflections. In the first Place, if the Doctrine of Berengarius was manifestly contrary to the Belief of the Universal Church, since the time of the Apostles, it must be surprising, there should be occasion for so many Councils on this Subject. In the second Place, the great Number of Councils, is a clear Evidence that Berengarius's Opinion was spread far and wide, since so much pains was taken to stop its Progress. Thirdly 'tis no less strange, that neither Berengarius, nor any of the Bishops and other Ecclesiasticks his Friends, were ever deprived. If Berengarius had sincerely recanted, it would be easy to guess the Reason of his being so favorably dealt with by the Popes and Councils. But besides that these frequent Recantations were a Presumption, that the last was no sincerer than the former, there are very strong Proofs of his dying in his old Opinion. And indeed, notwithstanding his recanting, Lanfranc always considered him as a Schismatic. An Anonymous Author, who wrote eight Years after his last Recantation, calls him a Heretic (1). An evident Sign that he went out of the World in his pretended Error. It is true Malmesbury affirms, Berengarius died a Catholic, that is, in the Sentiments of the Church of Rome. But he was led into this Mistake, either by believing his last Recantation real, or from the honorable Epitaph, Hildebrand, Bishop of Mans, made for him after his Death (2). Without doubt Malmesbury, who has inserted his Epitaph in this History, could not imagine that a Bishop would bestow so great Commendations on a Man that was actually a Heretic.

Lastly, It may be further observed, that although the Account, we have of Berengarius, is from his Adversaries, several of them could not forbear mentioning the prodigious Progress of his Doctrine in Germany, Italy, and particularly in France. As for England, it is no wonder, this Controversy made less Noise there than elsewhere. The late Revolution in that Island kept the English intent upon other Matters. I shall close my Remarks with observing, that Berengarius's frequent Recantations were extremely prejudicial to his Doctrine. In an Age like that, few Persons being capable of judging for themselves in so intricate a Case, Example and Precedent swayed more in this matter than Knowledge and Conviction. Now it is certain, the Appearances were against Berengarius, because it was carefully given out, he recanted upon seeing his Error. Not a Word was said of the Threats that extorted his Recantations, though nothing was more certain, as we have seen, by the Testimony of Lanfranc himself.

To finish what I have to say concerning the State of the Church, during the four first Norman Reigns, Edwards nothing remains, but to subjoin a brief Account of the most noted Bishops and other Ecclesiasticks.

Adred Archbishop of York, who crowned William the Conqueror, was a good and pious Prelate. He had been Bishop of Gloucester, where he built the Cathedral. Afterwards he purchased several Estates in the Neighbourhood of York, and annexed them to his Archbishoprick. He was likewise a great Benefactor to the Abby of Beverly (3).

Thos Stigand, according to the Pretensions of the Court Stigand of Rome, intruded himself into the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury, and was for that reason suspended by the Pope, he performed however the Functions of a Metropolitan, during the Reigns of Edward and Harold. If William the Conqueror refused to be crowned by his hand, it was purely to avoid a Contest with the Court of Rome; for otherwise he treated that Prelate at first with great Distinction. When Stigand attended him into Normandy, the Clergy there, without regarding the Pope's Censures, paid him all the Respect due to his Rank and Dignity. Afterwards, the Conqueror had quite other Thoughts of him, and caused him to be deprived of his Rank and Dignity, as soon as this Prelate was removed from his Dignity, the King no more regarded him, but threw him into Prison to force him to discover his hid Treasures, which were very considerable. But nothing being able to wrest this Secret from him, he ended his Days in Prison. After his Death a little Key was found about his Neck, with a Note directed to the Place where his Money was lodged, which was all seized to the King's Use.

Marianus Scotus, born in Scotland in 1028, being thirty Years of Age, retired to a Monastery at Coleton. He was afterwards removed to the Abby of Fulde, where he wrote a general History of Europe from the Creation to the Year of our Lord 1082. He died four Years after in 1086. The Scots were at that time very well received in Germany, where a Prince of that Nation, who had served under Charles the Great, founded fifteen Monasteries, whose Abbots were all to be Scotsmen.

Wulfstan Bishop of Worcester, had a great Character for his Piety, which some have carried too far. It is pretended, he wrought several Miracles, as well in his Life-time as after his Death. It appears however, that Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, had no great Opinion of this Prelate's Merit, since he would have had him deprived by a Synod for Insufficiency and Want of Learning. This gives room to suspect Wulfstan's Virtue consisted in a great

Simplicity,

Simplicity, which is industriously made to pass for an extraordinary Sanctity. Malmesbury, who has writ his Life, relates a Circumstance, which plainly shows, this Prelate's great Conceit of his own Merit. As the Monks, who stood by at his Death, expressed great Sorrow for the Loss of him, he comforted them by assuring them, they should have in him a more powerful Patron after his Death than during his Life.

Lanfranc, whom I have had frequent Occasion to mention, was born at Pavia. After finishing his Studies, he turned Monk, chusing the Abbey of Bec in Normandy, where he taught Logic, and gained a great Reputation. His frequent reproaching the rest of the Fraternity for their Ignorance, was the Cause of his Fortune. The Monks preferring a Complaint against him to William the Bastard, who was then only Duke of Normandy, he was obliged to go to Court to justify himself. In his Conversation with the Duke, that Prince was so charmed with his Merit, that instead of punishing him, as his Accusers expected, he made him Abbot of St. Stephen's at Caen, from whence he afterwards promoted him to the See of Canterbury. Lanfranc's Credit, which was very great in the Conqueror's Reign, declined under William Rufus, for whom however he had procured the Crown. His Death, which happened soon after in 1089, faved him, it may be, a great deal of Trouble. He rebuilt the Church of Canterbury, burnt by the Danes in Archbishop Elphegus's Time, and fixed the Number of the Monks of St. Augustin at one hundred and fifty, which before was not limited. He gave them also a Prior, instead of a Chorepiscopus. A famous Tryal, wherein he got the better of Odo, Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, put him in possession of twenty five Manors, which that Bishop had seized. He acted for a great Statesman, as well as for an able and learned Divine. His Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, and his Ecclesiastical History, which is not extant, were Works of great Repute. But of all his Writings, his Treatise against Berengarius, concerning the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ in the Sacrament, was the most remarkable. Notwithstanding this Testimony of the Conformity of his Sentiments to those of the Roman Church, Gregory VII. would fain have obliged him to come to Rome, and give an Account of his Faith. Nay, he let him know, after several Summons, that he should be suspended, in case he came not to Rome within four Months. But Lanfranc never went, though he had time enough for the Journey, for he did not die till eight Years after (1).

Anselm, who was Abbot of Bec before he was Archbishop of Canterbury, was the most famous of all the English Bishops, for his Contests with William Rufus and Henry I. The former of these Disputes being of little Consequence, I shall not lose time in descending to particulars, having elsewhere related what is material. I shall only observe one Circumstance, which shows Pope Urban's Address to get himself owned in England.

Clement the Anti Pope being still alive when Urban II. was chosen, England refused to acknowledge either of the Popes. In the mean time, Anselm falling at Variance with William Rufus, openly declared for Urban, contrary to the King's Will and Pleasure. As their Quarrel daily increased, the King fought means to humble him. To that end, he let Urban know, if he would send him the Pall designed for Anselm, that the Archbishop might be obliged to receive it from him, he should be owned for Pope in England. Urban liking the Proposal, sent the Bishop of Alba, to do as the King desired. However this Nuncio, without saying any thing of his having the Pall, only told the King, the Pope was ready to comply with his Request, provided England would acknowledge his Authority. Upon this Assurance, the King performed his Engagement, and then wanting to have Anselm's Pall in his Disposal, the Nuncio told him, the thing was impracticable, because Anselm refused to receive the Pall from the hands of a Layman. In this manner was the King imposed upon, and forced to agree, the Archbishop should take up the Pall himself from the Altar, where the Nuncio had laid it [by Consent.] He never forgave the Archbishop, who, as has been related, was obliged to go to Rome, and afterwards to retire to Lyon, where he remained till the King's Death.

During Anselm's stay at Rome, he was present at a Council, where it was decreed, that all Ecclesiastics, who for the future received the Investiture of their Benefices from the hands of a Layman, should be excommunicated. In obedience to this Decree, after his return into England by Henry's own Solicitations, he refused to do Homage to that Prince, and consecrate the Bishops invested by the King. This Refusal was the ground of a more important Dispute than that with William Rufus, since the Point in question was a Prerogative, which the Kings of England had been long possessed of. However, Henry being willing to act with Caution, at a time when the Court of Rome was grown very formidable by prevailing over the Emperor, contented that Anselm should send Agents to Rome; whilst himself dispatched Ambassadors thither to plead his Cause, and persuade the Pope to leave him in peaceable Possession of his Right. Paschal II. sent word, p. 63. he could not grant the King a Thing so expressly forbidden by several Councils. Notwithstanding this Refusal, Henry was firmly resolved to preserve a Privilege received from his Predecessors. Accordingly, he commanded the Archbishop to do him Homage, and consecrate the Bishops invested after the usual Manner. Anselm made Answer, he could not obey the King without disobeying the Pope and the Decrees of the Synod of Rome, to which he had himself given his Vote. What's p. 69. this to me, reply'd the King, is the Synod of Rome to deprive me of the Prerogatives of my Predecessors? No, I will never suffer any Person, who refuses me the Securities of a Subject, to enjoy Estates in my Dominions. And then ordered the Archbishop to do as he required, or depart the Kingdom. Anselm answered, he could do neither; but would go down to Canterbury, and there wait God's good Pleasure. The King and the Lords of the Council were shocked at this Answer. After debating the Matter, the Council was of Opinion, that the King should not have so great Regard to Anselm or the Pope himself, but should drive the one out of the Kingdom, and disengage himself from all Dependence on the other. The King, not thinking it advisable to proceed to these Extremities of his own Accord, summoned a general Assembly or Parliament. He represented to them the Attempts of the Pope upon the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Arrogance of the Archbishop, who behaved to him, not as a Subject but as an Equal, or rather a Superior. Upon these Complaints the Assembly agreed, that Anselm should be allowed a longer time for Deliberation; that in the mean while the King should send Ambassadors to the Pope, to try to persuade him to desist in an amicable manner from his Pretensions. The Archbishop of York, and two other Bishops were charg'd with this Embassy, and accompanied with two Agents for Anselm. The Ambassadors had Instructions to offer the Pope this Alternative: Either to relax in the Point of Investitures; or be contented with the Banishment of Anselm, lose the Obedience of the English, and all the Profits accruing from thence. When these Prelates had their Audience of the Pope, they represented to him the Danger he exposed himself to, in case he refused to comply with the King. Paschal made answer, he would not only lose p. 73. England, but his Dignity too, rather than yield in the least. Anselm's Agents had likewise their Audience apart. After which, the Pope sent two Letters by them, p. 74. one for the King, exhorting him to desist from his Claim to Investitures; the other for Anselm, injoining him to persist in his supporting the Cause of Truth. The King by no means relishing this Letter, would not communicate it to the Lords. But Anselm caused his to be publicly read.

Mean time, the King's Ambassadors and Anselm's Agents differed very much in their Reports. The Bishops declared, the Pope at a private Audience told them, he was willing to indulge the King the Liberty of Investitures, provided he would in return give him Satisfaction in other Points: But that he durst not openly declare so much, lest other Sovereigns should claim the same Privilege. Anselm's Agents, on the contrary, protested, the Pope said nothing like it, and appealed for the Truth of what they asserted to the Letter sent to the Archbishop. What they alleged was the more probable, as the King refus'd to produce the Pope's Letter. Nevertheless, there was no questioning the Testimony of the Archbishop of York and the two other Bishops, without accusing them withal of Falshood and shameful Prevarication. Even Anselm was in Suspence, since they appealed to the Pope himself for the Truth of what they delivered. In this Uncertainty he thought it most advisable to prolong the Time, till he was better informed of the Pope's Intentions. To that Purpose, he offered to communicate with the Bishops who had received Investiture from the King, which he had hitherto refus'd, on condition he should not consecrate them, before he had heard from the Pope. This Temper giving the King and Council some Satisfaction, he had Time allowed him to send fresh Agents to Rome.

Whilst the Agents were at the Court of Rome, the King, who bore these Delays with Impatience, sent to the Archbishop to consecrate the three Bishops Elect. Anselm answered, he was ready to consecrate one of the three, who had refused to be invested by the King: But for the others, he could not do it without the Pope's Consent. Upon his declining the Office, the King commanded the Archbishop of York to perform the Solemnity. But the Bishops who were to be consecrated, renounced the Authority, and would not submit to it. This Regard for the Pope provoked the King to that Degree, that he confiscated all their Estates.

(1) Lanfranc exempted all the Clerks or Parish Priests of the Towns belonging to him, or where he was Lord, or presented to the Living in any Diocese, from the Jurisdiction and Visitations of the Bishops, which might be the Original of Paschalis. Endnot, p. 12. Brady, p. 215.

As soon as Anselm's Agents were returned from Rome, the King went down to Canterbury, and sent to the Archbishop to give him Satisfaction, unless he would provoke him to new Measures. Anselm answered, he had receiv'd a Letter from the Pope, which was yet unopen'd; that he would open it in his Presence, and govern himself according to the Pope's Directions. Henry, enraged at the Preference the Archbishop always gave to the Pope's Orders, reply'd, the Point in question was not to know what the Pope enjoined, for he did not intend to submit his Privileges to his Determination. However, the Archbishop was not to be prevailed with, but remain'd firm to his Resolution. At last, Henry willing to try all ways before he proceeded to other Measures, advis'd Anselm himself to take a Journey to Rome, to see if he could persuade the Pope to relax. Anselm was very loth to go, but at length was prevailed upon, at the request of the Bishops and Barons, who represented to him, that the Journey could not possibly do him any Disservice.

As soon as he was arriv'd in Normandy, he open'd the Pope's Letters, where he found an absolute Denial of all that the King's Ambassadors had reported. However, he purst his Journey to Rome, where he was quickly follow'd by William Warewulf the King's Ambassador, formerly employed at the Court of Rome by William Rufus. The Ambassador being admitted to Audience, represented to the Pope, that he was in Danger of losing England, if he persisted in depriving the King of his just Privileges: Adding, his Master was resolv'd to lose his Crown rather than part with the Right of Investitures. And I, answer'd Paschal, will sooner lose my Life, than suffer the Church's Privileges to be thus usurp'd. This so positive an Answer entirely breaking off the Negotiation, the Ambassador set out for England, and Anselm, who did not dare to return to his Church, went and staid at Lyon.

This Attempt not succeeding, Henry sent another Embassy to Rome. But as nothing new was propos'd, it serv'd only to exasperate the Pope, who excommunicated the Earl of Mellent and some other Lords of the Council. He even threaten'd Henry with the Church's Censures, but however declin'd pronouncing any against him. Mean time, Anselm perceiving the Pope dilatory in his Proceedings, grew apprehensive, he might long continue in Exile, and, sooner or later, the Pope and King come to an Accommodation, of which he might well be the Victim. Wherefore, he resolv'd to engage the Pope so deeply in the Affair, that there should be no possibility of drawing back. For that purpose, he went and made a Visit to Adela, Countess of Blain, Henry's Sister, and told her, that after a great deal of Patience he must now be forc'd to excommunicate the King, unless he would forthwith desist from his Pretensions. Adela being extremely troubled at this Menace, endeavour'd to procure an Accommodation. To that end, she desired the King her Brother, who was then in Normandy, to come to her at the Castle of P'agle, where she design'd to bring Anselm, that they might confer together. At this Interview, Things began, by means of the Countess of Blain, to be in a better way. The King fearing the Archbishop's Threats, treat'd him very civilly. Anselm in return shew'd greater Respect to the King than he had hitherto done. They were not long together, before they perceived in each other an equal Desire to put an end to the Contest in an honourable Manner. Thus dispos'd, they amicably sought Means to adjust the Affair to their mutual Satisfaction. As soon as an Expedient was agreed upon, Henry sent William de Warewulf to the Pope for his Approbation. Paschal's Affairs were then in such a Situation, that he did not care to break with England. He was hard press'd by the Germans, who shortly after compell'd him to fly for Refuge into France. Matters therefore were accommodated upon these Terms; The King was to renounce the Right of Investitures, and the Pope to give the Bishops and Abbots Leave to do Homage to the King for their Temporalities. Thus the Pope and King equally got clear of this troublesome Business, by a Method as just as it was natural, and which should have been taken at first, if both had acted fairly and honestly. This will evidently appear, if we impartially inquire into the State of the Question, which perhaps may not be amiss, since this Affair formerly made so great Noise, and Anselm was so much concern'd in it.

In the first place, I shall lay down what seems to me undeniable, that ever since the time of Charles the Great, Sovereign Princes had enjoyed the Right of Investitures to Bishopsricks and Abbeyes, by the delivery of the Ring and Pastoral Staff (1). Gregory VII was the first that attempted to deprive them of this Privilege, about the latter end of the XIth Century. The Popes, his Successors, pursu'd the Execution of this Project with the same Earnestness. It must be confess'd, the Kings themselves gave the Popes but too frequent occasion to exclaim against their Abuse of this Prerogative. Under pretence, that the Bishops and Abbots could not take possession of their Benefices before they had received Investiture, the Princes publicly sold the Bishopsricks and Abbeyes to the best Bidder. I say, sold them; for, though the Elections appeared Canonical, yet the Sovereigns over-ruled them, by having it in their Power to refuse Investiture to those they did not like. This alone was sufficient to obtain the Election of such as they recommended, no Ecclesiastic desiring to be Bishop or Abbot without enjoying the Temporalities. It was necessary therefore, in order to be eluded, to have the King's Consent, after which, the Bishop or Abbot, even before Consecration, received Investiture in the manner above-mentioned. But besides that Simony had too often a place in these Elections, there was another Reason, which seem'd to justify the Popes in their Attempts to abolish Investitures; namely, the Princes, by investing the Ecclesiastics not in the same manner as the Laymen, and even before their Consecration, seem'd as if they assum'd to themselves a Power to grant Spiritual Jurisdiction. And this the Popes represented as a clear Usurpation of the Church's Privileges. And indeed, it look'd something like it, because of the two Characters which were confounded in the Prelate elect; namely, as Minister of the Church, and as Temporal Lord of the Lands annex'd to his Dignity. If the Popes and Princes had acted fairly, they would have carefully distinguished these two Characters; but, on the contrary, each thought it his Interest to leave them undisturbed. By that means the Princes over-ruled the Elections, and the Popes took occasion to dispute with the Sovereigns the Right they were possess'd of. For want of distinguishing therefore, arose all those Contests between the Princes and Popes. The former declared, they would never suffer any Person to take possession of Lands, held of the Crown, without receiving Investiture at their Hands. The Popes, on their part, maintain'd, it was unreasonable, Princes should interpose in Elections, or pretend to convey a Character, which the Church alone had Power to confer. Thus both sides equally deviated from the true State of the Case. For it was very possible for a Man to be a Bishop or Abbot, without being possess'd of the Lands held of the Crown, in which case the Prince had nothing to do. On the other hand, Princes would have received no manner of Detriment from any one's conveying a Spiritual Character without their Consent, as long as it was in their Power to secure themselves, before they put the Prelates in possession of the Temporalities. But there was no possibility of bringing them to this Point, whilst both sides remained inflexible. Thus, it is manifest, the Expedient practis'd by Paschal II and Henry I, was very reasonable, and not at all prejudicial to the Church's Rights, or the King's Prerogative. But in all appearance, this Affair would not have ended so happily, if the Pope's Circumstances had not forced him to relax. This may be infer'd from his Behaviour to the Emperor on the same Occasion, to whom he could never be brought to grant, what he had now yielded to the King of England.

I have dwelt the longer on this part of Anselm's Life, because it discovers the Character of this Prelate, who was honoured with the glorious Title of Saint, as well as who zealously adhered to the Court of Rome. He was born in the Year 1033, at Ast, a small Town in Italy, belonging now to the Duke of Savoy. At seven and twenty Years of Age he turn'd Monk in the Abbey of Bec, of which Laufarc was Prior. When Laufarc was made Abbot of St. Stephen's at Caen, Anselm became Prior, and afterwards Abbot of Bec, from whence he was promoted to the See of Canterbury. He compos'd several Theological Treatises, of which Father Garbern published the largest Edition in 1676. His Writings, according to the Testimony of du Pin, are full of Metaphysical

(1) Gregory VII (ad An. 1075.) relates that Pope Adrian I, at a Council of a hundred and fifty three Bishops and Abbots, granted Consuetudine to the Emperor, who, by the Right of Investiture, gave the Authority of the Council, and affirm'd it was subject to the Emperor's Power to remove the Emperor against Paschal II.

Questions, argued with the Appearance of a great deal of Logic. The same Author observes, that Anselm's Letters are written in a less elaborate Style than his other Works. He is also the first who composed long Prayers, in the Form of Meditations. He passed for a Prelate of great Learning and an unblameable Life. He has been much applauded for his Firmness in his Contents with William Rufus and Henry I. But this same Firmness in maintaining the Cause of the Pope, which was gloried in for so many Centuries, would not meet with that Approbation at present. Anselm died in 1109, and was canonized in the Reign of Henry VII. at the Instance of Cardinal Morton [then Archbishop of Canterbury.]

Gilbert Bishop of London, was famous in the Reign of Henry I. chiefly on the account of his Learning, which gained him the Appellation of Universalist. These kind of Names were much in Vogue at that time, as Marks of Honour for such as were distinguished in the Sciences. He wrote a Commentary on David's Psalms; and an Exposition on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are still extant in Manuscript.

Osmond Bishop of Salisbury, by Birth a Norman, was Earl of Dorset, and Privy-Counsellor to William the Conqueror, when he was made a Bishop. As in those Days every Diocese had a different Liturgy, Osmond undertook the correcting that which was used in his. He rendered it more pure than it was before, by discharging a great many barbarous and rude Expressions, and digesting the whole in a more commodious Method. This Liturgy, Secundum usum Sarum, with these Emendations, was quickly received in the other Dioceses, and at length became common to all the Churches of the Kingdom. It is affirmed, that after Osmond's Death, in the Year 1099, there were several Interpolations thrown in, which are by no means approved of at present.

Malachy Archbishop of Armagh in Ireland, is famous for his Prophecy, concerning the Popes which were to succeed to the Papal Chair after his time. These Predictions are still extant (1), and are a sort of Riddles, of which Endeavours are used to give some Interpretation. He died in 1150, at the Monastery of Clareval in France. St. Bernard has given us his Life.

Ingulphus was known to William the Conqueror, when Ingulph that Prince, then Duke of Normandy only, came into England to visit King Edward. He attended him into Normandy as Secretary; but some time after, resigning this Office, went in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. At his return, he turned Monk in the Abbey of Fountains, from whence he was sent for and made Abbot of Croyland by William the Conqueror. He died in 1109, after writing the History of his Monastery, which is inserted in the Collection of the ancient English Histories (2).

Josfrid Abbot of the same Monastery, and immediate Successor to Ingulphus, was the first, as some pretend, that erected Schools at Cambridge, where he settled four of his Monks as Professors. If this be true, that famous University falls very short of the Antiquity generally ascribed to it (3).

Godfrid Prior of Winchester, was one of the best Writers of his time, if we may believe William of Malmesbury, who affirms, he writ with great Elegance and Politeness. He composed, amongst other Things, a Panegyric upon the English Primates. But what is more considerable, he reformed the Breviary, by discharging all the barbarous Terms, and making the Style more pure and neat. Alfred conjectures, this Prior had a principal Hand in correcting the Liturgy of Sarum, which went under Osmond's Name (4).

(1) They were published by Arnold Wynn.

(2) Published by Dr. Gale. Ingulphus was born at London in 1030. His Father was one of King Edward the Confessor's Courtiers. He was the first of our English Historians after the Conquest. In his History of Croyland, he has occasionally intermixed the Story of our Kings from the Year 664, to 1061. Bishop Nicolson observes, that the Relation he bore to the Conqueror, manifestly biases him in the ill Account he gives of Harold.

(3) Thus Josfrid, about the Year 1114, began a Custom which was afterwards practised by all the Monks. Upon Good Friday, stripping himself every Year to the Waist before all the Congregate, he was severely scourged. This was done as a Penance for their Sins, and to make a deeper Impression of our Saviour's Sufferings.

(4) The principal Writers during the four first Norman Reigns not mentioned by Rapin, amongst his Persons of Note, are: William of Poitiers or Pictorensis, who, though a Partisan and Chaplain to the Conqueror, has given us so fair an Account of the Norman Revolution, that he has found good Credit with most of our Historians.

Florence of Worcester, wrote a Chronicle, which ended with his Life in 1129; but was continued fifty Years farther by another Monk of the same Monastery. He epitomized or transferred Marianus, adding very many Collections out of the Saxon Chronicle, and other Writers with much Care and Judgment. He is blamed for adhering so scrupulously to his Authority, as sometimes to retain their Mistakes.

Edmunde, a Monk of Canterbury, in his History of the Normans, &c. published by Mr. Selden, has given us the Story of the two Williams and Henry I. from the Year 1066, to 1122. It is a Work (as Bishop Nicolson observes) of great Gravity and unquestionable Authority. Tho' he was intimately acquainted with Anselm, yet he has given a fair Account of the mighty Dispute about Investitures. Selden says, his Style equals Malmesbury, his Matter and Composition exceeds him.

Odericus Vitalis was a Monk of St. Eusebius's in Normandy, where he lived fifty six Years. He wrote an Eccelesiastical History in thirteen Books, wherein he has intermixed a great many things relating to our History. He is said to be immoderate in the Praise of his Friends, and the Disparage of his Enemies; and to be too large in his Description of little Matters, whilst he passes too cursorily over things of Moment.

William (Monk and Library-keeper) of Malmesbury, in his Account of the English Kings from the Arrival of the Saxons, with an Appendix in two more, which he fills with Historical Notices, has made a judicious Collection of whatever he found in Records, from the Arrival of the Saxons, to the eighth Year of the Reign of King Stephen, 1142. He has had the highest Commendations given him by some of our best Critics in English History. He is called Elegant, Learned and Faithful. Upon this lies the Chief of our Historians.

The most noble Monument extant is the old Saxon Chronicle, or Annals. It begins from the Birth of our Saviour, and ends with Stephen's Death in 1154. By the difference of the Style and other infallible Marks, it is plain these Annals were compiled at several Times. To the Year 931, they chiefly follow Bede as to Church Affairs; But their Account of the Wars between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons is borrowed from no Writer that we know of, and therefore to them it is that we are indebted for the Relation of what passed in those Days. Asserius's History of Alfred and the Annals correspond in so many things, that the one seems to be a Translation of the other. In a Word, they have been the Foundation of all our Histories to the Norman Conquest. They were published at Oxford in 1694, by Dr. Gibson, the present Bishop of London, who from all the Manuscripts he made up the Text as entire and complete as possible, with an elegant and proper Preface, void of affected Strains and unlucky Mistakes, which used to abound in Works of this Kind.

Duke Henry came to the

HE English were too weary of the Civil Wars, that had so long afflicted the Kingdom, willingly to run the Hazard of seeing them renewed. Though the Death of Stephen might have easily furnished an Occasion for fresh Commotions, they peaceably waited for the Duke of Normandy, who could not come into England, till six Weeks after he had received the News (1). During this Interval, not a Man offered to dispute his Title. Besides, that Prince William, Son of the deceased King, was a Prince of little Merit, the late Proceedings of most of the Barons against the King his Father, kept them from adhering to the Fortune of the young Prince, for fear of putting it in his Power to be revenged. Moreover, Henry was not only powerful beyond Sea, but had also a great Party in the Kingdom, and the strongest Places were in the Hands of his Creatures. And therefore, supposing William had been willing to try to place himself on the Throne, he would have wanted the necessary Assistance to accomplish his Design (2).

Henry then was crowned (3) the next Day after his Arrival, pursuant to the Agreement made with Stephen, of which all the Barons of the Realm were Guarantees (4). It was with extreme Satisfaction, that the English beheld on the Throne, a Prince defended by his Mother from their ancient Kings, and who gave the Crown a brighter Lustre than ever. He added to it, as so many new 1155.

Gems, Poitou, Guienne, Saintonge, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, and Normandy, of which he was in actual Possession. Mean time, England, the most considerable Part of his Dominions, had endured such violent Shocks in the late Reign, that, in order to recover its ancient Splendor, some Rest was entirely necessary. The most proper Means to that End, was the putting it out of the Power of the Factious to excite new Troubles. Accordingly Henry made That his chief Business from the first Hour of his Reign. He began with demolishing the great Number of his Castles that were fortified in Stephen's Reign, and served only for Sanctuaries to Robbers, and Disturbers of the publick (5). The Bishop of Winchester alone had six of the most considerable, which he forfeited for going out of the Kingdom without Leave. This first Step, which demonstrated to the Barons the King's Resolution to keep them in Obedience, was followed by another no less beneficial to the Kingdom; and that was, the sending away the foreign Troops entertained by Stephen. These Soldiers, known in the English Historians by the Name of Brabançons, and in French by that of Routiers or Cotteraux, were a Mixture of People from several Parts of Europe, and particularly from Germany and the Low-Countries. As they professed themselves independent of any particular Prince, they served indifferently whoever had a Mind to employ them, provided they found their Account in it. Not to be regularly paid they even considered as an Ad-

1155. vantage, because they took occasion from thence to plunder the Friends as well as Enemies of those that entertained them. So that usually, the Assistance of those Troops became very burthenome to the Princes themselves for whom they fought, as the English had frequently experienced. Henry willing to ease his People of this dead Weight, which had so long oppressed them, dismissed all the so-rainers, without suffering for much as one to remain in the Country. William of Tyres, their General, did not stay to be ordered to depart; the cold Reception he met with at Court, having already convinced him, his Absence would be very acceptable (1).

Had the new King stopped here, he might have been justly supposed to have no other view but the Welfare and Tranquillity of the Kingdom. But he plainly discovered, he was swayed by more self-interested Motives, when shortly after, he revoked all the Grants made by his Predecessor, and resumed all the Lands, alienated from the Crown. The Possessors were extremely mortified, and loudly murmured, affirming, it was very unjust to deprive them of the Reward of their Services (2). Those, especially, that had sided with the King and the Empress his Mother, were filled with Indignation, to see themselves thus confounded with Stephen's Adherents. These last, on the other hand, maintained, that in serving the King who was actually on the Throne, they had done the part of faithful Subjects, and in depriving them of their Estates, a Precedent was established, which might one Day be very dangerous to the Kingdom, if not to the King himself. They even refused to comply; but upon the King's Approach with an Army to compel them, they were unable to resist. Only Hugh Mortimer presumed to show out one of his Castles, which cost him the loss of all his blood.

M. Paris. refit. Only Hugh Martimer presumed to hold out one of his Castles, which cost him the loss of all his others (3). William Sm. William of Blois, Son of King Stephen, fared no better than the rest. Henry deposed him of whatever was left him by the King his Father (4); and of all his Lands, gave him none but those that belonged to his Family, before Stephen's Accession to the Crown. And yet he had as an incontestable Title by the Agreement; And yet, he had an Father made with Henry. But of what Force are Treaties against Breach of Faith supported with Power? Is the Nobility, enriched by the Liberality of the late King, or of the Emperors Matilda, were suddenly impoverished by Henry's Policy, who had frequent Occasions to remark, how arrogant their Riches had made them. Henry shewed also, that he acted from a Principle of Revenge, in depriving the Barons of the new Creation, of the honorable Titles conferred on them by Stephen, on pretence they were bestowed, as a Recompence for favoring an Usurper.

After the King had taken all the Precaveons he thought proper for reitoring Tranquillity in the Kingdom, he cheif a Council, of the most eminent Persons as well of the Clergy, as the Nobility. Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Becket Archdeacon of the same see, lately made Chancellor; Robert Earl of Leicester, Chief Justiciary of the Realm, were the principal. At the Head of the Cabinet-Council was Matilda his Mother, whom long Experience and her own Misfortunes had rendered wife as her Cost. These Two Councils being established, Henry convened an Assembly-General or Parliament at Wallingford, where he cauled the Barons to take the Oath to William and Henry (5) his Sons, the first of which died a few Days after this Ceremony. Before the Assembly broke up, the King consented that the Laws of Edward should be in Force, and, of his own accord, confirmed the Charter of Henry I. his Grandfather. These first Proceedings of the new King gave great hopes to the honest and peaceable, whilst they fruck the wicked and injurious with Terror, who found themselves obliged either to abandon the Kingdom, or behave very differently from what they had hitherto done. They were very sensible, they had to deal with a Prince, who was fully resolved to root out the Licentiousness introduced in the late Reign.

Adrian IV. Pope Anastasius dying this Year, Adrian IV, an Englishman, succeeded to the Papacy (6).

1156. As soon as Henry had settled his Affairs in England, he crossed the Sea, to do Homage to the King of France for the Provinces, he possessed in that Kingdom (7). These Possessions rendered him the most powerful Vassal of the Crown of France, and almost equalled him to the Sovereign.

reign himself, whose Demisus were inconsiderable, in comparison of what they were afterwards. As the Dominion Henry and his Successors were possessed of in France, provided the occasion of numberless Wars between the French and English; it will not be improper briefly to explain, wherein consisted at that time the Strength of the Kings of France. Hence we shall be able to form a just Idea of their Power, and see without the wide Difference, in that respect, between the first Successors of Hugh Capet, and those who, in these latter Days, have swayed the Sceptre of that Kingdom.

When Hugh Capet usurped the Crown upon the House of Charles the Great, he thought the best way to fix himself in the Throne, was to make the late Revolution turn to the Advantage of the French Nobility. To engage them therefore to support his Usurpation, he granted the Provinces, of which they were only Governors to them and their Heirs, by the Name of Feifs. These Grants he confirmed by authentic Charters, insinuating, that the Feifs should devolve to the Crown in default of Heirs. More-over, he reserved the Right of confiscating them for Rebellion and other Crimes specified in the Charters. By these Numbers of powerful Lords, or rather Princes; who holding their Lands by Hereditary Right, became to many Sovereigns. The Crown therefore had nothing left but mounted the Throne. Hugh Capet was possessed of before he added some vacant Governments, were very considerable, because his Family was grown exceeding powerful upon the decline of the House of Charles the Great. I am well aware, that all are not agreed, Hugh Capet first changed the Governments into Feifs; that some make this Alteration more remote; and others affirm it to spring from the first Kings of that Race. But, besides that I Opinion, I have followed, is the most probable, the difference of a few Years, more or less, is of no Moment with regard to the general State of France, of which I mean to speak.

Among these Fiefs, there were some distinguished for their great Extent, which were styled Peermords. Of this sort there were six: Ecclesiastical, and fix Lay. But as the first have little Relation to the English History, it will be needless to mention them (8). Of the six Lay-Peermords, three were Dukeholds, via, Burgundy, Normandy, Gauenne; and three, Earldoms, namely, Flanders, Touloze, and Champagne. Each of these fix Peers had Vassals which held their Lands of him, in the same manner as he himself held his Peermord of the Crown. For Instance, the Duke of Normandy had for Vassal the Duke of Burgundy, by the Concession of Charles the Simple, who annexed this Right to the Grant, made to Rollo. Hence we may see, how naked the Crown of France was, and how inconsiderable its Revenues, in comparison of what they were afterwards. To the time of Lewis VII., firmated the Tung, who reigned in France when our Henry mounted the Throne of England, the great Fiefs of their Peermords had not yet united any of these great Kings to their Demfis. It is easy therefore to perceive, that the new King of England, who held the two most considerable Peermords, besides many other Provinces, was possessed of as much, or more Lands in the Kingdom, than the King of France himself. But, notwithstanding the narrow Extent of the Demfis of the Crown, the King of France was a very potent Prince, by the Aids he received from his Vassals: Aids that were furnished sometimes out of Duty, and sometimes voluntarily. When the Kingdom was engaged in a War, with the Advice and Consent of the States, each Vassal was obliged to find a certain Number of Troops; and then it was, the Sovereign appeared at the Head of a formidable Army. But when the King undertook a War of his own accord, or for his own private Interest, the Vassals were at Liberty to supply or refuse their Quota of Troops. Nay, they looked upon themselves as privileged to take up Arms against him, in case of Oppression, or even for a bare denial of Justice, such being the Nature of the French Constitution, it is no wonder that, in the History of that Kingdom, we find their Kings, matching one while with very considerable Forces, and another while at the Head of numerous Armies. Their main Strength consisted in the Aids

Then by degrees they found means to abolish the Distinction between a necessary, and an unnecessary War. Without regarding the Appropriation of the States, they obliged their Vassals to furnish them with Aids at all times, confounding incessantly the private Views of the King, with the Interest of the Publick. They even made use of some of their Vassals to oppress the rest. This, added to the Opportunities that offered of course, to unite several Provinces to the Crown for want of Heirs, so encreased their Strength, that they were able at length to keep Great Men in Obedience; but it was by degrees, and after a long Space of Time, that they arrived at this height of Power.

The Design to do Homage to the King of France was not the sole Motive of Henry's crossing the Sea. His chief aim was to recover Anjou, seized by his Brother Geoffrey, upon the following Claim. Geoffrey Plantagenet Earl of Anjou, Father of these two Princes, ordered by his last Will, that Henry his eldest Son should inherit the Possessions of Matilda their Mother, which included Normandy, and her Right to England. To Geoffrey his second Son, he left Anjou, Touraine, and Maine; and to a third Son named William, gave only the Earldom of Mortagne. But, as it was unreasonable the Empress his Wife should be deprived of her Possessions during her Life, or Henry made to wait for her Death without any Inheritance; he added another Clause in his Will, namely, that Henry should enjoy, till the Empress's Death, the three Earldoms assigned to Geoffrey, reserving to this last the Cities of Lodun, Chinon, and Mirebel, till his elder Brother should resign him the paternal Estate, when in possession of Normandy. To secure the Performance of this Will, the Earl caused his Barons solemnly to swear, never to suffer his Body to be buried, till his eldest Son had taken an Oath to execute his last Will. It was with great Difficulty, Henry was persuaded to take this Oath. He was of opinion, the Earl his Father egregiously wronged him, in depriving him of these three Earldoms, which, according to Custom, ought to devolve to the eldest Son. However, rather than leave his Father's Body unburied, he swore to execute his Will. Some time after, his Mother Matilda resigning Normandy to him, Geoffrey thought he might justly take possession of Anjou; but, as was related before, Henry drove him out of that Province. As soon as his Brother was on the Throne of England, Geoffrey renewed his Pretensions, and, whilst the King was employed in his Island, once more took possession of Anjou. The Angevins espoused his Cause, chusing rather to have a private Earl, than be in dependance on the Crown of England. Besides, he was assisted by the King of France, who was ever ready to lessen Henry's Power, whom he looked upon as a very formidable Neighbour. When the Earl of Anjou made his Will, there was little appearance of his eldest Son's ever mounting the Throne of England; for Stephen's Affairs were in a prosperous Condition. For this reason he considered that Kingdom, only as a thing to which indeed his Son had a Right to aspire, but from which he was very remote. It was not reasonable therefore that Henry, whilst he waited for the Empress's Death, should be deprived of his Father's Inheritance, and this was the Ground of his Father's leaving him the three Earldoms during his Mother's Life. To consider only the Intent of this Will, it was manifest, that as soon as Henry was in possession of Normandy and England, he should have resigned Anjou to Geoffrey, especially as he had bound himself by Oath. But he affirmed, the Will was void, and his Father had not Power to deprive the First-born of the Patrimony received from his Ancestors. His Oath therefore was the only thing that gave him any trouble. But he found means to free himself from that Scruple by the Pope's Dispensation which he very easily obtain'd. As soon as he saw himself supported by this Authority, he immediately resolved upon a War with his Brother, the prosecution of which was the chief Motive of his leaving England. After doing Homage to the King of France, he marched towards Poitou, and took from his Brother the Cities of Mirebel, Chinon, and Lodun; then entering Anjou, notwithstanding Geoffrey's Resistance, he became Master of all the fortified Places, and drove him out of the Country (1).

The dispossession Prince would have been in a wretched Condition, had not Fortune thrown in his way the Earldom of Nantes, the Inhabitants whereof voluntarily submitted to him. As this Event had very remarkable Consequences, it will not be improper to clear this Matter a little. Conan the Great, Duke of Bretagne, had a Son named Hoel, and a Daughter called Bertha, married to Eudo Earl of Pontevre her Relation, by whom she had a Son called Conan, from his Mother's Father. Some Suspensions, well or ill-grounded, inducing Conan the Great to disown and disinheret his Son, Eudo, Husband of Bertha, got possession of Bretagne, after the Death of his Father-in-law, notwithstanding Hoel's Efforts, who had only the City of Nantes from him. Bertha's Death, four Years after, was the occasion of fresh Pretensions. Conan her Son, surnamed the Little, pretending Bretagne was his Mother's Inheritance, to which Eudo his Father had no manner of Right, assumed the Title of Duke of Bretagne. Eudo on his side, resolving to keep possession of the Dukedom, there arose between the Father and Son a War which lasted many Years, and ended in the entire Defeat of Eudo, who was obliged to fly for Refuge to the Court of France.

Conan the Little was no sooner in possession of Bretagne, but he undertook to reduce to his Obedience the City of Nantes, which, since the Death of Conan the Great, made a separate State under the Dominion of Hoel. When the Inhabitants of Nantes espoused the Cause of Hoel, they did it from a Motive of Justice, being persuaded, the Duke his Father had wronged him very much in disinheriting him. Afterwards, they found themselves so deceived in the good Opinion they had entertained of him, that they expelled him, believing him incapable of defending them against Conan, who was preparing to attack them. From that time, Hoel is no more mentioned in History. Mean while, the People of Nantes, not being able to resolve to submit to Conan, call in Geoffrey, Brother of the King of England, and own him for Sovereign. Thus Geoffrey became Earl of Nantes immediately after his expulsion out of Anjou, but he did not long enjoy his new Earldom.

After Henry had reduced Anjou, he returned to England. Upon his Arrival he made a very advantageous Treaty with Malcolm King of Scotland, who resigned to him Carlisle, Newcastle, and Bamborough-Castle, contenting himself with the Earldom of Huntington, which Prince Henry his Father had possess'd. This Restitution was doubtless very just, since David, Grandfather of Malcolm, caused them to be surrendered to him by Treaties, at a Time when Stephen regarded his own Interest more than the publick Good. But in all appearance Henry's great Power contributed more than any thing else to the King of Scotland's Moderation (2).

It is surprising that the Welsh, when Henry was grown so formidable, should cautiously venture to attack him, and make Incursions into his Frontiers. The Ravages they committed so provoked the King, that he resolved to be severely revenged. To this End he drew together a powerful Army, and marched into Wales; where he put all to Fire and Sword. Upon his Approach the Welsh retired to their Mountains, where it was not possible to reach them, how much soever he endeavoured it. Nay, it happened one Day, that his Vanguard running into a narrow Defile, were entirely routed. The Terror, this Accident struck into the rest of the English Troops, was further increased by the imprudent Conduct of Henry de Essex, Hereditary Standard-Bearer of England. Upon a Rumour which run through the Army that the King was slain, he threw down the Standard, and fled, crying out the King is dead. This Action for which he was afterwards punished (3), threw the English into so great Confusion, that had not the King thrown himself to them, to revive their Courage, he would have run the Hazard of losing that Day his whole Army. Notwithstanding these Advantages, the Welsh thought themselves very happy that the King, weary of so troublesome a War, was pleased to grant them a Peace (4). By the Treaty he referred to himself the Liberty of cutting through their Woods large Roads, which might, whenever he had a mind, give him Entrance into their Country. He caused them also to surrender certain Castles (5), taken by them during the Troubles of the late Reign (6).

In the beginning of the next Year, Henry's Family was encreased by the Birth of a second Son (7), who was named Richard. A few Days after he renewed the Ceremony of his Coronation in the Suburbs of Lincoln (8), not daring to do it within the Walls of the City. He shewed himself more superstitious in this Point, or perhaps

A Year after, a third Son was born to the King, who was called Geoffrey. This same Year he was crowned a third time at Worcester, together with the Queen. These superfluous Coronations, very frequent in those Days seem to be designed only to amuse the People, and intimate to them, that the King really intended to keep the Oath which was taken on these occasions. At this last Solemnity, the King and Queen coming to the Oblation, laid their Crowns on the Altar, and vowed never to wear them more. From thenceforward the Custom of the Kings wearing their Crowns during the Celebration of the great Festivals was by degrees diffused. At least we find but few Infiances in the following Reigns. About this time Henry ordered the Money to be new coined, the current Coin of the Kingdom being very much adulterated during the Reign of Stephen (1).

These peaceful Employments not at all suiting the warlike Temper of this Monarch, the Death of his Brother Goffrey, which happened soon after, gave him an opportunity of entering upon Action. As soon as this Prince was laid in his Grave, the Duke of Bretagne seized the City of Nantz, with the whole Earldom of that Name (2). But Henry claimed it as Heir to his Brother; and to prosecute his Pretensions, he passed into Normandy with so considerable Forces, that it plainly appeared he would not be disappointed. Whilst he waited for the Season's permitting him to enter upon his Expedition, he made a Visit to the King of France, with design to gain him to his side, or at least prevail with him to stand neuter. He was very sensible, if Lewis interposed not in this Affair, the Duke of Bretagne could not give him much trouble.

Henry's el. of the Son with Margaret of France, Brampden, M. Paris.

Amidite the Civilities he received from Lewis, he so fully flattered him, that before they parted, a Marriage was concluded between Henry's eldest Son, who was but five Years of Age, and Margaret the French King's Daughter, an Infant of five or six Months old. Having thus secured France, he went and headed his Army, with a Resolution to take the City by force, if Conan refused to give him peaceable possession. As Conan was by no means a Match for the King of England, he was constrained to give way to his Power. But the Conquest of Nantz was not the only Benefit Henry reaped by this Expedition. Before he quitted Bretagne, he made a Treaty with Conan, whereby the Duke obliged himself to give his Daughter Coyntance in Marriage to Geoffrey, Henry's Son, who was yet in his Cradle. By this Marriage, celebrated five Years after, notwithstanding the Bridegroom's Youth, Geoffrey became Duke of Bretagne upon the Death of his Father-in-law.

The large Dominions, Heavy posses'd, and the Earldom of Nantz which he had lately acquired, with hope, of adding one Day to it all Bratagne, were not sufficient to content him. His Ambition still increasing as he made new Conquests, he undertook to revive his Queen's Title to the Earldom of Tholouse, which was of a very great Extent. His late Alliance with Lewis the Young, made him hope that Monarch would give him as little disturbance in Lauguedoc as in Bratagne, and leave him at liberty to extend his Frontiers on that side. But he was mistaken in his Conclusions. I shall first clear Queen Eleanor's Title to Tholouse, and then see what was the Issue of that Expedition.

William IV. Earl of Thouloe, Contemporay with the Conqueror, had but one Daughter called Philippa, married to William VIII. Earl of Poictiers, Eleanor's Grandfather.
 By this Marriage the Earldom of Thouloe was to fall out Day to the House of Poictiers, which was also in possession of Guine. But William, Father of Philippa, imagined he could secure it in it's own Family, by selling it to Raymond of St. Gild. his younger Brother. This Sale, real or pretended, would have been but a weak means to deprive the Countess of Poictiers of her Father's Inheritance, if certain Accidents had not favoured Raymond, who continued in possession of the Earldom of Thouloe, after his Brother's Death. The Design of the Earl of Poictiers, his Son and to Philippa, of mortgaging his De-mieties to William Rufus, in order to equip himself for his Voyage to the Hah-Land, being frustrated by the Death of William, he applied himself elsewhere; and at length raised the Money by mortgaging his Revenues for several Years. His Expenses on this occasion, and his Misfortune in losing all his Equipage, constrained him to return home, where however he could expect no Supplies, by reason his Revenues were all mortgaged. Raymond of St.
Gild embracing this juncture, offered him a considerable Sum, to renounce his Right to the Earldom of Tholoufe. As Matters then stood with the Earl of Poitiers, he readily listened to this Proposal, and made an Agreement with Raymond. By this Agreement, Raymond kept possession of the Earldom, which his Posterity enjoyed after him, without any disturbance from the Earl of Poitiers, or his Son William IX. After the Death of this last, Lewis the Young, who married Eleanor his only Daughter and Heir, revived the Pretensions of the House of Poitiers to the Earldom of Tholoufe. He maintained that the Sale made by Earl William to Raymond, was a feigned thing. And secondly, that Raymond imposed upon the easy Nature of the Earl of Poitiers, and purchased his Right at too cheap a Rate. Lastly, that he had not c. c. p. for the whole of the covenant Sum. From hence he inferred, that the Bargain was void, and consequently Eleanor ought to possess whatever Philippa her Grandmother was entitled to, repaying to the Earl of Tholoufe what the Earl of Poitiers had received. Raymond V. who was then Earl of Tholoufe, was extremely embarrassed on the account of these Pretensions. In vain did he plead Precription, which is sometimes of service in private Affairs. That was too weak a Fence against a Prince, who was able to break through it by force of Arms. However, after a long Negotiation the Affair was ended, by a Marriage between Earl Raymond and Constance, Sister of Lewis, and Widow of Eustace, Son of King Stephen. On account of this Marriage Lewis dropped his Pretensions, and as long as he lived with Eleanor, the Earl of Tholoufe remained unmolested.

Eleanor's second Marriage created Raynoul first Disfranchises. Henry, who was possessed of the same Regat, the King of France had relinquished, laid Claim to the Earldome of Tholouse for the same Reasons Lewis had before urged. Raymond again pleaded the Sale made to his Grandfather; the Renunciation of the House of Poitiers; besides a long Possession, which exceeded the Time allowed by the Laws for a Prescription. Upon these Grounds he resolved to keep possession of the Earldome. This was the State of the Case, which was to be decided by Arms. To execute his Project the more easily, Henry made an Alliance with Rajmond Earl of Arrogen and Burceland, and engaged the King of Scotland to lend him a powerful Aid (3). As soon as his Army was ready, he marched towards Languedoc, took Cahors in his way, and went and sat down before Tholouse.

Louis the Younger, who could not behold Henry's Greatness without Jealousy, had used such Expedients, that he had thrown himself into Thoulouze a few Days before. The large Extent of that City, and the French King's Succours, rendered the Siege so difficult, that Henry did not think himself able to accomplish his Undertaking. Wherefore, he raised the Siege, and returned into his own Dominions. Mercutio says, he might easily have taken the City, if he had not made a Confidence of befigging his Sovereign. But one can hardly believe This to be a real Motive of his Retreat, since on other occasions he did not seem to have to great a regard for the King of France. But this as it will, he matched back to Normandy, leaving the Citty of Cahors to Thomas Becket his Chancellor. In his Return, he went into la Beauvoisine, where he committed great Ravages, in Revenge of the King of France's back- setting his Measures. At the same time, Simon Earl of Montfort delivered to him his Castles in the neighbourhood of Paris, by means of which the Communication with Orleans was entirely cut off. The Advantage these Castles gave him, forced Louis to send Proposals for a Cessation of Arms, which was agreed upon for a Year. During the Truce, the two Monarchs concluded a Peace, which confirmed the Treaty made at Paris, without any mention of Thoulouze. So that Henry professed during his Life, his Pretensions to that Peerdom, and by his Death left them to his Successor, who thought fit to resign them.
